THE beſt part of Arabia Felix, or that which the Greeks called moſt happy, was probably the country of Yaman; the delightfulneſs and plenty of which ought to be attributed to its mountains. For all that part lying along the Red Sea is a dry barren deſert, in ſome places ten or twelve leagues over; but in return bounded by the aforeſaid mountains, which, being well watered, enjoy an almoſt perpetual ſpring, and beſides coffee, the peculiar produce of this country, yield great plenty and variery of fruits, and in particular excellent corn, grapes, and ſpices. The principal of theſe mountains taken notice of by the antients were Cabubathra, Melan, Prionotus, and Didymi, whoſe Arabic names have not hitherto been brought into Europe. As the Greeks and Romans were little acquainted with this region, we muſt allow Ptolemy to have been very inaccurate in his geography of it; which might alſo be proved by an induction of particulars, were it in any manner neceſſary. Admit this, and we may be allowed to ſuppoſe, that the preſent Arab river Falj, emptying itſelf into the Bay of Baſra, is the Prion of Ptolemy; and the modern city Masfa his Mæphath, ſituate about 0°. 30′ N. of the ſource of that river. However, it muſt be owned, that a river of Omân, [n] Plin. Ptol. ubi ſup. Geogr. Nubienſ. & philoſ. Xiraſita in clim. ii. Abulfed. in Arab. Yacût. & Ebn. Maruph. apud Gol. ibid. p. 78, 81.

Omân, falling into the Indian ocean at Sûr, about 0°. 40'. N. of Maſkat, poſſibly the Moſcha portus of Ptolemy, bids likewiſe fair for the Prion. No other rivers of note are to be met with in Yaman; which is not to be wondered at, ſince the ſtreams, which at certain times of the year deſcend from the mountains, ſeldom reach the ſea, being for the moſt part drunk up and loſt in the burning ſands of that coaſt °.

Hejaz, with its chief cities, &c.

Hejaz, either ſo named, becauſe it divides Najd from Tehama, or becauſe it is ſurrounded with mountains, is limited on the ſouth by Yaman and Tehâma; on the weſt by the ſea 'Al Kolzom; on the north by the deſerts of Shâm or Syria; and on the eaſt by the province of Najd [P]. This province is famous for its two chief cities Mecca and Medina, one of which is celebrated for its temple, and having given birth to Mohammed; and the other for being the place of his reſidence for the laſt ten years of his life, and of his interment. The ſoil of Hejaz, as well as that of Najd, Tehama, and Yamama, is much more barren than that of Yaman; the greater part of their territories being covered with dry ſands, or riſing into rocks, interſperſed here and there with ſome fruitful ſpots, which receive their greateſt advantages from their water and palm-trees. The chief towns in Hejaz, deſerving any attention on account of their antiquity, are theſe that follow: 1. Mecca, ſometimes alſo called Becca, which words are ſynonymous, and ſignify a place of great concourſe, is certainly one of the moſt antient cities in the world. Some authors imagine it to be the Meſa or Meſha of the Scripture, as above obſerved, and that it deduced its name from one of Iſhmael's ſons. It ſtands in a ſtony and barren valley, ſurrounded on all ſides by mountains under the ſame parallel with the Macoraba of Ptolemy, and about forty Arabian miles from the ſea 'Al Kolzom. The length of Mecca, from Maalah to Maſphalah, is about two miles, and its breadth, from the foot of the mountain Ajyad to the top of another called Koaikaân, about a mile. In the midſt of this ſpace the town is ſeated, built of ſtone cut from the neighbouring mountains. The Arab authors tell us, that near a chapel, or holy houſe, for ſo the Arabs term it, in the centre of 'Al-Hharâm, or great temple, here, called 'Al-Caabah, ſtands a white ſtone, which was the ſepulchre of Iſhmael; and that 'Al-Caabah was firſt built by Adam of ſtone, but deſtroyed by the deluge. However, ever, add they, God commanded Abraham and Iſhmael to rebuild it; which they did, covering it with the boughs of olive-trees, and for pillars erecting the trunks of palm-trees. There being no ſprings at Mecca, at leaſt none but what are bitter, and unfit to drink, except only the well Zemzem, the water of which, though far the beſt, yet cannot be drank for any continuance, being brackiſh, and cauſing eruptions in thoſe who drink plentifully of it, the inhabitants are obliged to uſe rain-water, which they catch in ciſterns. But this not being ſufficient, ſeveral attempts were made to bring water thither from other places by aqueducts; and particularly about Mohammed's time, Zobair, one of the principal men of the tribe of Koreiſh, endeavoured at a great expence to ſupply the city with water from mount Araſat, but without ſucceſs; yet this was effected not many years ago, being begun at the charge of a wife of Solimân the Turkiſh emperor. But long before the time of that prince, another aqueduct had been made from a ſpring at a conſiderable diſtance, which was, after ſeveral years labour, finiſhed by the Khalîf al Moktader Abbaſida. Notwithſtanding the ſterility of the ſoil near Mecca, it being ſo barren as to produce no fruits but what are common in the deſerts, yet a traveller is no ſooner out of its territory, than he meets on all ſides with plenty of good ſprings and ſtreams of running water, with many gardens, and cultivated lands. The prince or Sharîf of Mecca has a garden well planted at his caſtle of Marbaa, about three miles weſtward from the city, where he uſually reſides. This prince is lineally deſcended from Haſhem, Mohammed's great-grandfather, who, being the head of his tribe, appointed two caravans to ſet out yearly, the one in ſummer, and the other in winter, to foreign parts, in order the more effectually to ſupply his countrymen with proviſions, the people of Mecca having no corn or grain of their own growth. They are ſupplied with dates in vaſt abundance from the adjacent country, and with grapes from Tayef, about ſixty miles diſtant, very few growing at Mecca. As for the citizens of Mecca, they are generally very rich, being conſiderable gainers by the prodigious concourſe of people of almoſt all nations at the yearly pilgrimage, at which time there is a great fair or mart for all kinds of merchandize. They have alſo great numbers of cattle, and particularly of camels: however, the poorer ſort cannot but live very indifferently, in a place where almoſt every neceſſary of life muſt be purchaſed with money. The Sharîf of Mecca's troops conſiſt entirely of infantry, which the Arabs call 'Al-Harrabah, i. e.

° La Roque voy. del'Arab. heur. p. 121, 123, 153. Ptol. Strab. Plin. ubi ſup. Abulfed. in Arab. [P] Gol. ad Alfragan. p. 98. Abulfed. in Arab. p 5.

archers

archers or dartmen. We muſt not omit obſerving, that Safa and Marwah were two places in Mecca, in which the idols Aſaph and Nayelah, were placed before the time of Mohammed. As for the temple of Mecca, and the reputed holineſs of this territory, they will be treated of in the modern hiſtory of the Arabs. Some authors write, that the interior or middle part of Mecca only had the name of Becca aſſigned it, becauſe it was greatly crouded with inhabitants, which that word imports; others believe, that Mecca was the name of the city, and Becca of the temple; and laſtly others think, that Becca paſſed into Mecca, as Balbec into Malbec, Banbe into Manbe, &c. which ſeems to us the moſt probable opinion. We muſt diſtinguiſh betwen the Hharam of Mecca, conſidered as the territory of the Sharîf, extending ſome miles beyond the city, and the magnificent temple in it ſo called, being three hundred and ſeventy cubits long, three hundred and fifteen broad, and ſupported by four hundred and thirty-four [q] pillars. It muſt not be forgot, that the Arabs have a tradition amongſt them, that Iſhmael, with his mother Hagar, fixed his reſidence here; which ſeems to have induced them frequently to viſit Mecca, and hold it in high veneration, even before the age of Mohammed. They likewiſe believe Zemzem to have been the well, near which Hagar ſat down with her ſon Iſhmael, and was comforted by the angel. Abulfeda places the city we are now upon in 67°. 31. long. and 21°. 20′. N. lat. Some of the Orientals make the patriarch Abraham to have been the founder of it; but others with more reaſon attribute its foundation to one of the ſons of Iſhmael. It does not follow from Moſes's mentioning Meſha as inhabited by the poſterity of Joktan, that Mecca was built before the time of Iſhmael, ſuppo-

[q] R. Saadias in verſion. Arab. Pentat. Abraham Zachut. in Sefer Iuchaſin, 135. Gen. c. x. ver. 30. c. xxv. v. 15. Pitt's account of the religion and manners of the Mohammedans, p. 96. 107. Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 82, 98, 99. Sharif al Edriſi apud Pocock. in not. ad ſpecim. hiſt. Arab. p. 122, 124, 125. ut. & ipſe Pocock. ibid. p. 51. Algiawhary apud Abulfed. in Arab. p. 40. Alb. Schult. in ind. geographic. ad vit. Saladin. ſub voc. Manbeſium & Mecca. Sharif al Edriſi apud Gagn. in not. ad Abulfed. Arab. p. 29, 30. ut & ipſe Abulfed. ibid. Vid. etiam Adr. Reland. lib. de relig. Mohammed. & effig. Caabæ cum Templ. ei circumd. ibid.

ſuppoſing thoſe places to have been the ſame, ſince he more than once uſes the appellations by which towns went in his age, as might be proved by an induction of particulars, were it in any manner neceſſary [r]. 2. Medina, which, till Mohammed's retreat thither, was called Yathreb, is a city ſtanding in a plain, ſurrounded with a brick wall, and about half a degree from the coaſt of the Red Sea. Abulfeda intimates, that one of its antient names was Taibah, a word importing ſalubrious, derived from the healthy air its inhabitants breathed. It is about half as big as Mecca, and ten days journey from thence. In ſome parts its territory produces palm-trees, fruits, ſeveral ſalfuginous plants, and ſalt itſelf in many places. About the mountains Air and Ohud, the firſt of which is about two leagues to the ſouth, and the other as many to the north, of Medina, the country is fruitful in dates. The name Yathreb was derived from the chief of the tribe that firſt ſettled here, whom the Arabs make the great-grandſon of Aram. Golius takes it to be the Ἰάθειπωα of Stephanus, and the Λάθειπωα of Ptolemy. Here Mohammed lies interred in a magnificent building, covered with a cupola, and adjoining to the eaſt ſide of the great temple, which is built in the midſt of the city. Its ſituation has not been exactly defined, ſome authors determining its longitude to be 67°, 30′. and others 65°. 20′. and its latitude either 24°. or 25°. N. The moſt ingenious Mr. Sale muſt be deemed guilty of an error, when he makes mount Thabir two leagues diſtant only from Medina, ſince that mountain is in the neighbourhood of Mecca. Medina is dignified by the Mohammedans with the title of the city of the prophet, from the kind reception Mohammed met with there, as we ſhall hereafter have occaſion more fully to obſerve [s]. 3. Thaifa or Taifa, a town ſixty miles to the eaſt of Mecca, behind mount Gazwan,

[r] Golii notæ ad Alfraganum. p. 99. Gen. c. x. & c. xxxi. Abulfed. & Alb. Schult. ubi ſup.

[s] Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 97, 98. Abulfed. in Arab. p. 40, 41. Alb. Schult. in ind. geographic. ubi ſup. Ptol. & Steph. Byzant. apud Gol. ubi ſup. Sharif al Edriſi, vulgo geogr. Nubienſ. clim. ii. par. 5. Kalkaſhendi p. 400. Pocock. in not. ad ſpecim. hiſt. Arab. paſſ. Safioddin. in compend. lexic. Yacût. & ipſe Yacût. ſub litera ع 'Ain. Al Sharistani apud Pocock. ubi ſup. Vid etiam Cl. Gagn. not. ad Abulfed. Arab. p. 31. & Sal. prelim. diſc. p. 5.

wan, where the cold is more intenſe than in any other part of Hejaz, but the air moſt ſalubrious. It had the name of Veg ja given it at firſt by its founder. The Turks call it the region of Al Abbâs from the uncle of Mohammed, who fixed his reſidence here. The word Taifa plainly alludes to the wall with which this town is ſurrounded. Lat. 21 °. 20′, N [t]. 4. Gjudda or Jodda a port and maritime city, the bulwark of Mecca, muſt undoubtedly be a place of great antiquity, though ſcarce ever taken notice of by the Greek or Roman authors. The town of Aidâb, on the confines of Abaſſia, ſtands on the oppoſite ſhore, where great numbers of the African Mohammedans take ſhipping, in order to viſit the holy city of Mecca. Lat. 21°. 45′. N [u]. 5. Yanbo', or 'Al-Yanbo', is undoubtedly the Iambia of Ptolemy, and not far from Medina, or, as the Arabs more properly ſtyle it, 'Al-Madînah. We find it repreſented as a ſmall city by Abulfeda, who likewiſe cites 'Ebn Saîd, as affirming it to have a caſtle, and ſeveral fountains, in its neighbourhood. The port is about a day's journey from the high road leading to Al-Madînah. A little to the eaſt of Yanbo' ſtands mount Radwâ, about ſeven ſtations from Al Madînah whence a vaſt quantity of the whetſtone is exported into various regions. All the diſtrict of Zanbo' produces palm-trees, water, corn, &c. and was inhabited by the Hhaſanites, who lived after the manner of the antient Arabes Scenitæ, and reſembled them in all particulars. Ebn Hhawkal obſerves, that the Hhaſanites and Giafarites, whoſe territories were contiguous, ſo weakened one another by bloody wars, that their country became a prey to the king of Yaman [w]. 6. Madian, the Modiana of Ptolemy, and Midian or Madian of Scripture, is a city of Hejaz, at preſent little better than a heap of ruins. It is ſituated on the eaſtern ſhore of the ſea 'Al-Kolzom, at no great diſtance from the gulph of Ailah. The Arabs have ſeveral traditions relating to this place, viz. that it received its name from the tribe of Madian, who firſt built and inhabited it; that Shoaïb, the ſon of Mikaïl, the ſon of Yaſhjar, the ſon of Madian, of that tribe, was the ſame perſon with the father-father-in-law of Moſes, called in Scripture Reuel or Reguel, and Jethro; and that the well, whence Moſes, or, as they call him, Mûſa, watered Jethro's flocks, ſtill remained when Abulfeda wrote his geographical deſcription of Arabia. Moſt authors agree, that the Midianites ought to be looked upon as the deſcendents of Abraham by Keturah, who afterwards ſeem to have coaleſced with the Iſhmaelites; ſince Moſes names the ſame merchants, who ſold Joſeph to Potiphar, in one place Iſhmaelites, and in another Midianites. The ſacred hiſtorian makes Jethro both the prieſt and prince of Midian. Ptolemy aſſerts the latitude of Modiana to be 27° 45′ N. which almoſt exactly correſponds with that aſſigned it by 'Ebn Saîd, viz. 27° 50′ N though other Oriental writers place it in [x] 29° 00′ N. lat. 7. Hejr, or 'Al-Hheg'r, in 28° 30′ N. lat. according to 'Ebn Hhawkal, was the ſeat of the tribe of Thamud, the Thamydeni of the antients. This clearly evinces Hejr to be the Egra or Agra of Pliny, ſince that author makes the Thamydeni neighbours to that city. As Ptolemy likewiſe is far from being accurate in his determination of the longitude and latitude of places, we may ſafely enough take his Negra for the Egra of Pliny, and Hejr of the moderns, ſince the latitude of the former differs but two degrees from that of the latter of theſe towns. 'Al-Hheg'r ſtands amidſt a ridge of rocky mountains, out of which many houſes have been cut, as ſome ſuppoſe, by the Amalekites, or their anceſtors the Adites, Iramites, Thamudites, &c. But this notion we cannot rely upon, as depending chiefly on the authority of the Koran. 'Ebn Hhawkal calls this ridge of mountains 'Al-Athâleb, i. e. the fragments of ſtones [y].

[t] Golius ubi ſup. p. 99, 100. Sharif al Edriſi clim. 2. par. 5. Atwal, Raſm, Ulugh Beigh apud Abulfed. ubi ſup. [u] Go- Sharif al Edriſi ubi ſup. Atwal, Kanun, Raſm apud Abulfed. ibid. [w] Ebn Said & Ebn Hhawkal apud Abulfed. in Arab. p. 45. ut & ipſe Abulfed· ibid. & alib. Ptol. in Arab.

TIHAMA,

[x] Ptol. in Arab. Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 143, 144. Abulfed. & Ebn Said ubi ſup. Sharif al Edriſi clim. iii. par. 5. p. 109. Al Beidawi, Tarikh Montakhab. Gen. c. xxv. ver. 2. c. xxix. ver. 1. c. xxxvii. ver. 36. Exod. c. ii. ver. 18. c. iii. ver. 1. Vide etiam D'Herbelot, bibl. Orient. art. Schoaib. Prid. life of Mahom. p. 24, & alib. Shalſhel hakkab. p. 12. Deut. c. xxv. ver. 13, 14. Sal. in not. ad Al-Kor. ſur. vii. p. 126. & Gagn. ubi ſup. ſect. 6. [y] Ebn Hhawkal apud Abulfed. ubi ſup. p. 43. Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 96. Ptol. in Arab. Steph. Byzant. de urb. Plin. l. vi. c. 28. Abulfed. ubi ſup. Sharif al Edriſi apud Bochart. Phal. l. i. c. 44. Pocock. in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 37. Alb. Schult. in Ind. geographic. ad vit. Salad. ſub voc. Errakimum. Vide etiam Al-Kor. ſur. lxxxix. ver. 9.

TIHAMA, or Tehama, is a ſmall province, whoſe limits have not been ſufficiently defined by the Arab geographers, who have ſometimes confounded it with Yaman and Hejaz. Tehama, according to Golius, derived that name from its ſandy ſoil, as it did another, viz. Gaur, from its low ſituation. It is bounded on the weſt by the Red Sea, and on the other ſides by Hejâz and Yaman extending almoſt from Mecca to Aden. Abulfeda mentions ſeveral towns in this province undoubtedly of great antiquity, but unknown both to the Greeks and Romans. The Tamna of Pliny, and Thumna of Ptolemy, by the latitude he aſſigns it, viz. 17° 15′ N. ſeem to bear ſome relation to Tehama [z]. Tehama.

As the Nabathæans poſſeſſed the beſt part, if not all, of the province of Hejâz, contiguous to Tihama, the Thimanei of Pliny, neighbours to the Nabathæans, muſt be the Arabs of Tihama.

THE province of Najd, which word ſignifies a riſing country, lies between thoſe of Yamama, Yaman, and Hejaz, and is limited on the eaſt by Irâk. Najd is peculiarly oppoſed to Tehama, as the name implies, though this laſt has ſeveral ridges of mountains in it [a]. Najd.

YAMAMA, alſo called Arud, from its oblique ſituation in reſpect of Yaman, is encompaſſed by Najd, Tehama, Bahrein, Omân, Shihr, Hadramaut, and Saba. The chief city is Yamâma, which gives name to the province, and was antiently called Jaw, or Gjauva. It is four degrees to the E. of Mecca, and deduced its name, according to the excellent Golius, from the niece of Taſm, whoſe brilliant and piercing eyes rendered her ſo famous amongſt the Arabs, that one of their proverbs was, more ſharp-ſighted than YAMAMA. This lady governed Yamama, and therefore the quality above-mentioned was the more conſpicuous in her. However, ſome authors relate, that there was a river, or fountain, in this province, called Yamama, from whence the province itſelf was ſo denominated. The falſe prophet Moſeilama, Mohammed's competitor, rendered this Yamama.

place

[z] Golius ubi ſup. p. 95. Sharif al Edriſi clim. ii. par. 5. Plin l. vi. c. 28. Ptol. ubi ſup.

[a] Golius ubi ſup. p. 94. Abulfed. in Arab. paſſ.

place famous by residing in it. But, he being vanquished and killed, it submitted to Abubecr [b].

Bahrein. THOUGH the more accurate Oriental geographers make Bahrein part of Irâk, yet a short description of it ought not to be omitted here. Bahrein then, in the most extensive acceptation of the word, denotes that maritime tract lying between Basra and the farthest limits of Omân; to which the Arabs have given the name of Bahrein, i. e. "Of "two seas, or the country of two seas," because it connects the Persian gulph with the Indian ocean. In a more confined sense it is applied to an island, or rather two, of the Persian gulph, in 26° 30′ N. lat. about a league from the town of Al-Katîf seated on that gulph. One of these islands seems to be the Ichara of Ptolemy, and Icharia of Strabo. As Jûlfâr and theo ther principal towns of Bahrein were built after Mohammed's death, our readers will expect some account of them in the modern history of Arabia [c].

The principal islands on the coast of Arabia. As for the islands of Ænus, Timagenes, Zygæna, and many others, both in the Arabian and (M) Persian gulphs, enumerated

[b] Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 95. Sharif al Edrisi clim. ii. par. 6. Geo-g. Elmacin. hist. Sar. l. i. c. 2. [c] Golius ubi sup. p. 96. Ptol. ubi sup. Strab. l. xvi. Ælian. de animal. l. xi. c. 9. Sharif al Edrisi, Yacût, & Abulfed. apud Gol. ibid. p. 78, 81.

(M) The antients frequently called the Persian gulph, or gulph of Basra, as well as the Indian ocean, the Erythræan or Red Sea, as we learn from Herodotus, Polybius, Strabo, Philostratus, Mela, Pliny, Solinus, Dionysius Afer, and Ælian. Several reasons have been assigned for that appellation; but the most probable seems to be the reflection of the solar rays in that hot climate, which gave the water a reddish colour. The learned Dr. Prideaux without a sufficient foudation asserts this to have been the only proper Red Sea of the antients; since, according to Pliny, the Arabian and Persian gulphs were both branches of that sea. He seems likewise to be mistaken, when he affirms the whole Arabian gulph to have been the Yam Souph of the Hebrews; since 'tis highly probable, that the Heroopolitan gulph only was so called by that people (12).

(12) Herodot. l. i. c. 180. & l. iv. c. 37. Strab. l. xvi. Polyb. l. v. Philostrat. vit. Apollon. l. iii. c. 50. p. 136. Mel. l. iii. c. 8. Plin. l. vi. c. 23, 26. Solin. c. 58. Dionys. Af. v. 1132. Ælian. hist. animal. l. xvi. c. 14. Prideaux & Shaw ubi sup.

enumerated by Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Ptolemy, Ælian, &c. as appertaining to Arabia, they merit not the leaſt attention. But it may not be improper to obſerve, that, in our opinion, Ptolemy's iſland of Socrates may be looked upon as the ſame with the Socotra of the moderns. 'Tis true, he places the former two or three degrees more to the northward, than the latter is found to be by experience. However, his inaccuracy, which we have frequently had occaſion to obſerve, and the little acquaintance the Greeks and Romans had with the people of Arabia Felix, ſufficiently account for ſuch a difference; which being admitted, the affinity of the names Socrates and Socotra ſeems no inconſiderable argument in favour of the conjecture here propoſed. With this obſervation we ſhall cloſe our deſcription of Arabia [d].

SECT. II.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, learning, arts and ſciences, diſpoſition, manner of life, &c. of the Arabs.

Some of the poſterity of Cuſh ſettle in Arabia.

THE deſcendents of Cuſh formed a kingdom in that part of Arabia Petræa bordering upon Egypt, and extending itſelf along the eaſtern ſhore of the Red Sea towards the frontiers of Paleſtine and Arabia Felix, in very early times, as has been already obſerved in the hiſtory of the Ethiopians. His ſons Seba or Saba, Sabtah, Regma or Raamah, Sabtecha, and grandſons Sheba and Dedan, ſeated themſelves likewiſe in the Happy and Deſert Arabia, as appears from the cities Sabota, Rhegana, Rhegama or Rhegma, Saba, Saue, Saptha or Saptah, Dedan, and the country of the Sabæi, whoſe metropolis was the great city Saba; all of which preſerved very ſenſible footſteps of the names of the firſt planters of thoſe two provinces or kingdoms. However, it ſeems to us moſt probable, for the reaſons already given, that the bulk of the Cuſhites made ſettlements in other parts. As a farther proof of this, it may be obſerved, that the eaſtern writers take little or no notice of them [e].

[d] Diod. Sic. l. iii. Strab. Ptol. & Ælian. ubi. ſup.

Caſlûhhim, Caphtorim, Hhorites, &c.

As for the Caſlûhhim, Caphtorim, and Hhorites, occupying the hilly diſtrict about mount Seir, though very antient, they never made any conſiderable figure. The poſterity of Edom, who after their exciſion ſeized upon the tract they inhabited, in proceſs of time intermixing with the proper Arabs, formed one people with them. But neither do the preſent Arabs look upon Eſau or Edom as one of the proper founders of their nation [f].

We have already obſerved, that the Arraceni and Saraceni of the antients were the ſame people. From the ſituation aſſigned them by the old geographers, it can ſcarce be doubted but that the Arra of Pliny and Ptolemy was the capital of the region they inhabited, and gave them the appellation they went under. Strabo, deſcribing Ælius Gallus's expedition into Arabia, intimates, that the province of Ararena was thirty days journey from Petra, and fifty from the city of the Negrani, or Negara Metropolis of Ptolemy, i. e. the modern Nag'ran; that it was for the moſt part deſert, and inhabited by the Nomades, or Arabes Scenitæ; and that the interjacent tract betwixt it and the former city was a wild pathleſs region, interſperſed in ſome parts with palm-trees. All which particulars, as well as the name itſelf, clearly evince this province to be the country of the Arraceni or Saraceni, which had the above-mentioned Arra for its capital city. From ſeveral circumſtances in the deſcription of the expeditions into Arabia made by Trajan and Severus, to be met with in Dio, it appears that the Arraceni or Saraceni were likewiſe ſometimes in the eaſt denominated Agareni, and their chief town Arra Atra, or, as Herodian calls it, Atræ. It is therefore highly probable, that the antient Saracens were ſtyled Hagarenes, either from the diſpoſition of the tract they inhabited, or, from Hagar the mother of Iſhmael [g].

In

[e] Univer. hiſt. vol. xviii. p. 88, 89, 110, 111, & alib. Gen. c. x. ver. 7. Agatharchid. Cnid. apud Phot. Diod. Sic. l. iii. Strab. Plin. Ptol. ubi ſup. Hyde hiſt. rel. vet. Perſ. p. 37, & alib. Sale's prelim. diſc. p. 9. [f] Gen. c. x. ver. 14. c. xxxvi. ver. 8. c. xiv. ver. 6. Deut. c. ii. ver. 12. Vide etiam Cl. Gagn. diatrib. ſect. 4. [g] Univ. hiſt. vol. xviii. p. 185. Plin. l. vi. c. 28. Ptol. in Arab. Strab. l. xvi. p. 781. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 785. & l. lxxv. p. 855. Herodian. l. iii. c. 28. edit. Oxon. 1678. Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iii. c. 14.

In order to confirm what is here advanced, it may be farther obſerved, that Stephanus mentions a country called Saraca, inhabited by the Saraceni (N), as contiguous to that of the Nabathæans; and that the Arab geographer Yâkût takes notice of the town 'Al-'Arakh ſeated on Agja, one of the two celebrated mountains of the Taïtes, or tribe of Taï, the Taueni of Pliny, and Ταϊνοὶ Taini of Bardeſanes in Euſebius, who joins them with the Saracens. From hence, in conjunction with the reaſons alledged by the learned Mr. Gagnier, we may conclude, that Pliny called this nation Arraceni; and that Dioſcorides was the firſt of the antients now extant that prefixed to that word the hiſſing letter S, as has been determined by the excellent Salmaſius [h].

The Jeruſalem Targum takes the names Iſhmaelites and Saracens to have been of an equal extent, and to have denoted the ſame nation. This not only included the Arabes Scenitæ, bordering upon Paleſtine, Syria, and Chaldæa, but likewiſe thoſe ſeparated by the Red Sea from Ethiopia; all of whom we find in Scripture going under the general name of Arabians. That the word Saraceni cannot be derived from any of the following ſources, notwithſtanding the authority of the learned men here mentioned, we believe our readers will allow [i].

[h] Steph. Byzant. in voc. Σάρακα. Ptol. ubi ſup. Yakutus geogr. Ar. apud Gagn. ubi ſup. ſect. 9. Plin. ubi ſup. Bardeſanes apud. Euſeb. de præp. evang. p. 277. Vide etiam Harduin. in Plin. ubi ſup. Gagn. diatr. ſect. 9. & Salmaſ. in exercit. Plinian. p. 344. col. 2. ſub init. [i] Targ. Hieroſol. in Gen. c. xxxvii. ver. 25. 2 Chron. c. xvii. ver. 1. &. c. xxi. ver. 16. Iſai. c. xiii. ver. 20. Gagn. ubi ſup. ſect. 4. ſub fin.

(N) Mr. Gagnier thinks, that the Saracens of Arabia Felix and Arabia Petræa were two different nations; and that the latter received their name Araceni from the city of Arke, Arakeme, or Petra, their metropolis. But in the firſt article we humbly conceive, he ſeems to contradict himſelf; ſince in the former part of the Diatriba ſo often cited, he appears to us to be of opinion, that the Iſhmaelites ſpread themſelves gradually over Arabia Felix as well as Arabia Petræa; and that the Iſhmaelites, Arabes Scenitæ, and Saracens, were frequently taken for the ſame people. This notion we own ourſelves inclined to eſpouſe,

1. JOANNES DAMASCENUS, Nicetas Choniates, and others, ſuppoſe this word to have been of Greek extraction, alluding to Sarah's ſending away Hagar empty, without any ſort of neceſſaries or accommodations. But this is too abſurd to merit any attention. 2. Scaliger deduces the name Saraceni from the Arabic سرق ſarak, i. e. "He ſtole privately," alluding, as that great critic obſerves, to their anceſtor Iſhmael, who lived upon rapine and robbery. This, it muſt be owned, carries with it a greater appearance of truth than the former, ſince 'tis much more probable that the word ſhould be of an Arab than a Greek origin. But the misfortune is, that Iſhmael was not a pickpocket, but a robber or highwayman; and therefore the root سرق ſarak by no means comes up to the ſignification of Saraceni as determined even by this author himſelf. 3. Dr. Pocock aſſerts Saraceni to import Oriental, or "people of "the eaſt." But as Mr. Gagnier has demonſtrated, that the chief arguments he has offered in defence of this opinion hold equally true of the Chaldæans, Perſians, Indians, and Chineſe, they prove too much, and therefore we think not the leaſt regard is due unto them. The etymon of Saraceni we have given muſt therefore be allowed to approach the neareſt to truth. As the Saracens were ſo celebrated a nation, and ſuch different notions relating to their name, which points out their origin, have been advanced, we could not well avoid the prolixity our readers may poſſibly think us guilty of on this occaſion [k].

[k] Joannes Damaſcenus de hæreſ. apud, Cotelerium in lib. de monument. eccleſ. Græc. p. 326. Nicet. Choniat. MS. in bibliothec. Colbert. Hieronym. comment. in Ezech. l. viii. c. 25. Fuller. in Miſcel. ſacr. c. 12. Joſ. Scalig. ap. Fuller. ibid. Pocock. in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab p. 33. Gagn. ubi ſup. ſect. xi. p. 62, 63. Mohammed. Al-Firauzabadius, & Safioddin. apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 35.

IF

ſpouſe, as being not only ſupported by the proofs brought by Mr. Gagnier for that purpoſe, but likewiſe by Scripture, all thoſe authors who have ſo juſtly repreſented the Saracens as a moſt numerous and powerful nation, Mohammedes Al-Firauzabadius, and other eaſtern writers (13).

(13) Gagn. diatrib. ſect. 11. Vide etiam ſect. 1, 4, 6. Iſai. c. xxi. ver. 13. Jer. c. xlix. ver. 28. Targ. Hieroſol. in Gen. c. xxxvii. ver. 25. Mohammed. Al Firauzabadius apud Pocockium, in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab.. p. 110. ut & ipſe Pocock. ibid.

Two claſſes of the Arabs.

IF we follow the Oriental writers, we muſt divide the Arabs into two claſſes, viz. "the old loſt Arabians, and "the preſent." The moſt famous tribes amongſt the former were Ad, Thamûd, Taſm, Jadîs, the firſt Jorham, Amalek, Amtem, Haſbem, Abil, and Bar. Though thoſe were very numerous, yet they are now either all deſtroyed, or loſt and ſwallowed up among the other tribes; nor are there any certain memoirs or records extant concerning them. However, as the memory of ſome very remarkable events, that happened amongſt them, and the cataſtrophe of ſome of theſe tribes have been preſerved by tradition, and ſince confirmed by the authority of the Koran, we think it not improper to give our readers a ſuccinct and conciſe account of them [1].

Ad.

THE tribe of Ad deduced their origin from Ad, the ſon of Aws, or Uz, the ſon of Aram, the ſon of Shem, the ſon of Noah, who after the confuſion of tongues ſettled in Al Ahkâf, or "the winding ſands" in the province of Hadramaut, upon the confines of Omân and Yaman, where his poſterity greatly multiplied. The firſt prince that reigned over them was Sheddâd the ſon of Ad, of whom we find many fabulous things related by the eaſtern writers. Some of theſe however tell us, that Ad had two ſons Sheddâd and Sheddîd, who jointly ſwayed the ſceptre after his deceaſe, and extended their dominions from the ſands of Alâj to the trees of Oman. Sheddîd dying firſt, his brother became ſole monarch, and having built a ſumptuous palace, made a delightful garden in the deſerts of Aden, in imitation of the celeſtial paradiſe, which he called Irem, after the name of his great grandfather. When it was finiſhed, he ſet out with a great retinue in order to take a view of it; but, being arrived at a place within a day's journey of it, they were all deſtroyed by a terrible noiſe from heaven. However, according to them, the city ſtill remains, though inviſible, being preſerved by Providence as a monument of divine juſtice, Sheddâd propoſing by this impious imitation to create in his ſubjects a ſuperſtitious veneration of himſelf as a god. Al Beidawi adds, that one Abdallah Ebn Kelabah, or, as D' Herbelot calls him, Colabah, in the reign of the khalîf Moâwiyah, accidentally had Irem diſcovered to him, as he was ſeeking a camel he had loſt; but ſeeing no creature there, he was ſo terrified, that he ſtayed no longer than to take with him from thence some fine stones, which he shewed the khalîf [m].

[1] Greg. Abulfarag. p. 159. Sale's prelim. diſc. p. 5. Jallalo 'ddin. in lib. Meſhar. Vide & Pocockium ubi ſup. p. 38, 39.

After the death of Sheddâd, the kingdom of Ad was governed by a long series of princes, of whom the Oriental historians deliver many particulars, that have no great appearance of truth. The Adites in process of time falling from the worship of the true God into idolatry, God sent the prophet Hûd, supposed to be the same with Heber, to preach to and reclaim them. But they refusing to acknowledge his mission, or to obey him, God sent a hot and suffocating wind, which blew seven nights and eight days without intermission, and entering at their nostrils, past through their bodies, and destroyed them all, a very few only excepted, who had listened to Hûd, and retired with him to another place. Others relate, that before this terrible destruction they had been previously chastised with a three years drought; and therefore sent Kail Ebn Ithar, and Morthed Ebn Saad, with seventy other principal men, to Mecca, then in the hands of the tribe of Amalek, whose prince was Moâwiyah Ebn Becr, to obtain of God some rain. Kail, continue these authors, having begged of God, that He would send rain to the people of Ad, three clouds appeared, a white one, a red one, and a black one; and a voice from heaven ordered him to chuse which he would. Kail failed not to make choice of the last, thinking it to be loaden with the most rain; but when this cloud came over them, it proved to be fraught with the divine vengeance, and a tempest broke forth from it which destroyed them all. Some authors affirm, that Lokmân king of the Adites, after his subjects had been afflicted with a drought for four years, to incline them to hearken to the preaching of Hûd, and brought to the very brink of destruction, went with sixty others to Mecca to beg rain; which they not obtaining, Lokmân with some of the company stayed there, and by this means escaped being involved in the common calamity. They farther relate of this Lokmân, that his life was extended by God to the length of those of seven eagles, each of the six last of which was hatched the instant its predecessor expired. The few Adites with Lokmân that survived their countrymen, gave rise to a tribe called "the "latter

[m] Gen. c. x. ver. 22, 23. Al-Kor. Mohammed. c. 89. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. p. 51, 498. Al-Beidawi, Jallalo'ddin, ubi sup. Pocock. not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 35, 36.

" latter Ad, who were afterwards changed into monkeys. Hûd returned into Hadramaut, and was buried near Haſec, where there is a ſmall town now ſtanding called Kabr Hûd, or " the ſepulchre of Hûd." When the Arabs would ſignify the high antiquity of any thing, they ſay " as old as " king Ad, in like manner as the Greeks, when they would expreſs any thing extremely antient, made it coæval with Chronus, or Saturn, and Ogyges [n].

Thamûd.

THE tribe of Thamûd were the poſterity of Thamûd the ſon of Gather or Gether, the ſon of Aram, who falling into idolatry, the prophet Sâleh was ſent to bring them back to the worſhip of the true GOD. M. Bochart takes this prophet to be Phaleg, and M. D' Herbelot Salah the ſon of Arphaxad, and father of Heber or Hûd. The learned Mr. Sale determines in favour of M. Bochart, becauſe, ſays he, the prophet Sâleh lived between the time of Hûd and of Abraham. On the contrary, we own ourſelves of M. D' Herbelot's opinion, becauſe the identity of names is a ſtronger argument in favour of that opinion, than any ſmall inaccuracy in chronology of the Arab hiſtorians can be againſt it. Beſides, it does not appear from any Oriental author, that the prophet Sâleh did actually live between the times of Hûd and Abraham, as Mr. Sale ſuggeſts; nay, Mr. Sale himſelf diſproves this, when he cites with approbation an eaſtern author making him later than Abraham. Some few of the Thamudites received Sâleh as a true prophet, but the reſt, as a proof of his miſſion, required that he ſhould cauſe a ſhe-camel big with young to come out of a rock in their preſence; which having obtained of GOD, the camel was immediately delivered of a young one ready weaned. But inſtead of believing, the Thamudites cut the ham-ſtrings of the camel, and killed her; at which act of impiety GOD being highly diſpleaſed, three days after ſtruck them dead in their houſes by an earthquake, and a terrible noiſe from heaven, which, ſome ſay, was the voice of Gabriel the archangel crying aloud, " Die all of you." Jonda Ebn Amru, prince of the Thamudites, propoſed this miracle to Sâleh, promiſing, that if it was wrought, he and his people would believe. Accordingly Jonda acknowledged the prophet's miſſion, but the [n] Pocock. ibid. Al-Beidawi, D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. art. Houd. Iſm. Abulfed. Ahmed Ebn Yuſep. & Al-Jannabius apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 36.

the greateſt part of his ſubjects periſhed in their infidelity, as above obſerved. Sâleh, with thoſe reformed by him, was ſaved from this deſtruction. The prophet afterwards went to Paleſtine, and from thence to Mecca, where he ended his days. This tribe firſt dwelt in Yaman, but being expelled thence by Hamyar the ſon of Saba, they ſettled in the territory of Hejr, in the province of Hejaz, where their habitations, cut out of the rocks, mentioned in the Koran, are ſtill to be ſeen, and alſo the crack of the rock whence the camel iſſued, which, as an eye-witneſs hath declared, is ſixty cubits wide. Theſe houſes of the Thamudites being of the ordinary proportion, are uſed as an argument to convince thoſe of a miſtake, who make this people to have been of a gigantic ſtature. They will likewiſe confute thoſe commentators on the Koran, who affirm that the largeſt of the old Adites were an hundred cubits high, and the leaſt of them ſixty. By comparing the eaſtern writers with thoſe of the antient Greeks and Romans, we ſhall find, that the tribe of Thamûd correſponded exactly with the Thamudeni or Thamydeni of Diodorus, Pliny, and Ptolemy[o].

Taſm and Jadîs.

THE tribe of Taſm were the deſcendents of Lûd the ſon of Shem, and that of Jadîs a branch of the poſterity of Gether, as we learn from Abulfeda. Both theſe tribes lived promiſcuouſly together under the government of Taſm, till a certain tyrant made a law, that twenty maids of the tribe of Jadîs ſhould not marry, unleſs firſt deflowered by him; which the Jadiſians not enduring, formed a conſpiracy, and, inviting the king and chiefs of Taſm to an entertainment, privately hid their ſwords in the ſand, and in the midſt of their mirth fell on them, ſlew them all, and extirpated the greateſt part of that tribe. However, the few who eſcaped obtaining aid of the king of Yaman, Dhu Habſhân Ebn Akrân, aſſaulted Jadîs, and utterly deſtroyed them, there being ſcarce any mention made from that time of either of thoſe tribes. As all the traditions relating to Taſm are reckoned of a very dubious authority, when any thing is advanced without a proper foundation to ſupport it, the Arabs call it a ſtory of Taſm.

[o] Gen. c. x. ver. 23. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. 366, 740. Abulfeda, Al-Zamakhſhari. Al-Kor. Mohammed. c. vii. & c. xv. Bochart. geogr. ſac. Sale's prelim. diſc. p. 7. & note upon the Koran, c. vii. p. 124. Ebn. Shonah. Abu Muſa al Aſhari. Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 37, 57. Diod. Sic. l. iii. Plin. & Ptol. ubi ſup. Alb. Schult. ind. geographic. in vit. Salad. ſub voc. Errakim.

A Genealogical Table of the Tribes of the Genuine Arabs descended from Kahtan or Joktan.

J. Wheatley Sculpt.

Taſm. The notion many of the Orientals have of Taſm's grand-daughter Yamama, our readers will find in the former ſection, where we give a ſhort deſcription of the province of the ſame name[p].

Jorham. ALL that we find delivered by the Arabs of the former tribe of Jorham is, that their anceſtor was an antediluvian, and one of the eighty perſons, who, according to a Mahommedan tradition, were ſaved with Noah in the ark[q]. This tribe was cotemporary with that of Ad, and utterly periſhed, in a manner to us unknown.

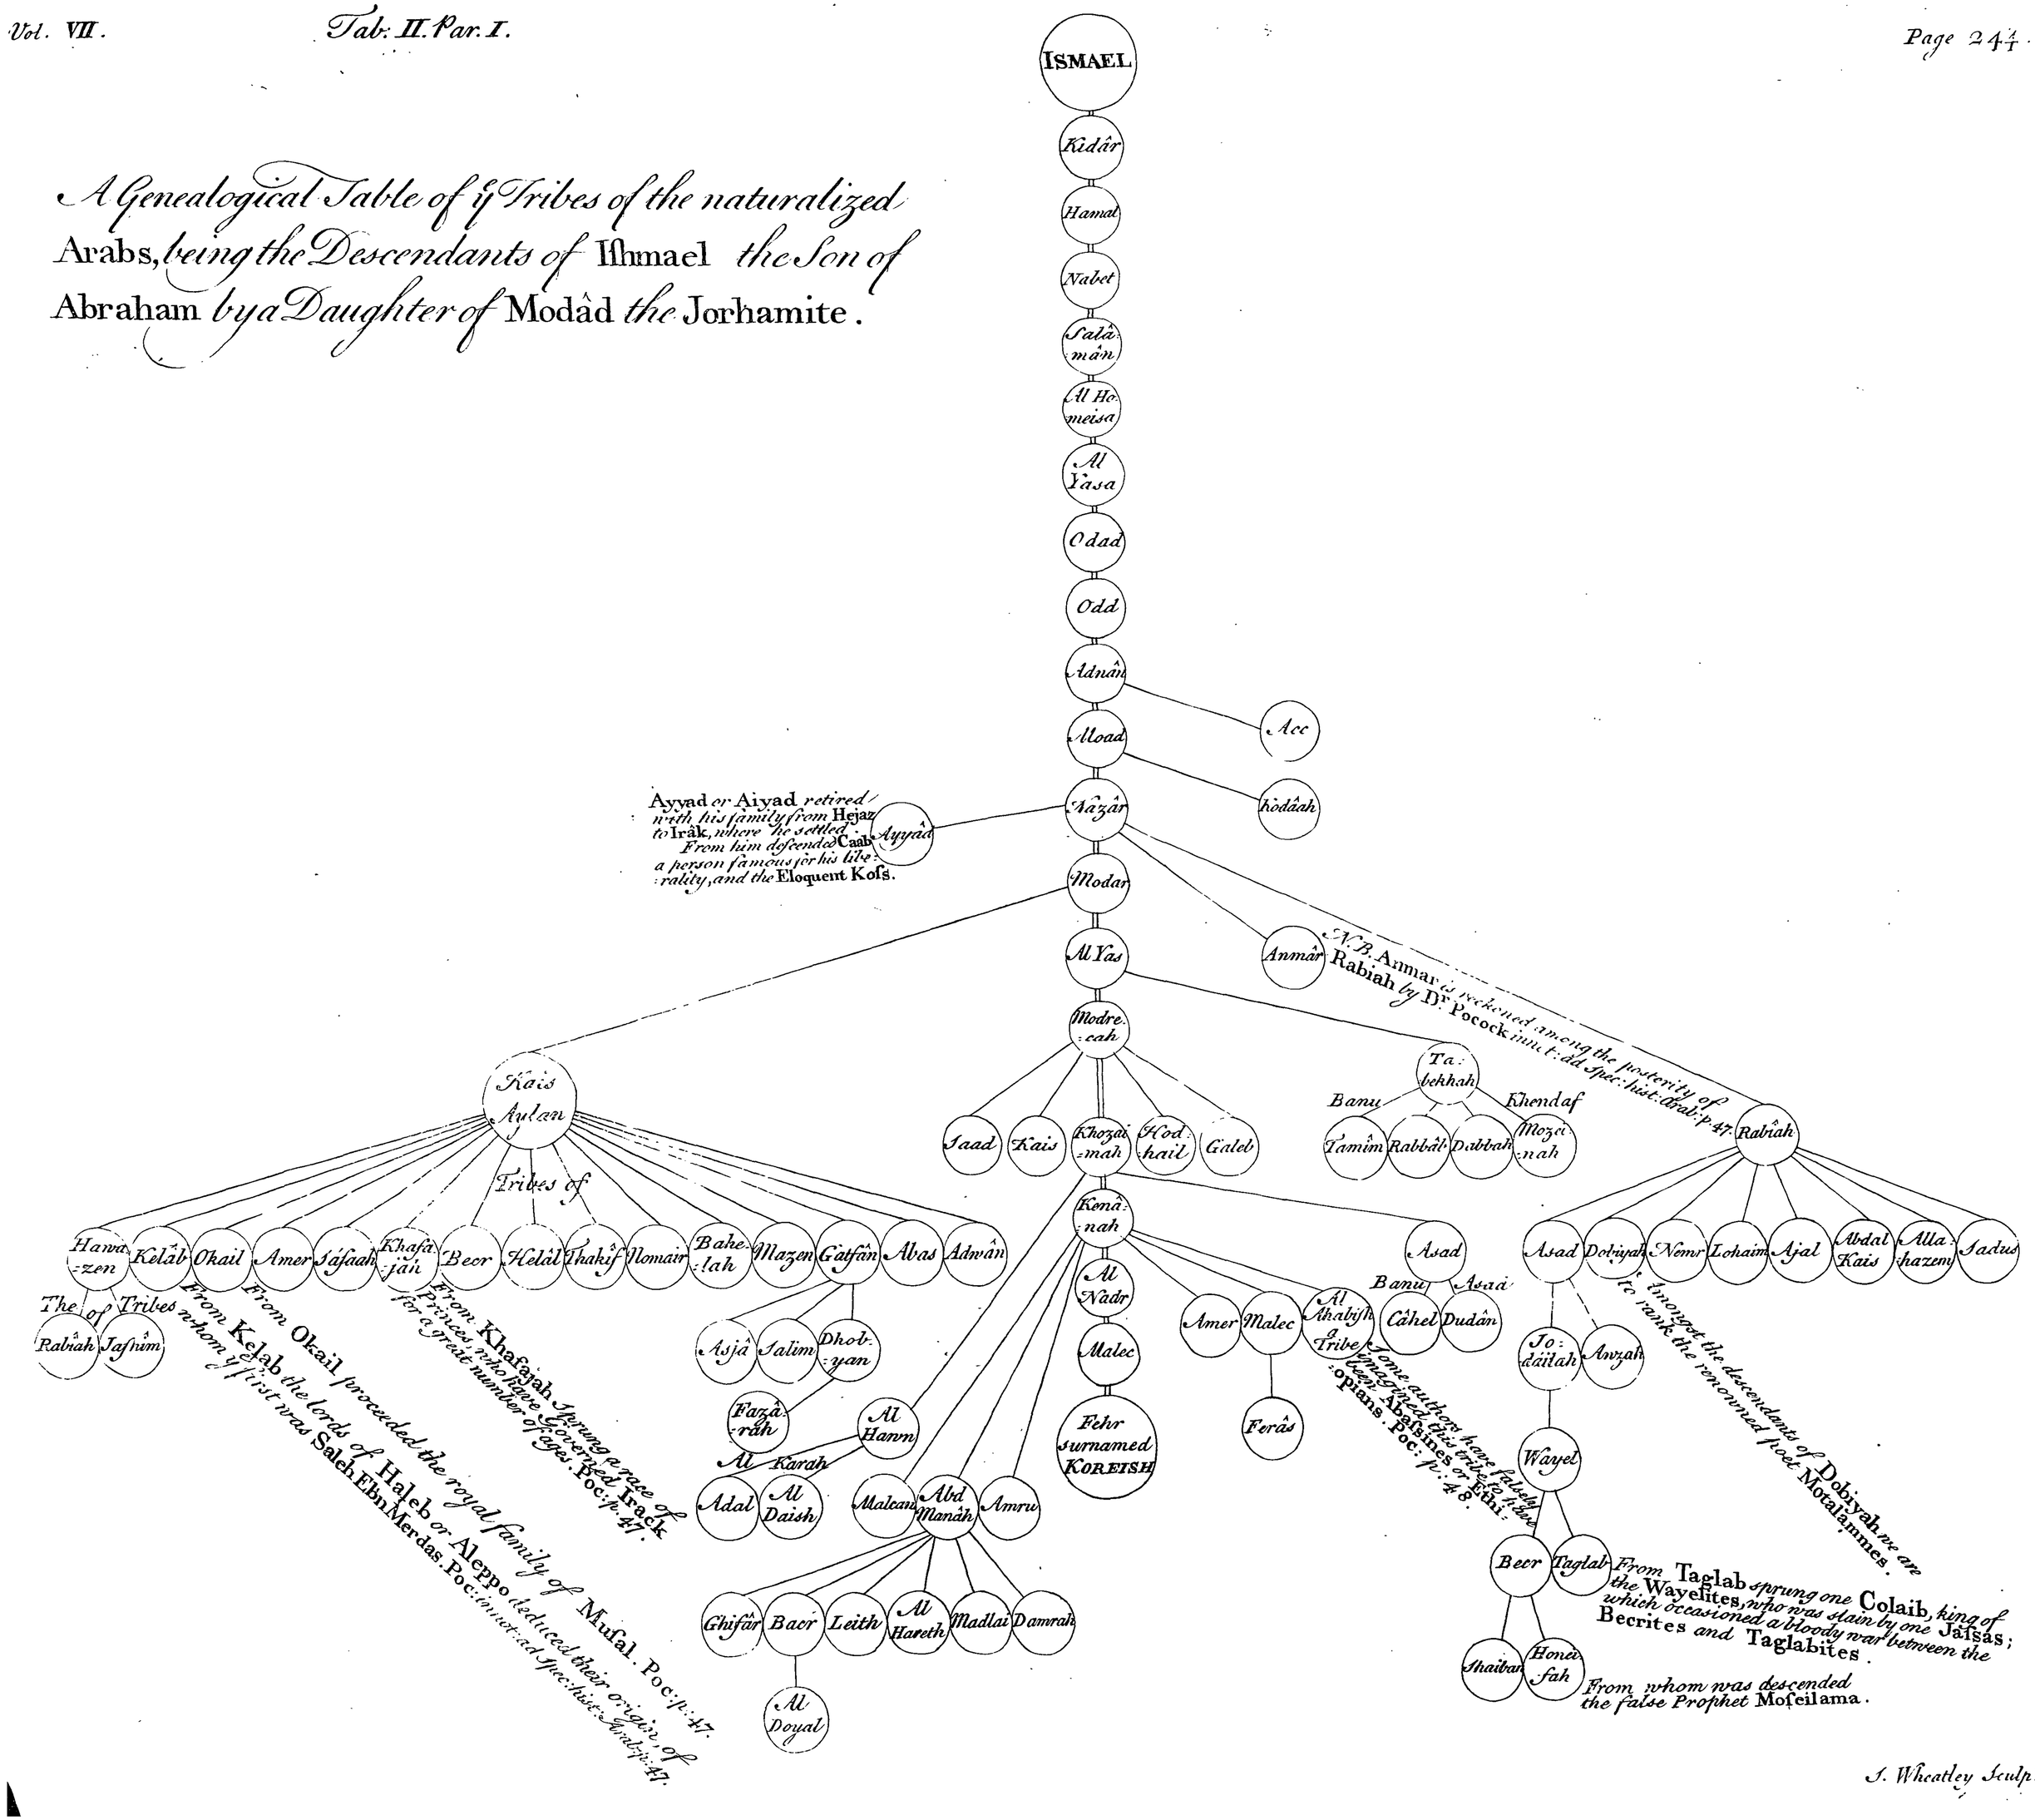
Amalek. SOME of the Oriental authors inform us, that Amalek, the progenitor of the tribe of the ſame name, was the ſon of Eliphaz the ſon of Eſau, though others make him the ſon of Ham the ſon of Noah. This tribe under their king Walîd, the firſt who aſſumed the name of Pharaoh, before the time of Joſeph, conquered Eygpt, according to the eaſtern writers, who ſeem to confound the Amalekites with the Phœnician ſhepherds of Manetho. After they had poſſeſſed the throne of Egypt for a conſiderable period, they were expelled by the natives, and at laſt totally deſtroyed by the Iſraelites[r].

Amtem, Haſhem, Abil, and Bar. As for the tribes of Amtem, Haſhem, Abil, and Bar, all that the Orientals know of them is, that by ſome means or other they became extinct, moſt of them being cut off, and the reſt incorporating with the other tribes[s].

The preſent Arabs deſcended from Kahtan and Adnan. ACCORDING to their own hiſtorians, the preſent Arabs are ſprung from two ſtocks, Kahtân, the ſame with Joktan the ſon of Eber, and Adnân deſcended in a direct line from Iſhmael the ſon of Abraham and Hagar (O). The poſterity of

[p] Poc. ubi ſup. p. 37, 38, 60. Abulfed. Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 95. Univ. hiſt. vol. xviii. p. 210. [q] Abulfed. Poc. ubi ſup. Ebn Shonah. [r] Gen. c. xxxvi. ver. 12. D'Herbel. p. 110. Ebn Shonah. Num. c. xxiv. ver. 20. Mirat Caïnat. Joſeph. cont. Apion. l. i. Exod. c. xvii. ver. 18, &c. 1 Sam. c. xv. ver. 2, &c. & c. xxvii. ver. 8, 9. 1 Chron. c. iv. ver. 43. [s] Jallalo'ddin. apud Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 39. ut & ipſe Pocock. ibid.

(O) As the genealogy of theſe tribes is of great uſe to illuſtrate the Arabian hiſtory, our readers would have judged this work incomplete, had we not here inſerted the two genealogical tables of the deſcendents of Kahtan and Iſhmael, formed by the late learned and ingenious Mr. Sale from the moſt approved Oriental authors. In order to render that of the deſcendents of



Iſhmael

of the former they call al Arab al Ariba, i. e. the genuine or pure Arabs, and thoſe of the latter al Arab al Moſtáreba, i. e. naturalized or inſititious Arabs, though ſome reckon the antient loſt tribes to have been the only pure Arabians, and therefore call the deſcendents of Kahtan alſo Mótareba, which word likewiſe ſignifies inſititious Arabs, though in a nearer degree than Moſtáreba; thoſe acknowledging Adnân for their great anceſtor, being the more diſtant graff. As Iſhmael was by origin and language a Hebrew, it is no wonder thoſe ſuppoſed to be deſcended from him ſhould have no claim to be admitted as pure Arabs; however, ſince he contracted an alliance with the Jorhamites, by marrying a daughter of Modâd, accuſtomed himſelf to their manner of living and language, and became blended with them into one nation, they have certainly a right to be conſidered as Moſtáreba. The uncertainty of the deſcents between Iſhmael and Adnân is the reaſon why they ſeldom trace their genealogies higher than the latter, whom they therefore look upon as the father of their tribes; the deſcents from him downwards being pretty certain and uncontroverted. It is remarkable, that the eaſtern writers ſcarce take any notice at all of Abraham's progeny by Keturah, though they undoubtedly made up a conſiderable part of the inhabitants of Arabia. Their names were, Zimran, Jokſhan, Medan, Midian or Madian, Iſbak, and Shuah. Notwithſtanding the Arabs affirm Iſhmael's wife to have been a genuine Arabian, the Scripture ſays ſhe was an Egyptian; which greatly ſhakes the authority of their hiſtorians, Iſhmael the more perfect, we have added thereto the nine generations between Iſhmael and Adnân, which is the moſt approved ſeries of deſcents between them; though this, as here obſerved, cannot be abſolutely depended upon; for Al Beihaki reckons one generation leſs, differing alſo in the names, in the following manner: Iſhmael, Nabet, Yaſhab, Yárab, Yârah, Yâhur, al Mokawwam, Odad, Odd, Adnân, and Mohammed himſelf, according to a tradition of his wife Omm Salma, counted but three perſons between Iſhmael and Adnân, viz. Berâ, Zeid, and Odad. With the tables here exhibited, we have intermixed ſome few additional obſervations, that may tend either to illuſtrate or correct them, as our readers will find, by comparing them with the originals in Mr. Sale's excellent preliminary diſcourſe. We muſt not forget to remark, that in the firſt ſeries of deſcents between Iſhmael and Adnân Mr. Sale has omitted Odd, which makes him run counter to the beſt Oriental writers, and therefore in that particular we have diſſented from him.

A Genealogical Table of ye Tribes o
Arabs [illegible] to

A Genealogical Table of ij Tribes of the naturalized Arabs, being the Descendants of Ishmael the Son of Abraham by a Daughter of Modâd the Jorhamite.

J. Wheatley Sculpt.

Page 244.

rians, except it ſhould be admitted, that he had a ſecond wife, or ſeveral at once. His ſons were Nebaioth, Kedar, Adeel, Mibſam, Miſhma, Dumah, Maſſa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphiſh, and Kedemah ; beſides which he had a daughter called Mahalath and Baſhemath, whom Edom took to wife. Some writers make Kahtân a deſcendent of Iſhmael ; but among the Orientals this is not the moſt received opinion. However, it agrees the beſt with the Chaldee and Arabic paraphraſts, who believed the name of Iſhmaelites to be as general and extenſive as that of Arabs[t].

Govrenment of the Scenite Arabs.

We have already obſerved, that the cuſtoms, manners, and genius, of the Arabs, except in matters of religion, are in effect the ſame at this day that they were betwixt three and four thouſand years ago ; and therefore we may preſume, that the antient and modern forms of government of this nation may be conſidered as agreeing in almoſt all particulars. The Arabes Scenitæ, therefore, as their ſucceſſors the preſent Bedoweens, were governed by Shekhs and Emirs. The Shekhs ſuperintended only particular Dou-wars, that is, collections of tents called Hhymas, anſwering to villages or towns, already deſcribed. Every one of theſe Dow-wars, therefore, might have been looked upon as a little principality, governed by the chief of that particular family, which was of the greateſt name, ſubſtance, and reputation, amongſt the Arabs that compoſed it. The Emirs or Emeers, the Phylarchs of the Greeks, ruled over a whole tribe, and conſequently their authority extended to many of the abovementioned Dow-wars. It is probable, that they were ſometimes dignified with the title of (P) Shekh al Kibeer, as ſome of their ſucceſſors are at this day. And laſtly, from what has been obſerved of the Phylarchs of the Nomades, agreeing [t] Gen. c. xxi. ver. 21. c. xxv. ver. 1, &c. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Al-Jauhar. Al-Firauzabadius, Abulfed. Shahaboddin. Ahmed Ebn Yahya, &c. Vide etiam Pocock. ubi ſup. 49--52.

(P) Shekh or Sheikh شيخ according to Golius, is equivalent to the Latin ſenex, ſenior, doctor; or auctoritate, principatu, pietate & arte conſpicuus. Emir or Emeer أمير according to the ſame author, is to be deduced from the verb أمر mandavit, juſſit, præcepit, &c. (15).

(15) Gol in vocib.

ing in moſt points with the Arabes Scenitæ, we may conclude, that the Emirs were under the domination of one particular prince, who was the ſovereign of theſe Arabs, or at leaſt diſtinguiſhed from the other Emirs by the title of the Grand Emir, conſonant to the form of government ſtill prevailing amongſt the modern Bedoweens. However, we take this prince not to have been entirely deſpotic, but conſidered by his ſubjects only as their ſupreme magiſtrate, who maintained them in the poſſeſſion of their private laws, privileges, and cuſtoms[t].

Of thoſe that dwelt in cities and towns.

THE Arabs that dwelt in cities and towns were undoubtedly ruled in the ſame manner as the Bedoweens. That many cities of Arabia Felix, particularly thoſe of the Adramitæ or Chatramotitæ, were governed by princes of their own, we learn from Eratoſthenes in Strabo. That author likewiſe informs us, that the order of ſucceſſion in theſe cities was not hereditary, but that the firſt child born in any of the noble families after the king's acceſſion was deemed the preſumptive heir to the crown. As ſoon, therefore, as any prince aſcended the throne, a liſt was taken of all the pregnant ladies of quality, who were guarded in a proper manner, till one of them was delivered of a ſon, who always received an education ſuitable to his high birth. However, Artemidorus in the ſame author intimates, that the Sabæan nation had only one ſovereign; which manifeſtly implies, that all the little princes or Emirs above-mentioned had a ſupreme head preſiding over the whole region. And that regal government prevailed here as deſcribed by Artemidorus and Eratoſthenes, ſeems confirmed by Scripture, when the Pſalmiſt mentions the KINGS OF ARABIA and SABA. The Arabians were for ſome centuries under the government of the deſcendents of Kâhtan; Yárab, one of his ſons, founding the kingdom of Yaman, and Jorham, another of them, that of Hejâz. The kings of Hamyar, who poſſeſſed the kingdom of Yaman, or at leaſt the beſt part of it, had the general title of Tobba, which ſignifies ſucceſſor, and was affected by theſe princes as that of Cæſar was by the Roman emperors, and Khalîf by the ſucceſſors of Mohammed. There were ſeveral leſſer princes, who reigned in other parts of Yaman, and were were moſtly, if not altogether, ſubject to the king of Hamyar, whom they called the great king; but of theſe hiſtory has recorded nothing remarkable, or that may be depended upon. "May you avert all malediction," or "May GOD be propitious to you," was the form in which the antient Arabs uſed to addreſs themſelves to their king [u].

[t] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xvii. book 4. chap. 1. ſect. 2. not. (B). Shaw ubi ſup. p. 286, 287, 288, 300, 310. Univ. hiſt. vol. xvii. ibid. & Vol. 18. p. 25. Appian. in Libyc. 67. Les mœurs & les coûtumes des Arabes, p. 115, 116, à Paris, 1717.

Laws of the Arabs.

THE principal civil inſtitutions among the Arabs, that ſeemed to wear the face of laws, were the following: 1. That eſtabliſhing the above-mentioned order of ſucceſſion. 2. That in force among the Sabæans, whereby the king was ſolemnly inveſted with his prerogative by an aſſembly of the people. 3. That enjoining the ſaid king never to go out of his palace after he had taken upon him the reins of government. 4. That commanding his ſubjects to ſtone him to death, in caſe he ſhould be found guilty of a violation of the former law. 5. That obliging them to an abſolute and implicit obedience to all his commands, conſiſtent with the aforeſaid fundamental condition. As the other political maxims the Arabs obſerved may be conſidered as coinciding with their cuſtoms, there is no neceſſity of touching upon them here [w].

Religion.

THE religion of the Arabs before Mohammed, which they call the "ſtate of ignorance," was chiefly groſs idolatry; the Sabian religion having almoſt over-run the whole nation, though there were alſo great numbers of Chriſtians, Jews, and Magians, amongſt them. The idolatry of the Arabs, as Sabians, chiefly conſiſted in worſhipping the fixed ſtars and planets, and the angels and their images, which they honoured as inferior deities, and whoſe interceſſion they begged, as their mediators with GOD. For they acknowledged one ſupreme GOD, the creator and lord of the univerſe, whom they called Allah Taâla, "the moſt high "GOD;" and their other deities, who were ſubordinate to him, they called ſimply Al Ilahât, i. e. the goddeſſes. "Theſe words," ſays Mr. Sale," the Greeks not under-"ſtanding, and it being their conſtant cuſtom to reſolve "the religion of every other nation into their own, and "find [u] Eratoſthenes & Artemidorus apud Strabon. l. xvi. LXX. in Pſal. lxxii. ver. x. Al-Motarezzi in lib. Mogreb. Al-Jauharius, Abulfeda, Ebn al Athir, & Al-Firauzabadius apud Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 65, 66, ut & ipſe Pocock. ibid. [w] Agatharchides Cnidius de mar. rubr. l. v. c. 50. apud Photium, p. 1374. Eratoſthenes apud Strabon. ubi ſup. ut & ipſe Strab. ibid.

" find out gods of their's to match the others, they pre-
" tended the Arabs worshipped only two deities, Orotalt
" and Alilat, as those names are corruptly written, whom they " will have to be the same with Bacchus and Urania; pitch" ing on the former as one of the greatest of their own gods,
" and educated in Arabia; and on the other, because of
" the veneration shewn by the Arabs to the stars." But the impertinence of this observation will be touched upon immediately [x].

Most of the Arabs Sabians.

That the Arabs should easily be led into the worship of the stars, is not at all surprising, since by observing the changes of the weather to happen at the rising or setting of certain of them for a considerable period, they might easily be induced to ascribe a divine power to those stars, and think themselves indebted to them for their rains, a very great benefit and refreshment to their parched country. Hence possibly it came to pass, that they had seven celebrated temples dedicated to the seven planets; one of these, in particular, called Beit Ghomdân, was built in Sanaa, the metropolis of Yaman, by Dahac, to the honour of Al Zoharah, or the planet Venus, and was demolished by the khalîf Othman. By the murder of this khalîf was fulfilled, as the Mohammedans pretend, the prophetical inscription, set, as is reported, over this temple, viz. Ghomdân, " He " who destroyeth thee, shall be slain." The temple of Mecca is also said to have been consecrated to Zohal, or Saturn. That planetary worship was the first species of idolatry, we have already observed; and therefore it is no wonder the Arabs, at present the most antient nation in the world, should have been infected with it. To what has been already offered on this head, we shall here beg leave to add the testimony of Pausanias, who intimates, that the worship of the planets was earlier than the first arrival of the Pelasgi in Greece; and that before this time they had statues erected in their honour. This observation will [x] Poc. not. ad specim. hist. Arab. p. 138. Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 251. Maimonid. in moreh nevochim, par. iii. c. 29. Hottingeri hist. Orient. l. iv. c. 8. Hyde hist. rel. vet. Pers. pass. Prideaux in connect. p. 1. b. 3. Herodot. l. iii. c. 8. Arrian. p. 161, 162. Strab. l. xvi. Greg. Abulpharag. hist. dynast. p. 281, &c. Al-Shaherstanius apud Pocockium, ubi supra, p. 108. ut & ipse Pocockius ibid. Sale's prelim. disc. p. 15, 16.

The Tribe of Koreish

Fehr surnamed KOREISH

Hareth — Banu — Kholoj

Galeb — Lowa

Mohârel — Tayem al Adram — Banu Mohareb or Sheiban

Amer — Amru — Abd Wadd

Saad

Kho-zaimah

Al Hareth — Caab — Asâmah — Josham — Anf — Amru

Hosais — Of this Family was Omeyya Ebn Khalf — Jemah — Jahm

Morrah — Kelâb — Of this Family was Amru Ebn Al As — Zahrah — Kosa

Ada — Of whose Posterity was Omar Ebn al Khattab.

Tayem — Of this Family was Abu Becr.

Yokdhah — Makhzûm — Of this Family were Khaled Ebn al Walid and Abu Jahl.

Abd Menaf — Waheb — Mother to Mohammed — Aminah

Abdol Dâr — Shibah

Abd Menaf — Hâshem — Hashem first sent a caravan yearly in the Summer to Sham, & another in y Winter to Yaman. — Abd al Motalleb Abdal Uzza — From Him was descended Khadijah Mohammed's first wife.

Abd Shams — Omeyya — From whom were descended Abu Sofiân, Ebn Hârb and Othmân Ebn Affân.

Al Motallib — Nawfal

Abu Tâleb — Ali

Al Abbâs — Hamzah — Al Hareth — Abu Laheb — Al Ghidâk — Abdollah — Jehel — Al Mokawwam — Al Zobeir — Ketham — Derâr — Abdal Caaba

MOHAMMED

Ahmed Ebn Yuself, Al Jauhar. Al Firauzabadius, Ismael Abulfeda, Shahaboddin. Ahmed Ebn Yahia, &c. Vide etiam Cl. Pocockium, in Not. ad Spec. hist. Arab. p. 40. — 52. & Sale Ubi Sup. p. 8, 9.

I. Wheatley sculp.

Tab. II.

Koreish

will not only illuſtrate, but likewiſe bring a freſh acceſſion of ſtrength to what has been advanced in a former note [y].

Worſhip the fixed ſtars, as well as the planets.

BUT beſides thoſe ſtars which were the general objects of worſhip throughout Arabia, there were ſome more peculiarly reverenced in particular provinces. Thus the Hamyarites chiefly worſhipped the Sun; Miſam, al Debarân, or "the bull's eye;" Lakhm and Jodâm, al Moſhtari, or Jupiter; Tay, Sohail, or Canopus; Kais, Sirius, or "the dog-ſtar;" and Aſad, Otâred, or Mercury. Abu Cabſha, a worſhipper of Sirius, whom ſome will have to be the ſame with Waheb, Mohammed's grandfather on the mother's ſide, though others make him of the tribe of Khozâah, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the Koreiſh to leave their images, and worſhip this ſtar. For which reaſon, when Mohammed endeavoured alſo to draw them off from image-worſhip, they nicknamed him the ſon of Abu Cabſha. However, the Arabs, together with the Indians in general, paid a greater regard to the fixed ſtars, than to the planets; which diſtinguiſhed the Sabians amongſt them from thoſe amongſt the Greeks, who directed their worſhip to the planets. The Arabs did not only attribute their rains to the influence of the fixed ſtars, but likewiſe their winds, ſtorms, tempeſts, heat, cold, and all kinds of alterations in their atmoſphere. They differed, however, amongſt themſelves in this, that ſome aſcribed the influence producing all the meteorological phænomena to the riſing, and others to the ſetting, of the conſtellations known amongſt them by the name of Al-Anwa [z].

As likewiſe angels, or intelligences.

Of the angels or intelligences which they worſhipped, we find only three mentioned in the Korân, viz. Allat, Al-Uzza, and Manah; theſe they called "goddeſſes," and "the daughters of GOD;" an appellation they gave not only to angels, but alſo to their images, which they believed either to be inſpired with life by GOD, or elſe to become the tabernacles of the angels, and to be animated by them; and they paid them divine honours, becauſe they believed them them to intercede for their votaries with God. The Arab Sabians likewise, in common with those of other nations, imagined, that the Sun, Moon, and fixed stars, were habitations of intelligences of a middle nature betwixt men and the Supreme Being, who actuated their orbs in the same manner as the human body does the soul; and that this was the true cause of all their motions. These beings, they had a notion, became mediators between God and them; for the necessity of a mediator they clearly discovered from the beginning, and therefore, as God's mediators, directed divine worship to them. They first worshipped them by their tabernacles, i. e. their orbs themselves; but these, by their rising and setting, being as much under the horizon as above, they were at a loss how to address themselves to them in their absence. To remedy this defect, they had recourse to the invention of images, in which, after their consecration, they thought these inferior deities to be as much present by their influence, as in the stars themselves; and that all addresses to them were rendered as effectual before the one, as before the other. And this may be considered as the origin of image-worship. All other material particulars relating to the Sabians, omitted here, will either be found in note (Q), or the forth volume of this history [a].

[y] Poc. ubi ſupra, p. 163. Al-Jannabi. Shahreſtani. Pauſan. Laconic. p. 202. Univ. hiſt. vol. xvi. p. 614. not. (R).
[z] Abulpharag. ubi ſupra. p. 160. Al Shahreſtani. Abulfed. Al Jauharius, Ebn'ol Athir, & Al-Firauzabadius apud Pocockium, ubi ſupra, p. 163, 164. ut & ipſe Pocock. p. 130, 132.

Allat,

[a] Al-Kor. Mohammed. c. liii. Poc. p. 138. Gol. Maimonid. Hotting. Hyde, Prideaux, ubi supra, Shahrestanius apud Hyde, c. v. p. 124. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. p. 726. Housaïn Vaez comment Pers. in Al-Koran, c. 2. Lib. Phar. Gj. apud Hyd. ubi supra. Kalkashend. apud Hyde, ubi supra, p. 125. Ebn al Athir apud Pocockium, p. 138, 139.

(Q) The Sabian, Jewish, and Christian religions, are the only religions tolerated by the Korân. We are told, that the eastern writers vary greatly in their notions of the religious tenets of the first sect; though those here mentioned seem to be attested by the best of them. The Sabians produce many strong arguments for the unity of God, and address themselves to Him in the following terms: "I dedicate my self to thy service, O "God! I dedicate myself to thy service, O God! Thou hast "no companion, except thy companion, of whom thou art "absolute master, and of whatever is his." From whence it appears, that they suppose idols not to be sui juris, though they offer sacrifices and other offerings to them, as well as to God, ALLAT, whom ſome of the Arabs called Allah, was the idol of the tribe of Thakîf, who dwelt at Tayef, and had a Allat.

 temple

GOD, "who was alſo formerly often put off with the leaſt por-"tion," as Mohammed upbraids them. The reaſon aſſigned by them for this was, that "the idol wanted what was GOD's, but "GOD HIMSELF wanted nothing." A ſort of baptiſts they admit, and profeſs a great veneration for St. John Baptiſt, ſtyling themſelves, in their language, which is compoſed of the Chaldee and Syriac, Mendai Jahia, i. e. "Diſciples of St. John;" and by this name they go amongſt the chriſtians of the Levant. Beſides the book of Pſalms, the only true Scripture they read, they have another ſuppoſed to have been wrote by Adam, which they regard as their bibles, whoſe language almoſt entirely agrees with the Chaldee, but the characters differ from thoſe of all other nations. Ebn Shonah makes them the deſcendents of the moſt antient people in the world, and intimates, that beſides the books juſt mentioned, they have others eſteemed equally ſacred, particularly one full of moral diſcourſes, denominated by them the book of Seth and Enoch, or, as they name him, Edris. They are obliged to pray three, or, according to others, ſeven times a day; the firſt half an hour, or leſs, before ſun-riſe, ordering it ſo that they may, juſt as the ſun riſes, finiſh eight adorations, each containing three proſtrations: the ſecond prayer they end at noon, when the ſun begins to decline, in ſaying of which they perform five ſuch adorations as the former: and the ſame they do the third time, concluding juſt as the ſun ſets. They are very fervent in their devotions. They faſt three times a year, the firſt time thirty days, the next nine, and the laſt ſeven. They offer many ſacrifices, but eat no part of them, burning them all. They abſtain from beans, garlick, and ſome other pulſe and vegetables. As to the Sabian Kebla, or part to which they turn their faces in praying, authors greatly differ; one affirming it to be the north, another the ſouth, a third Mecca, and a fourth the ſtar to which they pay their devotions. They have a great reſpect for the temple of Mecca, as alſo the pyramids, in the third of which they believe Sabi, the author of their religion, lies buried. They go on pilgrimage to Harran, either out of regard to the memory of Abraham, or of Sabi Ebn Mari, who lived in Abraham's time, and is looked upon by ſome as the firſt propagator of their religion. Ebn Hazem aſſerts Sabianiſm to have been the univerſal religion till the age of Abraham, from whence all the ſucceeding ſects were derived. According to Al-Shareſtani, the Sabians ſay, that the difference betwixt them and the Mohammedans conſiſts in this, that among creatures they give the preference to ſpirits, angels, or temple consecrated to her in a place called Nakhlah. We shall intelligences moving the celestial orbs; whereas the Mohammedans chuse to pay the greatest honour to body and matter, i. e. "men;" as prophets, patriarchs, &c. Houssain Vaez, in his Persic commentary on the Koran, says, that they were a sort of Sadducees, not believing a future state. We must not omit observing, that at the pyramids they sacrificed a cock and a black calf, and offered up incense. Ebn Khalecan, in his life of Ibrahim al Sabi, affirms, that the Sabians are as antient as the Magians, but different from them; however, that both of them pretended to deduce their origin from Abraham, whom they confounded with Zerdusht. The same author relates, that the word Sabi in the Arabic tongues denotes one who leaves the religion of his forefathers, and introduces a new one; for which reason the Koreish, by way of reproach, called Mohammed Sabi, or Sabian. The eastern Christians scruple not to affirm, that Constantine the great himself professed Sabianism before he became a convert to Christianity. Shahrestani divides the Sabians into two sects, those that worship the stars, and those that worship images. The first maintain, that God created the world, but has commanded his servants to pay great regard to the stars, and to turn themselves towards those luminous bodies whenever they pray; the other, that, by the mediation of images, they have access to the stars, and, through the assistance of those intellectual agents informing them, to the Supreme Being. They all believe, that the souls of wicked men will be punished for 9000 ages, but that afterwards they shall be received to mercy. Their feasts in general they have appointed upon the days when the exaltations of the planets happen; but the greatest of them, in particular, upon the day that the sun enters Aries, which, with them, is the first day of the year, when they all wear their best cloaths. They celebrate the feast of every planet in a chapel dedicated to him, and derive their religion from Noah himself. The Sabians of mount Lebanon seem to pay a greater regard to Seth, than the Supreme Being; for they always keep their oath when they swear by the former, but frequently break it when they swear by the latter. They likewise maintain, that once in 36425 years there will be a complete revolution in all mundane things. They endeavour to perfect themselves in the four intellectual virtues; God they call God of gods, and Lord of lords; but those intelligences supposed to actuate the stars gods and lords. This sect say, they took the name of Sabians from the above-mentioned Sabi, though it seems rather to be derived from צבא Saba, or Tsaba, the host of heaven, which they worship. Before the growth

intelligences

ſhall ſee more of this deity hereafter, when we come to the modern hiſtory of Arabia, eſpecially that of it which relates to the tranſactions wherein Mohammed was more immediately concerned [b].

AL-UZZA, or Al-Ozza, was the idol of the tribes of Koreiſh and Kenanah, and part of the tribe of Salim, as ſome affirm; but a tree called the Egyptian thorn, or Acacia, worſhipped by the tribe of Ghatſan, firſt conſecrated by one Dhâlem, who built a chapel over it named Boſs, ſo contrived, as to give a ſound when any one entered, according to others. When Khâled Ebn Walîd, by Mohammed's order, had demoliſhed the chapel, cut down the image, or tree, and ſlain the prieſteſs of Al Uzza, Mohammed, alluding to the death of the prieſteſs, ſaid, ſhe was Al Uzza, who therefore will never hereafter be worſhipped. The name Uzza is derived from the root azza, and ſignifies "the moſt mighty [c]." Al-Uzza.

MANAH was the object of worſhip of the tribes of Hodhail and Khozâah, poſſibly the Caſſanitæ of Ptolemy, who dwelt between Mecca and Medina, and, as ſome ſay, of the tribes of Aws, Khazraj, and Thakîf alſo. Dr. Pocock renders it highly probable, that the Manah of the Arabs was the Meni of the prophet Iſaiah. This idol was a large ſtone, demoliſhed by one Saad in the eighth year of the Hejra, ſo fatal to the idols of Arabia. The name ſeems derived from mana, to flow, from the flowing of the blood of the victims ſacrificed to the deity; whence the valley of Mina, near Mecca, had alſo its name, where the pilgrims at this day ſlay their ſacrifices. Some take Meni, or Manah, to be the name of a conſtellation, which notion is favoured Manah.

 by

[b] Abulpharag. p. 160. Poc. ubi ſupra, p. 90. [c] Al-Jauhar. Al-Shahreſtan. & Al-Firauzabadius apud Pocock. ibid.

growth of Chriſtianity and Mohammedaniſm, the greateſt part of the world profeſſed the Sabian religion. The other particulars, relating to this ſect, our readers will find, either in a former part of this work, or in the authors here referred to (16).

(16) D'Herbel. Prid. Poc. Gol. Hyd. Hotting. aliique auctor. hic laudat.

by the moſt obvious ſignification of the word Manah in the Arabic tongue [d].

Wadd, Sawâ, Yaghûth, Yäuk, and Naſr.

BESIDES theſe, we find five antediluvian idols taken notice of by the Arabian writers, viz. Wadd, Sawâ, Yaghûth, Yäûk, and Naſr. They are ſaid to have been men of great repute and piety in their time, whoſe ſtatues the Arabs at firſt reverenced with a civil honour only, which in proceſs of time became heightened to a divine worſhip [e].

Wadd.

WADD was ſuppoſed to repreſent the heaven, and was worſhipped under the form of a man by the tribe of Calb, in Dawmat al Jandal. For a further account of him, we muſt refer our readers to the authors here cited [f].

Sawâ.

SAWA was adored under the ſhape of a woman by the tribe of Hamadan, or, as others write, of Hodhail in Rohat. This idol, lying under water for ſome time after the deluge, was at length, as the Arab writers aſſert, diſcovered by the devil, and worſhipped by thoſe of Hodhail, who inſtituted pilgrimages to it [g].

Yaghûth.

YAGUTH was an idol in the ſhape of a lion, and was the deity of the tribe of Madhaj, and others, who dwelt in Yaman. Its name ſeems to be derived from ghatha, which ſignifies to help. [h].

Yäûk.

YAUK the tribe of Morâd eſteemed as their proper object of worſhip, or, according to others, that of Hamadan, under the figure of a horſe. The name Yäûk probably comes from their verb âka, to prevent, or avert [i] (R).

NASR

[d] Al-Jauhar. Al-Beidawi, Al-Shahreſt. Abulfed. Al-Zamakhſharius, & Al-Firauzabadius. Iſai. c. lxv. ver. 11. Vide etiam Poc. ſpec. p. 90, 91, 92. [e] Al-Koran. Mohammed. c. 71. Comment. Perſic. Vide etiam Hyd. de rel. vet. Perſ. p. 133. [f] Al-Jauhar. Al Shahreſtan. [g] Iidem apud Pocock. p. 93. Al-Firauzabadius & Safioddin. ibid. [h] Al-Shahreſtani. ibid. [i] Al-Firauzabadius. Al-Jauhar. Ebn Chalecan in vit. Al-Battanu. Poc. in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 101, 338, 389, 390.

(R) It is ſaid Yäûk was a man of great piety, and his death much regretted; whereupon the devil appeared to his friends in a human form, and, undertaking to repreſent him to the life, perſuaded them, by way of comfort, to place his effigies in their temples, NASR ſeems to have been the proper deity of the tribe of Hamyar, whom we may conſider either as the Homeritæ or Hamiræi of Pliny, or adored at Dhû'l Khalaah in their territories in the image of an eagle, which the name ſignifies[k]. Naſr.

THE four deities Sâkia, Hâfedha, Râzeda and Salema, were peculiar to the tribe of Ad. The firſt ſupplied them with rain, the ſecond preſerved them from all dangers abroad, the third provided food for their ſuſtenance, and the fourth reſtored them to health when afflicted with ſickneſs; according to the ſignification of their ſeveral names. To theſe may be added Al-Daizan, or Saturn, a moſt antient Arab idol, Hhehar, Al-Auf, &c, mentioned by Al-Jauharius, Al-Firauzabadius, and others[l]. Sâkia, Hâfedha, Râzeka, and Salema.

AS image-worſhip in ſome meaſure proceeded from the deification of dead men, who had been the authors of ſome ſignal advantages and benefits to the people they governed, or elſe greatly famed for their conqueſts, as well as the cauſe above-mentioned, it is no wonder the Arabs, as well as other nations, ſhould fall into it. Sir Iſaac Newton takes hero worſhip, or the worſhip of deified men, to have been no older than the age of Seſac, the great Egyptian conqueror ſo often mentioned, who ordered all the nations he conquered, and among the reſt a good part of the Arabians at leaſt, to pay divine honours to his father Ammenenes, or Ammon, under the name of Jupiter, or Jupiter Ammon. This therefore was the great hero-god of the Arabs; as well as of the Egyptians, Garamantes, Ethiopians, Indians, &c. and his ſun and ſucceſſor, Seſac, who enjoined this worſhip, the Bacchus, according to Sir Iſaac Newton, of the antients, little inferior to him. The Arabs, it is probable, ſet up oracles to Ammon, who reduced at leaſt a good part of their country, as well as the Libyans and Egyptians; and Seſac, on account of his having coaſted Arabia Felix, ſailed to the Perſian gulph, penetrated afterwards into India, where he e- Jupiter Ammon and Bacchus worſhipped by the Arabs.

rected temples, that they might have it in view when at their devotions. This was done, and ſeven others of extraordinary merit, had the ſame honours ſhewn them, till at length their poſterity made idols of them in earneſt (17).

[k] Al-Jauhar. Shahreſtan. & Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 93. [l] Abulfed. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. in art. Houd.

(17) Poc. not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 94

rected two pillars on two mountains near the mouth of the Ganges, and another at Dire, a promontory of Ethiopia, was, according to very good authors, eſteemed as his father's colleague in Arabia, as well as the other regions ſubjugated by him. This, conſidering the authorities on which it is founded, is a much ſtronger proof in favour of the Arabs really worſhipping Jupiter and Bacchus, or Ammon and Seſac, than what Mr. Sale has offered, from the ſuppoſed vanity and ignorance of the Greeks, is to evince the Arab worſhip of thoſe deities to be purely imaginary. Nay, we may venture to add, that could he have produced a whole volume of Arab traditions, ſtuffed as they are with fables and abſurdities, in ſupport of his opinion, it would not have mended the matter; eſpecially as he gives up the main point by allowing Bacchus to have been educated in Arabia. For this conceſſion, though the thing granted is falſe, muſt be deemed a ſufficient reaſon, on his part, for the Arabs to have paid divine honours to ſo celebrated a perſonage as Bacchus, as well as his father Jupiter, or Jupiter Uranius [m] (S).

Arabs call their children after the names of their idols.

WE muſt not omit obſerving here, that the antient Arabs, in order to ſhew the high veneration in which they had their idols, reckoned it glorious to be accounted their ſervants and votaries; which they demonſtrated by the names given to their children, viz, Abd Wadd, Abd Yaghûth, Abd Manah, Abdol Uzza, &c. i. e. the ſervant of Wadd, the ſervant of Yaghûth, the ſervant of Manah, the ſervant of Uzzah, &c. [n]

Have a great variety of idols.

BESIDES the idols already mentioned, the Arabs worſhipped many others, the chief of whom was Hobal, brought from Belka in Syria to Arabia by Emra Ebn Lohai, pretending it would procure them rain whenever they wanted it. According to Safioddin, Hobal was placed without the Caaba, under the figure of a man. His ſtatue was made of red agate, which having, by ſome accident, loſt a hand, the Koreiſh repaired it with one of gold: he held in his hand ſeven arrows without heads or feathers, ſuch as the Arabs uſed in divination. This idol is ſuppoſed to have been the ſame with the image

[m] Newt. chronol. paſſ. Herodot. l. iii. Diod. Sic. l. i. Dionyſ. perieg. v. 623. Pocock. not. ad ſpecim. hiſt. Arab. p. 106, 107. Sale's prelim. diſc. p. 15, 16. [n] Al-Koran Mohammed. Poc. ubi ſupra, p. 95.

(S) The Arabs alſo worſhipped Mars, according to Suidas (18).

(18) Suid. in voc. Ἄρης.

image of Abraham, found and deſtroyed by Mohammed in the Caaba, on his entering it, in the eighth year of the Hejra, when he took Mecca, and ſurrounded with a great number of angels and prophets, as inferior deities; among whom, as ſome ſay, was Iſhmael, with divining arrows in his hand, Hobal, according to Al-Jannabius, was the chief of three hundred and ſixty idols, a freſh one of which the Arabs might, if they thought proper, worſhip every day in the year. We are told, that among the idols in the Caaba was a wooden pigeon, as likewiſe another above that ſtructure, to deſtroy which, Mohammed lifted Ali upon his ſhoulders. Aſâf and Nayelah, the former the image of a man, the latter of a woman, were alſo two idols brought with Hobal from Syria, and placed, the one on mount Safâ, and the other on mount Merwa. They tell us, Aſâf was the ſon of Amru, and Nayelah the daughter of Sahâl, both of the tribe of Jorſham, who committing whoredom together in the Caaba, were by GOD converted into ſtone, and afterwards worſhipped by the Koreiſh, and ſo much reverenced by them, that tho' this ſuperſtition was condemned by Mohammed, yet he was forced to allow them to viſit thoſe mountains as monuments of the divine juſtice. We are told, that theſe idols were firſt fixed on the mounts Safâ and Merwa by one Amru in the reign of Sapor or Sabur ſurnamed Dil Ectaf, king of Perſia; but this notion has been overthrown by Abulfeda. As for the idols Saad, an oblong ſtone on the ſhore near Giodda, Soair or Sair worſhipped by the tribe of Anza, Aud adored by the tribe of Becr Wayel, Naſb or Noſb, Al-Sharek, from thence the Arab name Abdol-Sharek was derived, Dar, whence Abdol-Dar, Madan, Yalil, Awal peculiar to the tribes of Becr and Taglab, Dul Caffain the deity of the tribe of Daus, Bajar or Bajer that of the tribe of Azd, Al-Okaiſar worſhipped in the eaſtern part of Syria, Bag or Bagh, from whence Abulfeda deduces the name of the city Baghdad, Al-Chalaſah, Duſhſhara, the Dyſares of the Greeks and Romans, &c. it is ſufficient juſt to have mentioned them. Beſides theſe, according to the Oriental authors, every houſekeeper had his houſhold god, which he laſt took leave of, and firſt ſaluted, at his going abroad, and returning home [o].

SEVERAL

[o] Abulfed. Al-Shahreſtan. Safioddin. & auct. lib. Moſtatraf. Vid. etiam Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 95, 97, 98. Ebn al Athir. Al-Jannabius. Al-Koran. Mohammed. c. ii. Mohammed. Al-Firauzabardius apud Pocock. p. 97. Al-Jauhar. Suid. in voc. Δυσαρης. Poc. p. 98---106.

Some of these idols stones.

SEVERAL of the Arab idols, besides Saad above-mentioned, and Manah in particular, were no more than large rude stones, the worship of which the posterity of Ishmael first introduced, according to Al-Jannabius. To us it seems most probable, that these great stones were the first public places of divine worship among the Arabs, on which they poured wine and oil, as Jacob did upon the stones that served him for a pillow, when he saw the vision. Afterwards they might worship these stones themselves, as the Phœnicians, in all probability, did; but this has already been touched upon. Some authors relate, that when the territory of Mecca grew too streight for the Ishmaelites, so that great numbers found themselves obliged to look out for new habitations, those that departed from Mecca took with them some of the stones of that reputed holy land; and at first only compassed them out of devotion, as they had accustomed to do the Caaba. But this at last ended in rank idolatry, the said Ishmaelites forgetting the religion, left them by their father, so far, as to pay divine honours to any fine stone they met with. To the idols already mentioned we may add another peculiar to the tribe of Hanîfa, which was nothing more than a lump of dough. This they never presumed to eat, till they were compelled to it by famine [p].

Magian religion in Arabia.

THE Persians, by their vicinity to, and frequent intercourse with, the Arabians, introduced the Magian religion among some of their tribes, particularly that of Tamim, a long time before Mohammed, who was so far from being unacquainted with it, that from it he borrowed many of his own institutions. The professors of this religion acknowledged the world to have been created by GOD, as their successors do at this day: but, being at a loss otherwise to account for the origin of evil, they held two principles, a good Dæmon or GOD, and an evil one. The first they supposed the author of all good, and the other of all evil, believing them to be represented by light and darkness, as their truest symbols, and that of the composition of these two all things in the world are made. The good principle or GOD they named Yezad or Yezdân, and Ormozd or Hormizda, which the Greeks wrote Oromazes; and the evil Dæmon they called Ahârîman or Ahrîman, and the Greeks Arimanius, us. Though one ſect of the Magi aſſerted, as the Manichæans and other heretics did, both thoſe principles to have exiſted from all eternity, yet they were reputed heterodox; the original doctrine being, that the good principle or GOD only was eternal, and the other created, as appears from Zoroaſtres's deſcription of the ſupreme BEING. Amongſt other tenets they maintained, that there were good and bad angels; the former guarding and protecting men from evil, and the latter inſtigating them to all kinds of wickedneſs. They alſo believed, that the wicked angels, after they had drawn men out of the paths of virtue, became the inſtruments of their puniſhment; and that theſe angels were continually meditating the ruin and deſtruction of mankind. As for Zoroaſtres, or Zerduſht, as the Perſians called him, he made no alterations in the doctrinal and fundamental points of the Magian religion, but only aboliſhed ſome ſuperſtitious rites and practices, that had crept in amongſt the profeſſors of it, who, according to Dr. Hyde, conſtantly adhered to the worſhip of the true GOD, as they received it from their great anceſtors Shem and Elam. But, as ſo ample an account has already been given of the Magi, and their ſyſtem of religion, we ſhall expatiate no farther on this head; but conclude it with obſerving, that whether we conſider the Arabs as Sabians or followers of Zerduſht, it muſt be allowed, that they held the exiſtence of Dæmons, Genii, or middle intelligences, influencing the affairs of the world: a truth indeed near as extenſive as the belief of a GOD, and acknowledged by the antient heathen of almoſt all denominations [q].

[p] Al Jauhar. Al-Beidawi, & Al-Zamakhsharius. Univers. hist. vol. xvi. p. 635. Al-Mostatraf. Al-Jauharius apud Pocock. p. 110.

The notions ſome of the Arabs had of a future ſtate.

HOWEVER, ſome of the pagan Arabs believed neither a creation paſt, nor a reſurrection to come, attributing the origin of things to nature, and their diſſolution to age. Others allowed both; among whom were thoſe, who, when they died, had their camel tied by their ſepulchre, and ſo left without meat or drink to periſh, and accompany them to the other world, leſt they ſhould be obliged, at the reſurrection, to go on foot, which was reckoned very ſcandalous. Some believed a metempſychoſis, and that of the blood, near the dead dead perſon's brain, was formed a bird named Hâmah, which once in an hundred years viſited the ſepulchre; though others ſay, this bird is animated by the ſoul of him that is unjuſtly ſlain, and continually cries Oſcûni, Oſcûni, i. e. Give me to drink, meaning of the murderer's blood, till his death be revenged; and then it flies away. Some of the antient Arabs ſeem to have been addicted to augury, ſince they held an owl in great abhorrence, as imagining that it always brought ill news, and portended ſomething bad. The camel above-mentioned furniſhed the Arabs with a proverb, which they applied to all people doomed to a miſerable end. Thoſe, who expected a future judgment, adored idols, as they pretended, that they might be hereby induced to intercede for them with God hereafter. It appears probable from ſome paſſages of the Korân, and the commentators on thoſe paſſages, that the antient Arabs under the word Jin or Genii, comprehended both angels, good as well as bad, and that intermediate ſpecies of rational inviſible beings going amongſt the preſent Orientals by the ſame name. From the ſame paſſages and commentators we may likewiſe infer, that moſt of the Arabians before Mohammed's time, in conformity to the Sabian ſcheme, paid religious honours to theſe Genii. The Mohammedans call the evil principle of the Magi, the Satan of the Scripture, and Sammaël of the Jews, Eblis, which ſeems to be a corruption of the Διάβολος or Diabolus of the New Teſtament [r].

[q] Al Moſtatraf. Lord's account of the religion of the Perſees, p. 5. Diog. Laert. in proœm. p. 6. Plut. de Iſid. & in Dio. Lib. Sad-der apud. Hyd. hiſt. rel. vet. Perſ. paſſ. Damaſcus, Plutarch. & Shahreſtani. apud Hyd. ubi ſup. c. 22. Prideaux in connect. p. i. v. 3. Univerſ. hiſt. vol. i. p. 131, 180. & ſeq. & vol. v. p. 34, & ſeq. & alib. Vid. etiam Pocockium in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 146---150.

The Jewiſh religion embraced by ſome of the Arab tribes.

- Abu Carb Asad king of Yaman, about ſeven hundred years before Mohammed, is ſaid to have introduced Judaiſm among the idolatrous Hamyarites. The Jews likewiſe, who fled in great numbers into Arabia after the deſtruction of their country by the Romans, made proſelytes of ſeveral tribes, thoſe of Kenânah, al Hareth Ebn Caaba, and Kendah in particular. In time, therefore, they became very powerful, and poſſeſſed themſelves of ſeveral towns and fortreſſes. At laſt one Yuſef, ſurnamed Dhu Nowâs, king of Yaman, having raiſed a terrible perſecution againſt all who would not turn Jews, putting them to death by various tortures, the moſt common of which was throwing them into a glowing pit of fire, from whence the Arabs gave him the opprobrious title of the lord of the pit, Caleb or Eleſbaan king of Ethiopia, to revenge the maſſacre of the chriſtians at Najrân, put an end to

[r] Al-Shareſtani. Al-Jauhari. Ebn al Athir. Al-Damirius. Vide etiam Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 134---136. Al-Koran. Mohammed. c. 6, 7, 72, & alib.

to Judaiſm, and the kingdom of the Hamyarites, in Yaman, at the ſame time. This happened in the reign of the emperor Juſtin, as has been already related in the hiſtory of the Ethiopians, and will be more fully ſet forth in the following ſection [s].

And likewiſe chriſtianity.

WHETHER St. Paul preached in any part of Arabia, properly ſo called, we cannot pretend to determine; but that the chriſtian religion was planted very early in this country, will not admit of a diſpute. The Arabians we find ranked amongſt thoſe nations, ſome of whoſe members firſt had the happineſs of being made converts to chriſtianity, ſeveral of them being preſent when the HOLY GHOST firſt deſcended upon the apoſtles. When the eaſtern church, ſoon after the beginning of the third century, was greatly haraſſed by diſorders and perſecutions, vaſt numbers of chriſtians ſought for ſhelter in Arabia; who being for the moſt part of the Jacobite communion, that ſect generally prevailed among the Arabs. The principal tribes that embraced chriſtianity were Hamyar, Ghaſſân, Rabiâ, Taghlab, Bahrâ, Tonûch, part of thoſe of Tay and Kodâa, the inhabitants of Najrân, and the Arabs of Hira. The people of Najrân became converts to chriſtianity in the time of Dhu Nowâs above-mentioned, and thoſe of Hira received a great acceſſion by ſeveral tribes, who fled thither for refuge from the perſecution of that prince. How Al-Nooman, ſurnamed Abu-Kabûs, king of Hira, who was ſlain a few months before Mohammed's birth, came to profeſs himſelf a chriſtian, and brought off with him from paganiſm the whole nation he governed, will be hereafter related. According to Abulfeda, his grandfather Mondar embraced chriſtianity, and built ſeveral churches for the chriſtians in Hira. Safioddin ſays, that Najrân was a biſhop's ſee, and remarkable for having a chriſtian church in early times. From Shahreſtani we learn, that Mondar king of the Arabs declared war againſt the emperor Juſtinian, becauſe he had treated ill thoſe who aſſerted only one nature in Chriſt, ſince the Arab chriſtians at that time were of the Jacobite perſuaſion. This is a ſufficient proof, that chriſtianity had got footing in Arabia before the reign of that prince. The Jacobites give out, and M. Aſſeman thinks it probable, that the Syrian biſhop Jacobus Baradæus,

[s] Al-Koran Mohammed. c. 50, & 85. Baronii annal. ad ſec. 6. Simeon epiſc. Beth-Arſamenſ. apud Aſſeman. in bibl. Orient. tom. i. p. 363---385. Metaphraſtes apud Surium, tom. v. p. 936, & alib. Niceph. Calliſt. l. xviii. c. 6. Vid. etiam Abulfed. Shahreſtani. & Safioddin. apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 137, 138.

Baradæus, who, according to Abulpharagius, visited all the regions adjacent to Syria, and ordained there bishops, presbyters, &c. of the Jacobite sect, first infected the Arabian christians with Monophysism. How our Saviour appeared in the air, surrounded with rays of glory, walking on a purple cloud, to the Jews of Hamyar, who had challenged some neighbouring christians to a public disputation about Dhu Nowâs's time, our readers will be informed when we come towards the close of this history [t].

Bishopricks in Arabia.

It is natural to suppose, that as the christians were so numerous in Arabia before the age of Mohammed, they had several bishops there, when that impostor first began to form a new system of religion. Accordingly we find, that the Jacobites had two bishops of the Arabs subject to their Mafriân, or "metropolitan of the east". One of these was styled absolutely "the bishop of the Arabs", whose seat was for the most part at Akula, which some authors make the same with Cufâ, others a different town near Baghdâd. The other had the title of "the bishop of the Scenite Arabs", of the tribe of Thaalab in Hira or Hirta, as the Syrians call it, and seated in that city. Gregentius, who held a famous dispute sub dio for three days with Herbanus the Jew, before the king of Hamyar, was bishop or archbishop of Dhafâr or Tephra, as it is called by the Greek authors, in the century preceding Mohammed; and that Najrân also was a bishop's see at the same time, has been already observed from Safioddin. We find likewise, a prelate of this country styled the bishop of the Tayites, though the extent and limits of his dioceses cannot so easily be defined. The Nestorians had but one bishop, who presided over both the dioceses of Hira and Akula, and was immediately subject to their patriarch. Arabia was in the earliest ages famous for heresies, which might, as Mr. Sale observes, be in some measure attributed to the liberty and independency of its tribes. The specification of these heresies will more properly fall under our province in the modern history of the Arabs, when we shall enumerate the principal cause, [t] Gal. c. i. ver. 17. Act. c. ii. ver. 11. Abulpharag. p. 93, 149. Asseman. dissert. de Monophysitis, & bibl. Orient. tom. i. p. 166, 167. Al Mostatraf. Abulfed. Shahrestan. & Safioddin. apud Pocockium. ubi sup. Al-Jannabius. ibid. p. 63. Ebn. Chalican in vit. Abnlol. poet. Gregent. disput. cum Heban. Jud. in biblioth. patr. Parisiens. tom. i. Pagius ad an. 523. à num. 10. Vid. etiam Cl. Lambecium. l. v. p. 131. & Asseman. not. ad Simeon. Beth-Arsamens. episc. in bibl. Orient. tom. i. p. 383.

cauſes, that concurred to favour the propagation of the Mohammedan religion [u].

BEFORE we conclude our account of the religion, or rather religions, of the antient Arabs, we muſt obſerve, that ſome of them attributed a power to the fixed ſtars ſuperior to what even the Sabians themſelves allowed; inſomuch that they would not take the leaſt ſtep without receiving a favourable ómen from them. Several of them alſo not only worſhipped Dæmons or Genii, but likewiſe aſſerted them to be the daughters of GOD. The Koreiſh were infected with Zendiciſm, an error nearly related to that of the Sadducees among the Jews. We are told, that ſeveral of this tribe worſhipped one GOD, and differed from all the other religions of the country, before the time of Mohammed [w]. Other ſects in Arabia different from thoſe already mentioned.

As the Arabs are one of the moſt antient nations in the world, having inhabited the country they at preſent poſſeſs almoſt from the deluge, without intermixing with other nations, or being ſubjugated by any foreign power, their language muſt have been formed ſoon after, if not at, the confuſion of Babel. The two principal dialects of it were that ſpoken by the Hamyarites and other genuine Arabs, and that of the Koreiſh, in which Mohammed wrote the Korân. The firſt is ſtyled by the Oriental writers the Arabic of Hamyar, and the other the pure or defecated Arabic. As Yarab, grandfather to Hamyar, is ſuppoſed by the Oriental writers to have been the firſt whoſe tongue deviated from the Syriac to the Arabic, the Hamyaritic dialect, according to them, muſt have approached nearer to the purity of the Syriac, and conſequently have been more remote from the true genius of the Arabic, than that of any other tribe. The dialect of the Koreiſh, termed by the Korân "the perſpicuous and clear "Arabic", is referred to Iſhmael as its author, who, ſay the above-mentioned writers, firſt ſpoke it, and, as Dr. Pocock believes, after he had contracted an alliance with the family of Jorham by marriage, formed it of their language and the original Language.

[u] Safioddin. apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. Abulpharag. in chron. Syriac. MS. Abulfeda in deſcript. Iracæ. Gregent diſp. cum Herban. ubi ſup. Socrat. l. iii. c. 27. Aſſeman. bibl. Orient. tom. i. p. 166, 167. tom. ii. in diſſert. de Monophyſit. & p. 459. Lambecius ubi ſup. Sale's prelim. diſc. ſect. 2. p. 34, 35.

[w] Shahreſtani. Al-Koran Mohammed. c. vi. Al Moſtatraf, apud Pocockium, p. 136. Reland. de relig. Mohammed. p. 270. & Millius de Mohammediſmo ante Mohammed. p. 311. Sale's prelim. diſc. ſect. 1. p. 24.

original Hebrew. As therefore the Hamyaritic dialect partook principally of the Syriac, so that of the Koreish was supposed to consist chiefly of the Hebrew. But, according to Jallalo'ddin, the politeness and elegance of the dialect of the Koreish ought rather to be attributed to their having, from the remotest antiquity, the custody of the Caaba, and dwelling in Mecca, the centre of Arabia. For by this situation they were not only rendered more incapable of any intercourse with foreigners, who might have corrupted their language, but likewise frequented by the Arabs of all the circumjacent country, both on a religious account, and for the composing of their differences, from whose discourse and verses they took whatever words or phrases they judged most pure and elegant; by which means the beauties of the whole tongue became transfused into this dialect. The Arabs are full of the commendations of their language, which is very harmonious, expressive, and, as they say, so immensely copious, that no man uninspired can be a perfect master of it, in its utmost extent. How much in this last article it is superior to the Greek and Latin tongues, in some measure appears from hence, that sometimes a bare enumeration of the Arabic names of one particular thing, and an explication of them, will make a considerable volume. Thus we are told, that Ebn Khalawih, one of the most learned of the Arab grammarians, wrote a whole treatise, which consisted entirely of an interpretation of five hundred words signifying a lion; and another whose only subject was a collection of two hundred words denoting a serpent. Mohammedes Al-Firauzabadius, author of the great Arabic lexicon called Kamus, or the Ocean, relates, that he composed a piece, containing a description of the nature and advantages of honey, together with an explication of eighty different terms by which it was styled; and yet that it had several other names. He likewise mentions another of his books, wherein he had enumerated above a thousand words expressive only of a sword. Notwithstanding which, the Arabs believe the greatest part of their language to be lost; which will not seem improbable, when we consider how late the art of writing became generally practised amongst them. For though it was known to Job, their countryman, to the Edomites, as well as the other Arabian nations bordering upon Egypt and Phœnicia, and to the Hamyarites many centuries before Mohammed, as appears from some antient monuments, said to be remaining in their character; yet the other Arabs, and those of Mecca in particular, unless such of them as were either Jews or Christians, were were to the time of Morâmer perfectly ignorant of it. It was the antient Arabic language preceding the reign of Juſtinian which ſo nearly reſembled the Ethiopic; for ſince that time, and eſpecially ſince the age of Mohammed, all the Arabic dialects have been not a little corrupted. This is now the learned language of the Mohammedans, who ſtudy it as the European Chriſtians do the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin [x].

A great affinity between the antient and modern Arabic.

A VERY great affinity between the antient and modern Arabic muſt, however, be allowed; ſo great an affinity, that in ſubſtance we may pronounce them the ſame. Many conſiderable advantages flow from a knowledge of the Arabic tongue, all which may be conſidered as ſo many inducements to the ſtudy of it: but amongſt theſe, the chief ſeems to be, an inveſtigation of the true meaning of many Hebrew words, whoſe radices cannot be diſcovered in the Hebrew original of the Old Teſtament, though they are ſtill preſerved in the Arabic. This we might prove by an induction of particulars, did not the diſcuſſion of ſuch a point more properly belong to the modern hiſtory of Arabia. For a complete hiſtory of the language we are now upon, as well as a full diſplay of the elegancy, beauties, and utility of it, we muſt refer our readers to a curious and learned piece publiſhed by the Reverend Mr. Hunt, profeſſor of Arabic in the univerſity of Oxford, a gentleman as well verſed in the whole circle of Oriental literature as any of the preſent age [y].

Letters.

WE have juſt obſerved, that the Hamyarites were not ſtrangers to the art of writing. The character uſed by them, the moſt antient of any peculiar to the Arabs, wherein the letters were not diſtinctly ſeparate, went by the appellation of Al Moſnad, from the mutual dependency of its letters or parts upon one another. This was neither publicly taught, nor ſuffered to be uſed, without permiſſion firſt obtained. Could we depend upon what Al-Firauzabadius relates from Ebn Haſhem, this character muſt have been of a very high antiquity; ſince an inſcription in it, according to the laſt author, was found in Yaman, as old as the time of Joſeph. Be that as it will,

[x] Pocock, ubi ſupra, p. 150---154. Jallalo'ddin. in lib. Mezhar, c. i. p. 9, 22, 27. Al-Jauharius & Moham. Al-Firauzabadius apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. Job. c. xix. ver. 23, 24. Job Ludolph. in comment. ad hiſt. Æthiop. l. i. c. 1. n. 19. p. 60. Cl. Hunt, in orat. Oxon. habit. de ant. elegant. utilit. ling. Arab. p. 4---7, &c. edit. Oxon. 1739. [y] Hunt ubi ſupra, p. 48, & ſeq. Vide etiam auctor. ibid. laudat.

will, Marâmer Ebn Morra of Anbar, a city of Irâk, who lived not many years before Mohammed, was the inventor of the preſent Arabic character, which Baſhar the Kendian, who married the ſiſter of Abu Sofiân, is ſaid to have learned from thoſe of Anbar, and to have introduced at Mecca, but a little while before the inſtitution of Mohammediſm. Morâmer's alphabet the Oriental authors agree to have been very different from the antient one of the Hamyarites, ſince they diſtinguiſh the Hamyaritic and Arabic pens. In Mohammed's time the Morameric alphabet had made ſo ſmall a progreſs, that not a ſoul in Yaman could either write or read it; nay, Mohammed himſelf was incapable of doing either; for which reaſon he was called the illiterate prophet. The letters of this alphabet were very rude, being either the ſame with, or very much like the Cuphic, which character is ſtill found in inſcriptions, and the titles of antient books; nay, for many years it was the only one uſed by the Arabs, the Korân itſelf being at firſt written therein. According to Khalican, the preſent Arabic character was firſt formed from the Cuphic by Ebn Moklah, Wazîr, or Viſir, to Al Moktader, Al Kaher, and Al Râdi, khâlifs of Baghdad, who lived about three hundred years after Mohammed; and brought to great perfection by Ali Ebn Bowab, who flouriſhed in the following century, and whoſe name is yet famous among them on that account. Others, however, attribute the honour of the invention of this character to Ebn Moklah's brother, Abdallah al Haſan; and the perfecting of it to Ebn Amîd al Kâteb, after it had been reduced to near the preſent form by Abd' Alhamîd. But the beſt authors contradict the laſt of theſe notions, as well as the former, by affirming, that Yakût al Moſtaſemi, ſecretary to Al Moſtaſem, the laſt of the khâlifs of the family of Abbas, gave the finiſhing hand to it, for which reaſon he was ſurnamed Al Khattat, or the ſcribe. In order to perpetuate the memory of Morâmer's invention, ſome authors call the Arabic letters al Morâmer, i. e. "the progeny of Morâmer." The moſt remarkable ſpecimens of the Cuphic character, ſo denominated from Cupha, or Cuſa, a city of Irâk, where ſome of the firſt copies of the Korân were written, are the following: part of that book in it on vellum, brought from Egypt by Mr. Greaves; ſome other fragments of the ſame book in it publiſhed by Sir John Chardin; certain paſſages of a MS. in the Bodleian library; the legends on ſeveral Saracenic coins dug up about twenty years ago on the coaſt of the Baltic, not far from Dantzic; and, according to Mr. profeſſor Hunt, thoſe noble remains of it that are, or were lately, to be ſeen in Mr. Joſeph Ames's valuable collection of antique curioſities. As to the true origin of the antient and modern Arabic alphabets, we muſt own ourſelves pretty much in the dark. However, that very learned and profound orientaliſt Mr. Schultens, ſeems not very remote from truth, when he deduces the letters, of which they conſiſt, from the moſt antient Hebrew or Aſſyrian [z].

up

In order to give our readers a clearer idea of what that learned gentleman has advanced on this head, we ſhall here inſert both the antient and modern Arabic alphabets, together with that of the African Saracens publiſhed by Kircher, which ſeems to be the old Hamyaritic character mentioned by Al-Firauzabadius, Al-Jannabius, Ebn Khalicân, and Georgius Ebn Amid, under the title of Al Moſnad. As the Perſians were neighbours to the Arabs, and of the ſame religion with part of them, before the time of Mohammed, we have thought proper here likewiſe to give them the old Perſic alphabet (S), which, we doubt not, they will look upon as a very agreeable curioſity [a].

Antient and modern alphabets, as likewiſe thoſe of the African Saracens, and Perſians.

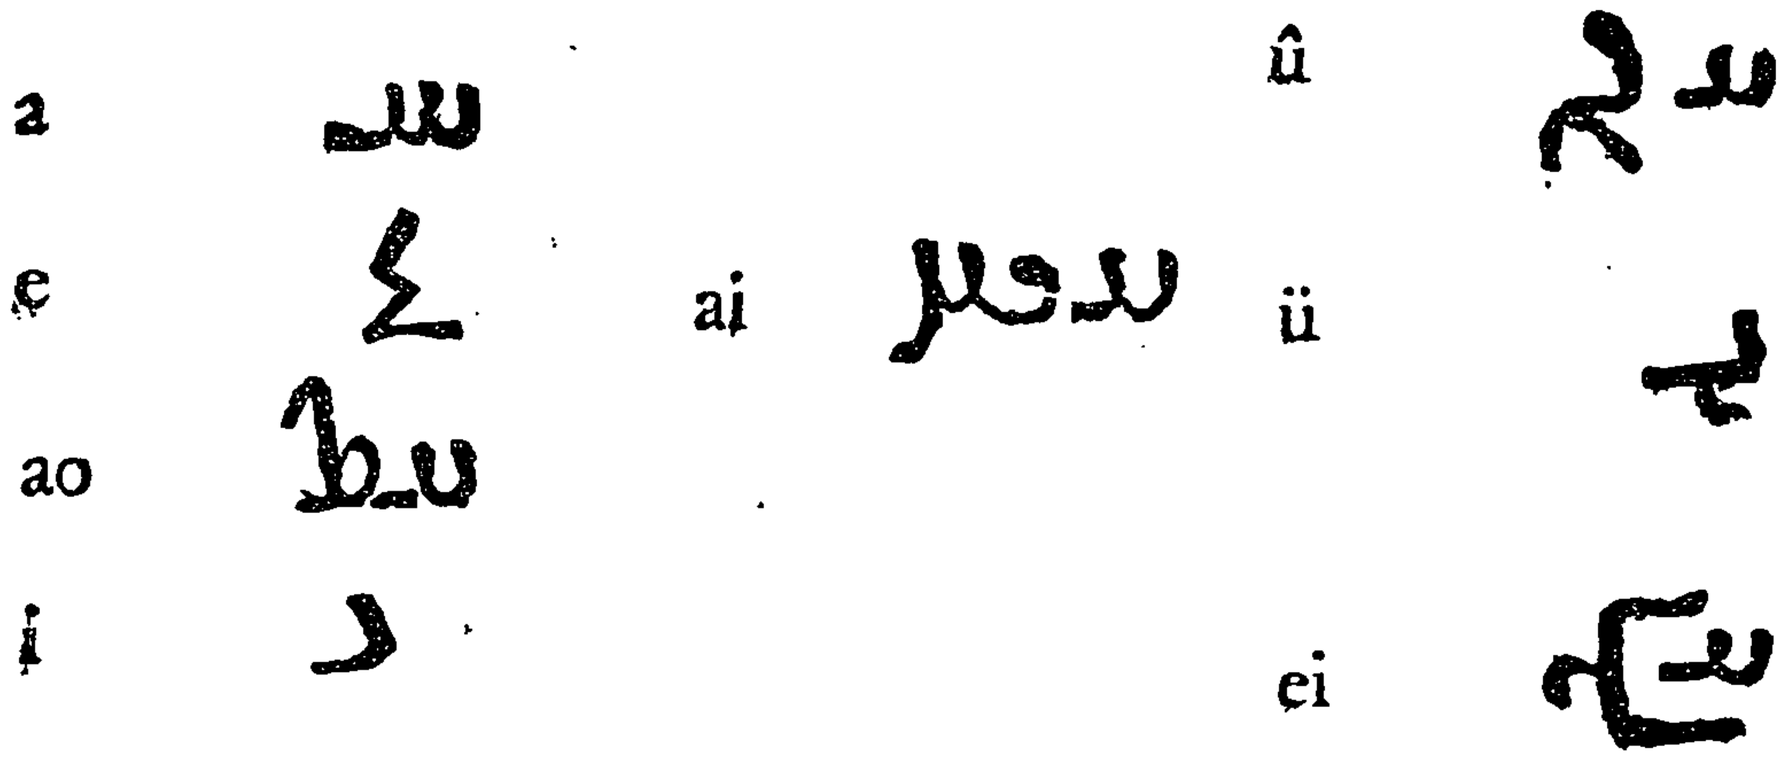
[z] Ebn Khalican. Ebn Haſhem. Al-Firauzabadius. Al-Jannabius Georg. Ebn Amid. Job c. xix. ver. 23, 24. Prideaux's life of Mahom. p. 29, 30. Chardin's travels, vol. iii. p. 119. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. p. 590, 108, & 194. Gravius apud Pocockium, ubi ſupra, p. 158. Hunt, ubi ſupra, p. 12. Vide & Monarch. Aſiatico-Saracen. ſtat. a M. Geor. Jacob. Kehr Sleuſinga-Franco Oriental. Lipſiæ, 1724. Alb. Schult. inſtitut. ad fundament. ling. Hebr. p. 20. ed. Lugd. Batav, 1737. [a] Loeſch. de cauſ. ling. Hebr. p. 224. ed. Francof. & Lipſiæ, 1706. Schult. ubi ſup Athan. Kirch. in prod. Copt. p. 199, 200. Romæ, 1636. Al-Firauzabad. Al-Jannab. Ebn Khalican, & Georg. Ebn Amid. Vide etiam Pocock. in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 154, 155.

(S) For this we are obliged to the Reverend Mr. Coſtard, fellow of Wadham college, Oxford, a gentleman of great erudition, and particularly eminent for his ſkill in the Oriental tongues.

The modern Arabic alphabet.

Order.	Power.	Name.	Figure.
1	A or E.	Elif.	ـا	ا	ا	ا
2	B.	Be.	بـ	ب	بـ	ب
3	T.	Te.	تـ	ت	تـ	ت
4	T, blæſe, or liſping.	Thſe.	ثـ	ث	ثـ	ث
5	G.	Gjim.	جـ	ج	جـ	ج
6	Hh.	Hha.	حـ	ح	حـ	ح
7	Ch.	Cha.	خـ	خ	خـ	خ
8	D.	Dal.	د	د	د	د
9	D, blæſe, or liſping.	Dhſal.	ذ	ذ	ذ	ذ
10	R.	Re.	ر	ر	ر	ر
11	Z.	Ze.	ز	ز	ز	ز
12	S.	Sin.	سـ	س	سـ	س
13	Sj.	Sjin.	شـ	ش	شـ	ش
14	S.	Sad.	صـ	ص	صـ	ص
15	D.	Dad.	ضـ	ض	ضـ	ض
16	T.	Ta.	طـ	ط	طـ	ط
17	D.	Da.	ظـ	ظ	ظـ	ظ
18	The Hebrew ע.	Ain.	عـ	ع	عـ	ع
19	G. Latin.	Gain.	غـ	غ	غـ	غ
20	F.	Fe.	فـ	ف	فـ	ف
21	K.	Kaf.	قـ	ق	قـ	ق
22	C.	Kef.	كـ	ك	كـ	ك
23	L.	Lam.	لـ	ل	لـ	ل
24	M.	Mim.	مـ	م	مـ	م
25	N.	Nun.	نـ	ن	نـ	ن
26	W.	Waw.	و	و		و
27	H.	He.	هـ	ه	هـ	ه
28	I.	Ie.	يـ	ي	يـ	ي

The



The old Arabic alphabet.			The old Perſic alphabet.
ا	ا	Elif.	ا
ب	ب	Be.	ب
غ	غ	Gain.	ع	غ
د	د	Dal.	د
ذ	ذ	Dſal.	ذ
ه	ه	He.	ه
و	و	Waw.	و
ج	ج	Gim.	ج
ح	ح	Hha.	ح	ح
ط	ط	Ta.
ي	ي	Ye.	ى
ك	ك	Caf.	ك

Like the Engliſh U.
Like the Engliſh V, and at the end of a word ـو .

The old Arabic alphabet continued.			The old Perſic alphabet continued.
ل	ل	Lam.	ل
م	م	Mem.	م
ن	ن	Nun.	ن ﻧـ ـﻧـ ـن
ص	ص	Sad.
ع	ع	Ain.	ﻋـ ـﻋـ
ف	ف	Fe.	ﻓـ ـﻓـ	Like the Engliſh F.
ز	ز	Ze.	ﺯ ـﺯ	Like the Engliſh P.
ق	ق	Kaf.
ر	ر	Re.	ﺭ ـﺭ	at the end of a word.
س	س	Sin.	ﺳـ ـﺳـ
ش	ش	Shin.	ﺷـ ـﺷـ
ت	ت	Te.	ﺗـ ـﺗـ
			ﭼـ ـﭼـ	Tch.
			ﮊ ـﮊ	Td.

The

The old Perſic vowels and diphthongs.

It appears, from comparing the old Perſic and modern Arabic alphabets, that the following letters of the latter are wanting in the former, viz. ث ح ص ض ط ظ ع غ ق. Now Ludovicus de Dieu, in his Perſic grammar, obſerves, that the true Perſic words have ſcarce ever any of theſe letters in them. It is obſerveable, likewiſe, that the Arabic characters, which the Perſians adopted in the reign of Jezdegerd, do not always anſwer the ſounds they repreſent, ſo well as the old Perſic letters did. In proof of which, it will be ſufficient to produce the two following inſtances.

The African Saracenic alphabet, probably the ſame as the antient Hamyaritic, given us by Kircher.

Dh D Sh S Sc S Z R Dh D Ch Hh G Th T B A

I I I L L H&L V H H N N M M L L K C Ph Gh Gh Ai

THOUGH

The learning, &c. of the antient Arabs.

THOUGH by far the greateſt part of the Arabs before Mohammed could neither read nor write, every one of which went under the denomination of Al Ommio; yet ſeveral of them became famous for their eloquence, and a perfect ſkill in their own tongue. Herein they exerciſed themſelves by compoſing of orations and poems. Their orations were of two ſorts, metrical and proſaic, the one being compared to pearls ſtrung, and the other to looſe ones. They endeavoured to excel in both, and whoever was able in an aſſembly to perſuade the people to a great enterprize, or diſſuade them from a dangerous one, or gave them other wholeſome advice, was honoured with the title of Khâteb, or orator, which is now given to the Mohammedan preachers. They called an oration giving a detail of ſome glorious atchievements, delivered from the roſtra, Khôtbah, according to Al-Barezi, a word of the ſame origin with Khâteb above-mentioned. From what we find in ſeveral authors, they purſued a method very different from that of the Greek and Roman orators; their ſentences being like looſe gems, without connection; ſo that this ſort of compoſition ſtruck the audience chiefly by the fulneſs of the periods, the elegance of the expreſſion, and the acuteneſs of the proverbial ſayings (T). So perſuaded were they of their excelling

(T) Now we are ſpeaking of the Arab literature, our readers will expect ſome account of the fabuliſt Lokmân, ſo famous over all the eaſt. Lokmân, ſurnamed al Hakim, i. e. the wiſe, or the ſage, according to Saddi, Akramas, and Schaab, was endued with the gift of prophecy, which came to him by ſucceſſion, he having been the ſon or grandſon of a ſiſter or aunt of Job. The author of Taiaſſir makes him the ſon of Baura, or Bêor, the ſon of Nahor, the ſon of Terah, and conſequently related to Abraham. Abouléits gives Lockmân the ſurname of Abou Anam, i. e. the father of Anam, though others call his ſon Mathan. The author of the book intituled Ain al mâni ſays, he was born in the time of David, and lived till the age of Jonah; but this exceeds all belief. According to the deſcription of his perſon by the Arab writers, he muſt have been deformed enough; for they ſay he was an Ethiopian or Nubian ſlave, and conſequently of a black complexion, with thick lips, and ſplay feet. But in return he received from GOD wiſdom and eloquence in a great degree, which ſome pretend were given him in a viſion, on his making choice of wiſdom preferably to the gift of prophecy, either of which were offered him. The generality of the Mohammedans therefore hold him to have been no prophet, but only a ſage or wiſe excelling in this way, that they would not allow any nation to understand the art of speaking in public, except themselves and the Persians; which last were reckoned much inferior in that wise man. Others relate, that when God, in order to reward his transcendent piety, offered to make him his vicegerent on earth, he chose rather to remain in the condition of a slave, though with an entire resignation to the divine will, begging that God would enable him to execute all His orders, in case He thought proper to fix him in so sublime a post. This, continue the same authors, so exceedingly pleased God, that he made him superior to all other men in wisdom; insomuch that he wrote ten thousand proverbs and fables, for the instruction of mankind. From several authors it appears, that he lived in the reigns of David and Solomon, and that by nation he was an Ethiopian, sold to the Israelites, but by religion a Jew. The author of Tarikh Montakhab affirms, that the sepulchre of Lokmân was to be seen in his time at Ramlah or Ramah, near Jerusalem; and that he was interred near seventy prophets, who had been starved by the Jews, and all died in one day. He is said to have obtained his liberty on the following occasion: His master having one day given him a bitter melon to eat, he paid him such exact obedience as to eat it all; at which his master being surprised, asked him how he could eat so nauseous a fruit? To which he replied, it was no wonder, that he should for once accept a bitter fruit from the same hand, from which he had received so many favours. Our readers will naturally observe, that Lokmân, who lived in the time of the prophet Hud, or Heber, could not be the same person with the fabulist here mentioned.

As most of the particulars relating to the person of Lokmân here recited, as well as the quick repartees of which he is made the author by the commentators on the Korân, agree so well with what Maximus Planudes has written of Æsop, these two sages are generally thought to have been the same person. The great resemblance the fables of Lokmân bear to those of Æsop is an additional argument in favour of this notion. We are inclined to believe, that Planudes borrowed great part of his life of Æsop from the traditions he met with in the east concerning Lokmân, and concluded these two persons to have been the same from the circumstances above-mentioned. That the fables attributed to Æsop were of Oriental extraction, cannot well be denied, since they savour much more of the genius of the Orientals than of that of the Greeks. Fable or apologue was of a very high antiquity in the east, and even the countries bordering on Arabia, if not in Arabia itself; as may be learned from the noble example of this form of instruction in the speech of Jotham to the men of Shechem, that reſpect to the Arabians. Two of the antient Arabs, who immortalized their names by their eloquence, were Koſs and Sabban, of the tribe of Wayel. Hence came the proverbs, "More expert in the art of ſpeaking than Koss," and "More eloquent than SABBAN." To their poetry they ſeem to have been chiefly indebted, for the poliſhing, and even preſervation, of their language, before the uſe of letters was introduced amongſt them; for which reaſon their authors generally conſider this and the ſtudy of their language together. In their poems, likewiſe, were preſerved the diſtinction of deſcents, the rights of tribes, and the memory of great actions. An excellent poet, therefore, reflected an honour on his tribe, ſo that as ſoon as any one began to be admired for his performances of this kind in a tribe, the other tribes ſent publicly to congratulate them on the occaſion, and themſelves

Shechem, which was made near two hundred years before the time of Lokmân, ſuppoſing him to have been cotemporary with David. In fine, we are diſpoſed to think, that the Arab traditions concerning the wiſdom of Lokmân were only corruptions of ſome paſſages of Scripture relating to Solomon king of Iſrael, eſpecially if we admit the queen of Sheba to have been a Nubian or Ethiopian. This will appear at leaſt probable, from 1 Kings c. iii. ver. 9---13. c. iv. ver. 30---34. compared with what has been already obſerved of Lokmân from the eaſtern writers. The generality of theſe writers make Lokmân cotemporary with David and Solomon, and of the ſame religion with thoſe princes; which adds no ſmall weight to our opinion. As for the deformity of his perſon, that might have been introduced by them, in order to ſet off to the greater advantage, by ſuch a contraſt, the excellency of his wiſdom. We muſt not omit obſerving, that the thirty-firſt chapter of the Korân, from whence ſeveral hints relating to our ſage may be drawn, is intituled LOKMAN; nor that ſome fables going under his name have been publiſhed by Golius, at the end of his edition of Erpenius's Arabic grammar. What is here advanced will meet with a better reception from our readers, when they have conſulted Mr. D'Herbelot in the article Lokmân (19).

(19) Al-Zamakhſh. Al Beidawi, &c. Al-Kor. Mohammed. c. 31. Jud. c. ix. ver. 7. Maraccius in Alc. p. 547. ed. Patavii, 1698. Saddi, Akramas, Schaab, &c. Maxim. Planud. in vit. Æſop. Vaheb. in comment. Turcic. ad Al-Korân. Mohammed. Poc. in not. ad ſpecim. hiſt. Arab. p. 36. La vie d'Eſope, par M. de Meziriac, Bayle in dict. hiſt. art. Eſope. Var. auctor. apud D'Herbel. in art. Lokmân. Vide etiam Lokmânni fab. in calce gram. Arab. Thom. Erpenii, a Golio ed. Lugd. Bat. 1656.

themselves made entertainments, at which the women assisted, dressed in their nuptial ornaments, singing, to the sound of timbrels, the happiness of their tribe, who had now one to protect their honour, to preserve their genealogies, and the purity of their language, and to transmit their actions to posterity. For this was all performed by their poems, to which they were solely obliged for their knowledge, and instructions, moral and œconomical, and to which they had recourse, as to an oracle, in all doubts and differences. No wonder, then, that poetry was in such esteem among them, that they looked upon it as a great accomplishment, and a proof of ingenuous extraction, to be able to express one's self in verse with ease and elegance, on any extraordinary occurrence; nor that even in their common discourse they made frequent applications of celebrated passages of their famous poets. As the Arabs considered an elegant and instructive poem as the summit of human performances, a spirit of emulation was kept up amongst their poets; in order to which, the tribes had once a year a general assembly at Ocadh, a place famous on this account, and where they kept a weekly mart or fair, which was held on our Sunday. This annual meeting lasted a whole month, during which time they employed themselves, not only in trading, but in repeating their poetical compositions, contending and vying with each other for the prize; whence the place, it is said, took its name. The poems that were judged to excel, were laid up in their king's treasuries, as were the seven celebrated poems, thence called Al Moallakât, rather than from their being hung up on the Caaba, which honour they also had by public order, being written on Egyptian silk, and in letters of gold; on which account they had also the name of Al Modhahabât, or the golden verses. It is worthy observation, that such a public congratulation as has been already mentioned was made only on the birth of a boy, the rise of a poet, and the fall of a foal of generous breed; which they reckoned three great points of felicity. Though poetry was of so high an antiquity amongst the Arabs, they did not at first use to write poems of any just length, but only expressed in verse occasionally; nor was their prosody digested into rules, till some time after Mohammed; for this was done, as it is said, by Al Khalîl Ahmed al Farâhîdi, who lived in the reign of the khalîf Harûn al Rashîd. The first author of a poem that consisted of thirty verses, or Al-Kasidah, was Mohalhel. According to Al-Khalîl, there are fifteen different kinds of Arabic verse; Zamakhsharius makes them sixteen, and

and others only eleven or twelve. Mohammed ſuppreſſed the fair and aſſembly at Ocadh, which occaſioned poetry to decline in his time, and for ſome years after, the Arabs being then employed in extending their conqueſts; which having done, upon the return of peace this ſtudy was revived, and almoſt all ſorts of learning encouraged, and not a little improved by them. However, this interruption occaſioned the loſs of moſt of their antient pieces of poetry, which were then chiefly preſerved by memory. The Arabian poetry agrees with the Greek and Roman in this, that it conſiſts of Ajzac, parts correſponding with their feet; and theſe differ, according to the different number and quantity of ſyllables, as the Greek and Roman feet did. The whole art of the Arab verſification conſiſts in the due poſition of letters called moveable and quieſcent. A moveable letter has its proper vowel; a quieſcent letter one that has no vowel of its own, but is joined to the preceding letter, and with it makes one ſyllable. Thus, for inſtance, in حرف harfon, ح (H) has its vowel (a), and therefore is moveable; but ر (R) is deſtitute of one, and therefore joined to the preceding ح (H), with which, it forms but one ſyllable. We muſt not here omit taking notice of the quick tranſitions from ſubject to ſubject in the Arab poetry, nor of the moſt celebrated antient Arab poets, whoſe works were hung up in the Caaba, adorned in the above-mentioned manner: viz. 1. Amriol Kais. 2. Tarafah. 3. Zohair. 4. Labid. 5. Antarah. 6. Al-Hareth. 7. Amru Ebn Kalthum. Some authors, in the room of Antarah and Al-Hareth, ſubſtitute Al-Aaſha and Al-Nabega. The title affixed to every copy of verſes in the Caaba was, Modhahhabato Fohlan, i. e. "the golden verſes of a certain poet, which are the beſt he "ever wrote[b]."

BEFORE

[b] Al-Motarezzi, in lib. Mogreb. Ebn al Athir. Jallalo'ddin. in lib. Mezhar, c. 29, & alib. Mohammed. Ebn Salain, Al-Jauhar. & Al-Firauzabad. apud Pocockium, ubi ſupra, p. 159---162. ut & ipſe Pocockius ibid. Ibrahim al Barezi in ſchol. ad ſermon. Nobatii. Poc. orat. ante carmen Tograi, p. 10, 11. & not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 162, 348. Ebn Raſhik apud Pocockium, ubi ſupra, p. 160, 381. Al-Khalil & Al-Zamakhſhar. Vide etiam Jallalo'ddin al Soyûti, ibid. & p. 159. Geogr. Nubienſ. Pocock. in calce notar. ad carmen Tograi, p. 233. & Sale's prelim. diſc. p. 27, 28.

Some particulars relating to the chronology of the antient Arabs.

BEFORE we dismiss our present subject, it will be proper to take notice of some few particulars relating to the chronology of the Arabs. They divided the year into twelve months, whose antient names were, 1. Mutemer. 2. Nagir. 3. Chavan. 4. Savan. 5. Ritma. 6. Ida. 7. Asam. 8. Adil. 9. Natil. 10. Vail. 11. Varna. 12. Burec. But Kelâb, the son of Morrah, from whom Mohammed was lineally descended, having, from certain events happening in every month, given new names to them, the old ones in his time began to grow obsolete amongst the Koreish; and afterwards, by the authority of Mohammed, when he had brought all the rest of the Arab tribes under his power, were totally abolished in every part of Arabia. As Mohammed made the use of the modern names one of the distinguishing characteristics of his followers, it is no wonder they should still prevail amongst the Mohammedans. The first day of Mutemer, or Muharram, being the first day of the year, was celebrated by the antient kings of Yaman with great festivity and munificence, as it was likewise by the Persians, and other eastern nations. The nation we are now upon antiently divided the year also into six seasons. 1. The season of herbs, flowers, &c. 2. Summer. 3. The hot season. 4. The season of fruits. 5. Autumn, or rather the latter part of autumn. 6. Winter. That the antient Arab year was lunisolar, has been already observed; but the custom of intercalating months, in order to make the course of the moon to agree with that of the sun, was abolished by Mohammed. The Arabs, like the Egyptians, Indians, Greeks, Romans, &c. antiently computed their time by weeks, or periods of seven days, as we learn from a very antient Arab poet, who died many ages before the publication of the Korân. The old names of these days are given us by that poet in the following order: 1. Euvel. 2. Bahûn. 3. Gebâr. 4. Debâr. 5. Mûnis. 6. Aruba. 7. Xijâr. We have already delivered our sentiments concerning the origin of this manner of computing time, and may possibly say something farther of it, when we come to the history of the Indians [b].

THE

[b] Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 3---16. Al Jauhar. Prideaux's life of Mahomet, p. 2. ed. Lond. 1723. Al-Korân. Mohammed. pass. Mesud. & Noveir. apud Golium, ubi sup. Philos. Xirasit. Poet. antiquiss. apud Golium, ubi sup. Vide etiam Univ. hist. vol. xvi. p. 614. not. (R); & p. 674.

The ſciences they chiefly cultivated.

THE ſciences chiefly cultivated by the antient Arabians were three; that of their hiſtory and genealogies, ſuch a knowledge of the ſtars as to foretel the changes of weather, and the interpretation of dreams. They valued themſelves extremely on account of the nobility of their families, and ſo many diſputes happened on that occaſion, that it is no wonder, if they took great pains in ſettling their deſcents. Their knowledge of the ſtars was gathered from long experience, and not from any regular ſtudy, or aſtronomical rules. The Arabians and Indians, as has been already hinted, applied themſelves to obſerve the fixed ſtars, contrary to other nations, whoſe obſervations were almoſt confined to the planets; and they foretold their effects from their influences, not their nature. The ſtars or aſteriſms they moſt uſually foretold the weather by, were thoſe they call Anwâ, or the houſes of the moon. Theſe are 28 in number, and divide the zodiac into as many parts, through one of which the moon paſſes every night. As ſome of them ſet in the morning, others riſe oppoſite to them, which happens every thirteenth night; and from their riſing and ſetting, the Arabs, by long experience, obſerved what changes happened in the air; and at length came to aſcribe divine power to them, ſaying, that their rain was from ſuch or ſuch a ſtar. This expreſſion Mohammed abſolutely forbad them to uſe in the old ſenſe, unleſs qualified in ſuch a manner as to make the Supreme Being the director and manager of them. We find Al-Rayeſh, one of the kings of Yaman, ſurnamed "the philoſopher," not ſo much on account of his learning, as of his great prudence, and intellectual endowments. That the Arabs underſtood ſomething of phyſic before the time of Mohammed, appears from hence, that the famous Arabian phyſician Al Harith Ebn Khalda, ſo celebrated amongſt his countrymen, was older than that impoſtor. They ſeem to have made no farther progreſs in aſtronomy, which they afterwards cultivated with ſo much ſucceſs and applauſe, than to obſerve the influence of the ſtars upon the weather, and to give them names; which it was obvious for them to do, by reaſon of their paſtoral way of life, lying night and day in the open plains. The names they impoſed on the ſtars generally alluded to cattle and flocks, and they were ſo nice in diſtinguiſhing them, that no language has ſo many names of ſtars and aſteriſms as the Arabic. For though they have ſince borrowed the names of ſeveral conſtellations from the Greeks, yet the far greater part are of their own growth, and much more antient; particularly those of the more conspicuous stars, dispersed in several constellations, and those of the lesser constellations, which are contained within the greater, and were not observed or named by the Greeks. Some of the chief of these are Auwâ in Virgo, Benât Al Nash in Ursa major, Aiyûk and Al Gjedyân in Auriga, Ma'laph and Al Himarein in Cancer, &c. To wave all other arguments in favour of the high antiquity of the names of several stars and asterisms amongst the Arabs, it will be sufficient to observe, that some of these names were prior to the time of Job; nay that, in all probability, they were coeval with the first peopling of Arabia, since from the beginning the Arabs led a pastoral life, lying altogether in the open air, and continually viewing their flocks and the stars; from whence it came to pass, that the first appellations given to some of the latter, alluded to the former. Neither can we absolutely reject what has been hinted by Ricciolus, viz. that some degree of attention is due to those who believe astronomy to be as antient as Adam, and consequently that several names of stars and constellations now in use amongst the Arabs, may be supposed to precede even the deluge itself. Onirocritic, or the art of interpreting dreams, this nation had in common with the Egyptians, Chaldæans, &c. as likewise divination by arrows, and, as is probable, something of genethliacal astrology [c].

are

They had some knowledge of the mechanical arts, &c.

THAT some of the Arabs had a good degree of knowledge in several mechanical arts, appears from Strabo, who informs us, that the people of Tamna and the adjacent provinces had magnificent temples, and elegant houses, built in the Egyptian taste. The same author likewise relates, that in Arabia Felix, besides the husbandmen, there were many artificers, and, amongst others those who made palm-wine, which, he intimates, was much used by the Arabs. As for the exercise of arms and horsemenship, they looked upon this as one of their principal accomplishments, being obliged to practise and encourage it by reason of the independency of their tribes, whose frequent jarrings made wars almost continual amongst them, which for the most part ended ended in field battles. Hence it became an uſual ſaying amongſt them, that God had beſtowed four peculiar things on the Arabs, viz. turbans inſtead of diadems, tents inſtead of walls and houſes, ſwords inſtead of entrenchments, and poems inſtead of written laws. The principal arms uſed by the antient Arabs were bows and arrows, darts or javelins, and broad ſwords or cymeters. The bows and arrows were the moſt antient of theſe, being uſed by Iſhmael himſelf, according to Scripture. It is probable alſo, that ſome of them were acquainted with every branch of the military art cultivated by their neighbours, the Egyptians, Syrians, and Phænicians [d].

[c] Al Shareстan apud Pocockium, in orat. ubi supra, p. 9. & not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 164. Al Jauhar, Al Firauzabad. & Ebn Al Athir, ibid. p. 163, 164. Greg. Abulfarag. p. 161. Hyde, in not. ad tabulas stellar. fixar. Ulugh Beighi, p. 4, 5. Ricciolus apud Hyde, ibid. Sale's prelim. disc. p. 31, 32. Gen. c. xxi. ver. 20.

The diſpoſition of the antient Arabs.

WITH regard to the diſpoſition of the antient Arabs, it will be proper to remark, that they had their good and bad qualities, their excellencies and defects, as well as other nations. Hoſpitality was ſo habitual to them, that in this they ſeem to have exceeded all their neighbours. Agatharchides repreſents them as the moſt hoſpitable people in the world to all nations, but particularly ſome of the Greeks. Hatem of the tribe of Tay, and Haſn of that of Fezârah, were principally famous on this account: the latter of theſe, we are told, fell into as great a tranſport of joy, when he conferred any ſignal favour upon a petitioner, as others did when they received ſuch a favour. Nay, the contrary vice was ſo much in contempt amongſt the Arabs, that a certain poet upbraids the inhabitants of Waſet, as with the greateſt reproach, that none of their men had the heart to give, nor their women to deny. As a mark of their hoſpitable diſpoſition, the Arabs uſed to light fires on the tops of hills, which in the night conducted travellers to their tents, and aſſured them of a kind reption. Every one of theſe fires they called the fire of hoſpitality, and the larger and higher it was, the greater honour and glory it reflected upon the perſon or perſons concerned in lighting it. The higheſt compliment that could be paid a man was, to paſs an encomium upon his munificence; as that moſt acceptable to a woman was, to celebrate her parſimony, and her beauty. The antients likewiſe commend the Arabs for being exact to their words, and reſpectful to their kindred; and they have have always been celebrated for their quickneſs of apprehenſion, and penetration, as well as the vivacity of their wit; eſpecially thoſe of the deſert [e].

[d] Strabo, l. xvi. Pocock. in calce notar. ad carmen Tograi, p. 234. Sephadius in comment. ad carmen Tograi, apud Pocockium, in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 161. Sale, ubi ſupra, p. 29.

On the other hand, that the Arabs had a natural inclination to war, bloodſhed, cruelty, and rapine, is acknowledged by their own writers. They had always been ſo much addicted to bear malice, that they ſcarce ever forgot an old grudge; which vindictive temper, ſome phyſicians ſay, ought to be attributed to their frequent feeding on camels fleſh, that creature being moſt malicious, and tenacious of anger. And at this day the Arabs of the deſert, who eat little elſe, are obſerved to be moſt inclined to theſe vices; which account, according to Mr. Sale, ſuggeſts a good reaſon for a diſtinction of meats [f].

Scenite Arabs lived chiefly upon plunder.

That the antient Scenite Arabs, Iſhmaelites, or Nabathæans, in conformity to the divine prediction, lived upon plunder, harraſſing their neighbours by continual robberies and excurſions, we learn from Diodorus Siculus. That author obſerves, that it was in a manner impoſſible either to ſubdue or attack this nation of robbers; becauſe they had wells digged at proper diſtances in their dry and barren country, known only to themſelves: ſo that if any body of foreigners ever purſued or invaded them, they for the moſt part either died of thirſt, or were conſumed by the fatigues they found themſelves obliged to ſuſtain. Neither are their poſterity leſs infamous at preſent, on account of the robberies they commit on merchants and travellers. This they are ſenſible of, and endeavour to excuſe themſelves, by alledging the hard uſage of their father Iſhmael, who, being turned out of doors by Abraham, had the open plains and deſerts given him by God for his patrimony, with permiſſion to take whatever he could find there. This therefore, they think, authorizes them to indemnify themſelves, as well as they can, not only on the poſterity of Iſaac, but alſo on every body elſe; always ways ſuppoſing a ſort of kindred between themſelves and thoſe they plunder. And, in relating their adventures of this kind, they think it ſufficient to change the expreſſion, and, inſtead of, I robbed a man of ſuch and ſuch a thing, to ſay, I gained it. We muſt not, however, imagine, that they are the leſs honeſt for this among themſelves, or towards thoſe whom they receive as friends; on the contrary, the ſtricteſt probity is obſerved in their camp, where every thing is open, and nothing ever known to be ſtollen. The Iſhmaelites alſo employed themſelves in paſturage, as well as pillaging of paſſengers, and lived chiefly on the milk and fleſh of camels, as above-mentioned. However, ſome of them uſed horſe's fleſh, as well as that of camels, according to the Arab poet Tograi. They often changed their habitations, as the convenience of water, and of paſture for their cattle invited them, ſtaying in a place no longer than that laſted, and then removing in ſearch of another. They generally wintered in Irâk, and the confines of Syria. Before the Romans ſubdued Syria, the Scenite Arabs made dreadful excurſions into that country, where they committed great depredations, as we learn from Strabo [g].

[e] Gentius in not. ad Guliſtan Sheikh Sadi, p. 486, &c. Poet. Arab. apud Poc. in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab p. 48. Abu Iſhac & Ebno'l Hobar. poet. Arab. apud Pocockium, in not. ad carmen Tograi, p. 107. ut & ipſe Pocock. ibid. & p. 111---113. Vide etiam Herodot. l. iii. c. 8. Agatharchid. Cnid. apud Photium, p. 1369, 1370. Strabo, l xvi. D Herbel. bibl. Orient. p. 121 & Sale ubi ſupra, p. 29, 30.

[f] Poc. not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 87,88, Bochart. Hierozoic. l.ii. c. 1. Sale ubi ſupra, p. 30.

BESIDES theſe free-booters, we find a more civilized kind of Arabs, who dwelt in cities and towns. Theſe lived by tillage, the cultivation of palm-trees, breeding and feeding of cattle, and the exerciſe of all ſorts of trades, particularly merchandizing, wherein they were very eminent, even in the time of Jacob. The tribe of Koreiſh were much addicted to commerce, and Mohammed, in his younger years, was brought up to the ſame buſineſs; it being cuſtomary for the Arabians to exerciſe the ſame trade that their parents did, according to Strabo. Neither ought it to appear ſurpriſing, that the Arabs ſhould have had ſuch a genius for traffick, if their country produced ſuch immenſe quantities of the moſt precious commodities, as ſome authors ſuggeſt. Balſam, cinnamon, and Caſſia, the Happy Arabia abounded with, as likewiſe myrrh, frankincenſe, and all the moſt noble ſpices and perfumes. Cattle likewiſe its inhabitants had ſufficient to ſupply all their neighbours with, and even many of the remoter nations. But, above all, the gold, which was the proper produce of this country, has been repreſented by Agatharchides and Strabo to be ſo copious as to exceed all belief. According to them, the Aliſæi and Caſſandrini, in the ſouthern parts of Arabia, had gold in that plenty amongſt them, that they would give double the weight of gold for iron, triple its weight for braſs, and ten times its weight for ſilver. In digging the earth they found ſome pieces of pure gold, which needed no refining, as big as olive ſtones, others as big as medlers, and laſtly others equal to walnuts. Hence it came to paſs, that all the furniture of their houſes, even their chairs, beds, cups, and veſſels of all kinds, conſiſted of gold and ſilver. Nay, according to Agatharchides, they alone enriched Syria to a great degree under the Ptolemies, and rewarded the mercantile diligence and labour of the Phœnicians. Contiguous to the Aliſæi and Caſſandrini were the Dedebæ or Debæ, through whoſe country paſſed a river ſo abounding with ſmall gobbets of gold, that the mud at the mouth of it ſeemed to conſiſt entirely of that metal. Diodorus relates, that this gold was of ſo bright and glorious a colour, that it added an exceeding luſtre and beauty to the moſt valuable gems ſet in it. In ſhort, continues the laſt author, Arabia Felix, at leaſt the region of the Sabæi, was ſo immenſly rich, that all the treaſures of the world ſeemed to centre there; all the commodities of Aſia and Europe being brought thither, as to an univerſal mart. But, notwithſtanding the happineſs of its climate, its fertility and riches, Strabo intimates, that Arabia was aggrandized ſolely by trade, and that in reality a great part of the riches, which the antients imagined were the produce of Arabia, came from the Indies and the coaſt of Africa. For, the Egyptians, who had engroſſed that trade, which was then carried on by way of the Red Sea, to themſelves, induſtriouſly concealed the truth of the matter, and kept their ports ſhut, to prevent foreigners from penetrating into thoſe countries, or receiving any information from thence. And this precaution of theirs on the the one ſide, and the deſerts, unpaſſable to ſtrangers on the other, were the reaſon why Arabia was ſo little known to the Greeks and Romans. Amongſt other veſſels the Arabs uſed on the Red Sea, to carry on their commerce with Egypt and Ethiopia, were ſome made of leather, the invention of which the reflux of that ſea ſuggeſted to them [h].

The more civilized Arabs dwelt in towns, &c.

[g] Diod. Sic. l. ii. p. 92. Gen. c. xvi. ver. 12. Voyage dans la Paleſt. p. 220, &c. Prideaux's life of Mahomet, p. 6. & alib. Sale ubi ſupra, p. 25, 30. 31. Tograi. ver. 24. Agatharchid. Cnid. & Strabo, ubi ſupra.

AMONGST

[h] Agatharchid. Cnid. Diod. Sic. Strab. ubi ſup. Gen. c. XXXVII.

AMONGST the principal cuſtoms of the antient Arabs, beſides thoſe couched under ſome of the former general heads, may be ranked the following:

1. THE antient Arabs uſed circumciſion, either on the eighth day, according to Philoſtorgius, or after they had completed the thirteenth year of their age when Iſhmael was circumciſed, as Joſephus aſſerts. Al-Gazalin intimates, that they underwent the rite of circumciſion when all their teeth were completely formed, and Ebn al Athir betwixt the tenth and fifteenth year, which ſeems to correſpond pretty well with what we find advanced by Joſephus. The Arab writers affirm Mohammed to have been born both without a navel and a prepuce. 2. They frequently fed upon black-puddings, which conſiſted of the inteſtines of camels filled with their blood, which they called moſwadd. 3. They were extremely addicted to divination and augury. When any one of them ſet out upon a journey, he obſerved the firſt bird he met with; and, if it flew to the right, he purſued his journey, but if to the left, he returned home. Some of them paid the like regard to the motions of all other animals. When a perſon, diſtruſting the fidelity of his wife, went a journey, he tied together ſome of the boughs of a tree called Al-Ratam, and if upon his return he found them in the ſame poſition, he judged ſhe had been faithful to him, otherwiſe not. For the manner of their divination by arrows, we muſt beg leave to refer our readers to Dr. Pocock's ſpecimen hiſtoriæ Arabum. All the ſpecies of augury and divination were forbid by Mohammed; as likewiſe the plays of cheſs, dice, cards, &c. which in the Korân are comprehended under the name of Al Maiſer. 4. When a ſhe-camel or ewe had brought forth twins ten times, ſhe had an ear cut off, and was afterwards ſent to graze at liberty; but women were never permitted to taſte of her fleſh. 5. According to ſome authors, many of the idolatrous Koreiſh buried their daughters alive as ſoon as they were born, upon a mountain near Mecca, called Abu-Dalamah. 6. It was not uncommon for the Arabs to marry their father's wife, who, as they imagined, by an hereditary right, belonged to the eldeſt ſon, or, if he was already provided for, to one of his brethren; but this the moſt virtuous of them condemned as an ignominious and ſhocking crime, and ſtyled the perſon guilty of it Al-Daizan. 7. Some of them married two ſiſters; which Shahreſtani looks upon as one of the worſt things they were guil- Cuſtoms of the antient Arabs.

xxxvii. ver. 25. La Roque, voyage dans la Paleſt. p. 109, & alib. Vid. etiam Sale, ubi ſup. p. 25.

ty of. 8. Moſt of them went a pilgrimage to the Caaba, obſerving ſome particular ceremonies, which our readers will find deſcribed by Abulfeda. 9. The Caaba, their great temple or place of religious worſhip from the remoteſt antiquity, was their Keblah, or place towards which they turned themſelves when they prayed. 10. Every third year they intercalated a month, their year conſiſting of lunar months, as already obſerved. 11. They frequently waſhed their mouth and noſtrils, combed their hair, cleaned their teeth, pared their nails, and had other uſages conducive to external purification. 12. Whenever any one was found guilty of theft, they immediately cut off his right-hand. 12. They addreſſed themſelves to their kings in theſe terms, "May you avert all "malediction," or, according to Dr. Pocock, in order to ſhew their profound reſpect and reverence for, as well as ſubmiſſion to, his perſon, "He hath averted all malediction;" i. e. "May GOD be propitious to you," or, "May GOD "prolong your life." This form of ſalutation was firſt uſed to Yarab the ſon of Kàhtan, whoſe memory is held in great veneration by the Arabs to this day. 13. In Arabia Petræa a prince of one family, called the royal family, always governed, and was attended and ſerved by a perſon ſtyled the king's brother. 14. In Arabia Felix the king's brothers preceded his ſons, and had greater reſpect ſhewn them, as being more advanced in years. 15. The Troglodytes, in the neighbourhood of Arabia, lived a paſtoral life, and kept their wives and children in common. They were governed by ſeveral tyrants, who had wives, whom none of their ſubjects muſt lie with under the penalty of a ſheep. The women hung a fiſh-ſhell about their necks, which they believed to be a preſervative againſt all kinds of faſcination. 16. Strabo ſeems to intimate, that there was but one wife in a family, amongſt ſome tribes of the Arabs, with whom all the men lay by turns; and that, whilſt one was engaged with her, a ſtaff, which all of them walked with, was erected before the door of the tent, as a ſignal to prevent another's approach. But the ſenior of the family, who always governed it, lay with her in the night. adultery they puniſhed with death; but eſteemed him only guilty of it, who had to do with a woman of another tribe. 17. The Nabathæans were good œconomiſts, and therefore inflicted puniſhment publicly on ſuch as ſquandered away their ſubſtance; but paid great reſpect to ſuch as encreaſed it. 18. As they had very few ſlaves amongſt them, relations either ſerved at meals, and on other occaſions, or they aſſiſted one another, or, laſtly, ſerved themſelves; which uſage likewiſe wiſe extended to their phylarchs. 19. At their feaſts they generally admitted only thirteen perſons; and had always two muſicians to perform during the whole entertainment. 20. Their phylarchs had ſo little power, that they were almoſt upon a level with the populace, and had their conduct frequently inſpected into, and were obliged to give an account of it in perſon to a public aſſembly of their reſpective tribes. 21. Their cities were not walled round, ſcarce any foreign invader ever attempting to diſturb them. 22. It was a common practice among the Saracens or Scenite Arabs to have mercenary wives, hired for a time, marrying in one place, bringing forth in another, and educating their children in a third. Nor is this matter much altered ſince the admiſſion of divorces; on the contrary, amongſt many of them it is in all reſpects the ſame. 23. According to ſome authors, the antient Arabs circumciſed their daughters as well as their ſons. 24. When the Sabæans found themſelves near overcome by the ſtrong odours emitted by their perfumes and aromatic plants, they had recourſe to the fumes of bitumen, and the hair of goat's-beard ſet on fire under the noſe of the patient, which recovered them. 25. They reaped twice a year, having two harveſts as well as the Indians and Ethiopians. 26. In their wars they brought into the field a great number of camels, carrying each of them two archers ſitting back to back, that in any general action they might be able to oppoſe the enemy both in rear and in front at the ſame time. Several other cuſtoms prevailing amongſt the antient Arabs, depending upon the authority of the Korân, will be touched upon hereafter occaſionally, when we come to conſider the tenets and doctrines of that book [i].

[i] Agatharchid, Cnid. ubi ſup. Diod. Sic. l. ii. & l. iii. Strab. l. xvi. Philoſtorg. hiſt. eccleſiaſt. l. iii. Joſeph. antiquit. l. i. c. 23. Al Gazalius & Ebn al Athir apud Pocockium, in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 319. Al Zamakhſhar. Al Beidawi in c. v. Al-Korân. Mohammed. Al Moſtatraf. Mohammedes Alfirauzabadius & Al-Damirius apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 321, 322, 323, & ſeq. Korân Mohammed. paſſ. Al-Shariz. Al-Iallalan. & Al-Jauhar. apud Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 324---339. ut & ipſe Pocock. ibid. Hadrian. Reland. de relig. Mohammed. p. 79, 94, 117, 118. Al-Motarezzi apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 55, 56, 57. ut & Al Jauhar. Al Firauzabad. Ebn Al Athir, & ipſe Pocock. Ammian. Marcellin. l. xiv. c. 4. & l. xxiii. Ludolph. hiſt. Æthiop. l. i. Heideg. hiſt. patriarch. tom. ii. exercit. 7. ſect. 29. p. 241. Hadr. Reland, de relig. Mohammed. l. i. p. 75. Vid. etiam Al-Korân. Mohammed. Abulfed. alioſq; ſcript. Orient. paſſ.

CHAP. IX.

The hiſtory of the Arabs, to the time of Mohammed.

Joktan and his family ſettle in Arabia ſoon after the confuſion of languages.

JOKTAN the ſon of Eber, whom the Arabs call Kahtân, had thirteen ſons, who, ſome time after the confuſion of languages at Babel, ſettled in Arabia, extending themſelves from Meſha to Sephar, a mountainous diſtrict in the ſouth-eaſtern part of that peninſula. To this diſtrict, in all probability, part of the provinces of Hadramaut and Shihr correſponds, particularly that adjacent to the city of Dhafâr or Saphâr, in which ſome traces of Moſes's Sephar ſeem ſtill to be preſerved. The names of theſe thirteen planters were, Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab. As for Hadramaut, Seba, Ofir, and Kawilah, the ſons of Kahtan, mentioned by M. D'Herbelot, they were undoubtedly the ſame with Hazarmaveth, Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah; as appears, not only from the affinity of names, but likewiſe the order in which the three laſt are placed. According to Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Kahtân had thirty-one ſons by the ſame mother, of whom all but two, leaving Arabia, went and ſettled in India. Yarab, the elder of thoſe two, ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Yaman, giving name, if we will believe the Arab writers, both to their country and language, as has been already obſerved: Jorham, the younger, founded the kingdom of Hejâz, where his poſterity kept the throne till the time of Iſhmael. That Jarab and Jorham are the Jerah and Hadoram of Scripture, we cannot help thinking probable, though we are far from inſiſting upon it. Let this be admitted, and it will follow, that the ſecond king of Yaman was called Jerah or Yareah, not Yarab; and conſequently, that the peninſula of Arabia (A), and

(A) It is at leaſt equally improbable, that the peninſula of Arabia ſhould have been ſo denominated from we know not what mixture of different nations inhabiting it: for the Arabs agree, that they had only two principal planters, viz. Kahtân and Iſhmael,

and the Arabic tongue, could not have received their denominations from that prince, as the Arabs pretend. But whether Yarab and Jorham be the ſame perſons with Jerah and Hadoram or not, we cannot infer from the diſagreement betwixt their names, as M. Gagnier ſeems to have done, that every thing related by the Arabs of the former is a downright fiction; becauſe, as the language differed gradually more and more from the Hebrew, the Arabs undoubtedly altered the moſt antient proper names. Of this Hazarmaveth and Hadramaut, Joktan and Kahtân, which confeſſedly denote the ſame perſons, are a ſufficient proof. Elmacinus ſays, that Kahtân was the father of the Arabs, and that he begat many children, who choſe for their princes or leaders Saba, Ophir, and Gjawilah, i. e. Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah; which runs counter to what we find advanced by Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Abulfeda, and others. And this diſagreement between the moſt celebrated eaſtern writers, with regard to the firſt kings of Arabia, clearly evinces, that none of them, at leaſt in this point, can be entirely depended upon [a].

ISHMAEL,

[a] Abulfed. hiſt. cap. 4. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef apud Pocockium, in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 40. Gen. c. x. ver. 25---31. Safioddin. in lex. geographic. R. Saadias in verſion. Arab. pentat. R. Abraham. Zachut. in Sefer Iuchaſin. Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 82, 83. Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 40, 45, 78, 151. D'Herbel. bibl. Oriental. art. Saba & Hegiaz. Gagn. in diatrib. ſect. 1, 2. Georg. 'Ebn'ol-'Amid 'Elmacin in cod. MS. apud Gagn. ibid. Vid. etiam Univerſ. hiſt. vol. i. p. 380, 381.

mael, whoſe families by intermarriages became one and the ſame. And it is generally allowed, that no people in the world have had a leſs mixture with foreigners than the Arabs, nor have preſerved their antient cuſtoms and manners more invariably the ſame than they have done. Nor indeed can we conceive an introduction of foreign cuſtoms amongſt them likely to be effected, ſince neither the Perſians, Greeks, or Romans, could ever ſubdue them; and as for the Egyptians, though Seſac obliged a good part of Arabia to ſubmit to him, his ſucceſſors could not long keep their footing there. All the other etymons of Arabia, except that we have already given, are ſo apparently remote from truth, that not the leaſt regard is due unto them (1).

(1) Gagn. diatrib. ſect. 1. Abulfed. Ahmed Ebn. Yuſef apud Pocock. &c.

As does Ishmael the son of Abraham.

ISHMAEL, and his mother Hagar, having been dismissed by Abraham in the manner already related, retired into the wilderness of Paran, where they were supported by the Divine favour and assistance. GOD had assured Hagar in his distress, before the birth of Ishmael, that her son should be the father of a most numerous and potent nation; that he and his descendents should be wild, and live in a state of enmity with the rest of mankind; and yet that they should never be thoroughly subjugated by any foreign power. The truth of which most surprising prediction to demonstration appears, from the manner of life, disposition, power, government, &c. of the Scenite Arabs, or, as they are frequently now styled, the wild Arabs, from the age of Ishmael to this very day. For, from Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Ammianus Marcellinus, to omit other antient authors, as well as the relations of all modern travellers, who have visited the countries they inhabit, they now live in the same manner their father Ishmael did, and have always done so from his time to the present. Their disposition likewise is the same that it was predicted to be, as it always has been; that is, "their hand "has been against every man," and consequently, "every "man's hand against them;" since they always have, and still do, for the most part, live by pillaging passengers of all nations. They never were reduced to, or at least for any time continued in, a state of servitude, as appears from all the principal antient historians mentioning them, and their present almost absolute independence on the Turk; which gives us an idea of their power and government, sufficient to convince us of the agreement of both with the Divine prediction, relating to Ishmael and his posterity. The vast puissance and conquests of the Saracens, the descendents of Ishmael, as well as the similitude of their manners and those of the Ishmaelites, as foretold by GOD himself in the Mosaic history, likewise confirm the authority of Scripture in this particular. But this point our readers will find set in a just and proper light, by two authors, who deserve well both of literature and religion [b].

ISHMAEL,

[b] Gen. c. xxi. ver. 14---22. c. xvi. ver. 12. Univers. hist. vol. ii. p. 405, &c. Diod. Sic. Strab. Ammian. Marcellin. ubi sup. La Roque, voyage dans Palestine, p 213, 220, &c. Dr. Jackson's works, vol. ii. Lond. 1673. Revelat. examined with cand. dissert. iv. p. 114---152.

Iſhmael forms an alliance with the Jorhamites, by marriage.

ISHMAEL, as we learn from the ſacred hiſtorian, held his reſidence in the wilderneſs of Paran, and married an Egyptian. In conformity to the Divine prediction to Abraham, he had twelve ſons, the heads of ſo many tribes, which in after-ages grew exceedingly potent, whoſe names we have already given. The Arab writers ſay, that he took to wife the daughter of Modâd king of Hejâz, deſcended lineally from Jorham the founder of that kingdom. Be that as it will, he died at an hundred and thirty-ſeven years of age, probably not far from the borders of Egypt. As the Arabs have always conſidered him, and ſtill do conſider him, as the father of the greateſt part of their nation, and this notion is ſtrongly countenanced by Scripture, we may look upon him and Joktan as the principal planters of Arabia. This ſeems an additional proof to thoſe already offered, that the (B) Cuſhites did not ſettle in any great numbers here, or at leaſt, that their ſettlement was not of any long continuance, but that they paſſed, either through Egypt, or on the eaſtern coaſt of the Red Sea, and over the ſtreights of Bab al Mandab, into Ethiopia. The ſilence of the Orientals, with regard to ſuch a ſettlement, ſeems to confirm what is here advanced. We muſt not imagine, that the Scenite Arabs were the only deſcendents of Iſhmael, though probably they might be the bulk of them; ſince Moſes gives us to underſtand, that ſome Iſhmaelites had caſtles and towns. For all other particulars relating to Iſhmael, our readers may have recourſe to the Jewiſh hiſtory [c].

Some particulars relating to the kings of Hamyar.

IN order to render our hiſtory of the antient Arabs as complete as poſſible, we ſhall here give our readers catalogues of the kings of Hamyar, or Yaman, Hira, Ghaſſân, and Hejâz, extracted from the beſt Oriental hiſtorians.

[c] Gen. c. xxi. ver. 20, 21. c. xvii. ver. 20. Al-Jannabius, Vid. etiam Pocock. not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 78, 79. Gen. c. xxv. ver 17. Abulfed. Al-Firauzabad. alioſq; ſcriptor. Arabic. Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xviii. p. 110, 111. Gen. c. xxv. ver. 16.

(B) The ſcripture ſeems to diſtinguiſh the Arabs from the Cuſhites, when it makes a branch of the former contiguous to the latter. The paſſage here referred to will give great ſtrength to what has been already advanced, in relation to the firſt ſettlements of the Cuſhites (2).

(2) 2 Chron. c. xxi. ver. 16. Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xviii. paſſ.

As the kings of Hamyar were the moſt conſiderable princes in Arabia, it will be proper to begin with them. But, before we do this, ſome particulars relating to them muſt be premiſed. The kingdom of Yaman, or at leaſt the better part of it, particularly the provinces of Saba and Hadramaut, was governed by princes of the tribe of Hamyar, the ſon of Saba, the great-grandſon of Kahtân, though at length the kingdom was tranſlated to the deſcendents of Cahlân his brother, who yet retained the title of king of Hamyar. The Hamyarites were called Homerites by the latter Greek and Latin authors, and Immirenians by Theodorus Lector; all their princes had the general title of Tobba, which ſignifies ſucceſſor, as the Egyptian kings had that of Pharaoh, the Roman emperors that of Cæſar, and the ſucceſſors of Mohammed that of Khalif. Several leſſer princes reigned in other parts of Yaman, but they were chiefly, if not entirely, ſubject to the king of Hamyar, who was ſtyled the great king. But, as hiſtory has recorded nothing of theſe reguli, that deſerves the leaſt attention, we ſhall drop them, and immediately proceed to the ſeries of the kings of Yaman or Hamyar [d].

Kahtân. 1. KAHTAN, or Joktan, the ſon of Eber, is ſaid to have firſt reigned, and wore a diadem, in Yaman; but how long he ſat upon the throne, or what remarkable events happened during his reign, we no-where learn [e].

Yarab. 2. YARAB, the ſon of Kahtân, was a prince greatly celebrated by the Arab hiſtorians; but as the principal things related of him have already been taken notice of, we ſhall proceed to his ſucceſſor [f].

Yaſhab. 3. YASHAB, ſon to the preceding prince, has had only his name tranſmitted down to us [g].

Abd Shems. 4. ABD SHEMS, i. e. "the ſervant of the ſun," ſurnamed Saba, the ſon of Yaſhab, next aſcended the throne; who, who, the Arab hiſtorians tell us, was ſucceſsful in his expeditions againſt his enemies, carried off great ſpoils, and took many of them priſoners. Hence, they pretend, he derived his ſurname, which to us ſeems by no means probable: it is more likely, that it was uſed before in his family, ſince the Scripture mentions Sheba, or Saba, one of the ſons of Joktan. He is ſaid to have built the city of Saba or Mâreb, as likewiſe that ſtupendous mound or building, which formed the vaſt reſervoir above that city. By means of this reſervoir, which received all the water that came down from the mountains, the kings of Yaman did not only ſupply the inhabitants of Saba, and their lands, with water, but likewiſe kept the territories they had ſubdued in greater awe; ſince, by cutting them off from a communication with it, they could at any time greatly diſtreſs them. Abd Shems had many ſons, but the moſt noted of them were Hamyar, Amru, Cahlân, and Aſhaar [h].

[d] Mohammedes Al-Firauzabadius, Ebn Athir, Abulfed. Al-Jauhar. Vide etiam Pocock. not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 65, 66. & Sale ubi ſupra, p 9, 10. Theodor. Lect. l. ii. p. 567. Vide etiam Aſſeman. not. in Sim. epiſc. Beth. Arſamenſ. in bibl. Orient. tom. i. [e] Abulfed. hiſt. c. 4. Scholiaſt. in poem Ebn Abduni. Georg. Ebno'l Amid Elmac. ubi ſup. [f] Al Motarezzi in lib. Mogr. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef apud Pocockium, in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 40. Pocock. in orat. ante carmen Tograi, ſub init. & alib. Ebn Shohnah. Vide etiam Abulfed ubi ſup. [g] Pocockius, in not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 57.

5. HAMYAR, the ſon of Abd Shems or Saba, according to the Oriental authors, was ſo called from the red cloaths he wore. This ſeems a plain indication, that Hamyar was only a ſurname. He expelled Thamûd from Yaman, who took refuge in Hejâz. From this prince the tribe or kingdom of Hamyar deduced its name. Some aſſert, that not Kahtân, but Hamyar, was the firſt king of Yaman that wore a diadem [i]. Hamyar.

6. WAYEL, the ſon of Hamyar, according to Abulfeda, ſucceeded him in the kingdom; but other authors make his brother Cahlân his ſucceſſor [k]. Wayel.

7. AFTER Wayel reigned his ſon Alſacſac [l]. Alſacſac.

8. YAAFAR, the ſon of Alſacſac, next mounted the throne [m]. Yaafar.

9. To him ſucceeded Dhu Riyaſh [n]. Dhu Riyaſh.

10. AFTER him Al Nooman, the ſon of Yaafar, ſwayed the ſceptre of Yaman [o]. Al Nooman.

11. THEN came Aſmah, the ſon of Nooman [p]. Aſmah.

4. SHADDAD,

[h] Idem ibid. Geogr. Nubienſ. clim. ii. par. 6. Golii notæ ad Alfragan. p. 87. Vide etiam Sale ubi ſupra, p. 10. [i] Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Al-Jannabius, Golii notæ ad Alfragan. ubi ſup. Pocock. not. ad ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 57. [k] Abulfed. apud Pocock. ubi ſupra, p. 58. [l] Al Jauhar. [m] Pocock. ubi ſupra, p. 58. [n] Idem ibid. [o] Idem ibib. [p] Poc. ubi ſup.

Shaddâd. 12. SHADDAD, the ſon of Ad, the ſon of Al Matata, the ſon of Saba, a very potent prince, ſucceeded Aſmah [q].

Lokmân. 13. LOKMAN, the brother of Shaddâd, was the next king, according to the moſt received opinion, though ſome authors are of a different ſentiment [r].

Dhu Sadâd. 14. HE was ſucceeded by his brother Dhu Sadâd [s].

Al Hareth. 15. AL HARETH, the ſon of Dhu Sadâd, next aſcended the throne. He greatly enriched the kingdom of Yaman, and was the firſt who had the title or ſurname of Tobba above-mentioned given him by his ſubjects [t].

Dhu'l Karnain. 16. DHU'L KARNAIN ASSAAB, the next king, was the ſon of Rayeſh. This was the two-horned prince mentioned in the Korân, and not Alexander the great, as we learn from Ebn Abbas [u].

Dhu'l Manar. 17. DHU'L MANAR ABRAHAH, the ſon of Dhu'l Karnain, ſucceeded his father; but nothing remarkable happened during his reign [w].

Africus. 18. AFRICUS, the ſon of Dhu'l Manar Abrahah, from whence that part of the world called Africa was ſo denominated, according to ſome of the eaſtern writers, next took the reigns of government upon him [x].

Dhu'l Adhaar Amru. 19. DHU'L ADHAAR AMRU, the ſon of Africus, who reigned after his father, received the name or ſurname of "lord of terrors," from the terror with which his ſubjects were ſtruck at the ſight of certain monſtrous men, or ſatyrs, or apes, as ſome will have it, whom he had taken priſoners in war, and brought into Yaman [y].

Sharhabil. 20. THE Hamyarites placed upon the throne Sharhabil, of the poſterity of Alſacſac, in the room of Dhu'l Adhaar Amru, whom for ſome enormity they expelled from thence [z].

Al Hodhad. 21. AL HODHAD, the ſon of Sharhabil, ſucceeded his father [a].

Balkis. 22. BALKIS, the ſon of Hodhad, is ſaid to have reigned twenty years. According to ſome authors, Al Hodhad was ſucceeded ſucceeded by a daughter named Balkis or Belkis, whom they aſſert to be the famous queen of Sheba, who had an interview with Solomon, king of Iſrael, at Jeruſalem [b].

[q] Idem ibid. [r] Al Jannabius, Al Firauzabadius, &c. [s] Poc. ubi ſup. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Al Korân Mohammed. c. 18. Ebn Abbas. Vide etiam Pocockium, ubi ſup. [w] Pocock. ubi ſup. Scholiaſt. in poem. ſupra, p. 59. [x] Al Jannabius, Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Ebn Abnuni, &c. [y] Pocockius, ubi ſupra. [z] Idem ibid. [a] Idem ibid.

23. NASHEROL'NEAM, ſo called from his ſurpriſing magnificence and liberality, was likewiſe ſtyled ſimply Malec, or king. Having had bad ſucceſs in an expedition, wherein his army was overwelmed by torrents of ſand, he cauſed a brazen ſtatue to be erected, with this inſcription, in the old Hamyaritic character, engraven upon it; "There is "no paſſage behind me; no moving further; the ſon of "Sharhabil [c]." Nasherol'neam.

24. SHAMER YARAASH, the ſon of Naſher, ſwayed the ſceptre after Naſherol'neam. We are told, that he was ſo denominated from the tremor that always poſſeſſed him, and that he gave name to the city of Samarcand. That Samarcand was built by one of the Hamyaritic kings, ſurnamed Tobba, ſeems to be a point agreed upon by the beſt of the eaſtern writers. To confirm this notion, it is pretended, an inſcription in the old Hamyaritic character was found under one of the gates of Samarcand; though what this inſcription imported, we are no-where informed. It is poſſible the authors that relate this may miſtake the old Cufic character for the Hamyaritic, ſince in the time of Arabſhah conſiderable quantities of dirhems, and a ſmall coin called a falous, with Cufic letters upon them, were frequently dug up at old Samarcand. That the Hamyaritic, Cufic, and modern Arabic alphabets were derived from that of the Hebrews, as the excellent Loeſcher and Schultens with great reaſon ſuppoſe, ſeems farther to appear from hence, that the Arabs, in order to help the memory, diſtribute their letters into ſix words, Abjad, Howaz, Hotai, Calman, Saaphas, and Karſhat; wherein the order of the Hebrew alphabet is exactly preſerved. This, in conjunction with others, we take to be no contemptible argument in favour of what Loeſcher and Schultens have advanced [d]. Shamer Yaraaſh.

25. ABU MALEC the ſon of Shamer, after his father's death, took poſſeſſion of the throne [e]. Abu Malec.

26. AMRAN,

[b] Golii notæ ad Alfragan. p. 296. Geogr. Nubienſ. clim. 1. par. 6. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. in voc. Balkis. [c] Pocockius, ubi ſup. [d] Idem ibid. p. 60. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. in voc. Tobba. Arabſhah in vit. Timur. Poc. in orat. ante carmen Tograi, p. 4. [e] Idem ibid.

Amran. 26. AMRAN, the ſon of Amer, a deſcendent of Cahlân, the brother of Hamyar, to whoſe family the kingdom of Hamyar was now tranſlated, was inveſted with the regal power upon the deceaſe of Abu Malec. The Orientals repreſent this prince as a wiſe man, or ſoothſayer [f].

Amru. 27. AMRU, the ſon of Amer, ſurnamed Mazikia, or Dilacerator, becauſe every night he tore to pieces two garments he had worn the preceding day, ſucceeded the former king [g].

Al Alkran. 28. AL ALKRAN, the ſon of Abimalec, governed Yaman after Amru [i].

Dhu Habſhan. 29. DHU HABSHAN, the ſon of Akkran, upon the laſt prince's demiſe, took poſſeſſion of the government. This prince put to death Taſm and Jadis [k].

Tobba. 30. TOBBA, or Tobbaa, the ſon of Alkran, ſucceeded Dha Habſhan [l].

Colaicarb. 31. COLAICARB, or, according to ſome, Molaic Yacrab, aſcended the throne of Hamyar after the death of the laſt prince [m].

Abu Carb. Aſaad. 32. ABU CARB ASAAD, the ſucceeding king, we find mentioned in the Korân. He lived ſeven hundred years before Mohammed, adorned the Caab with hangings or tapeſtry, and firſt introduced Judaiſm amongſt the Hamyarites. The Oriental writers ſay, that he was put to death by his ſubjects, probably on the ſcore of religion [n].

Haſſan Tobbai. 33. HASSAN TOBBAI, his ſon, cut off all his father's murderers, and was at laſt ſlain by his brother [o].

Amru Tobbai. 34. AMRU TOBBAI, the ſon of Haſſan Tobbai, was ſurnamed dominus lignorum, or "Lord of wood", becauſe through the whole courſe of his reign he was ſo infirm and indiſpoſed, that he was always carried about in a wooden chair [p].

Abd Celal. 35. ABD CELAL, the ſon of Dul'awad, entered upon the government after Amru Tobbai [q].

Tobba. 36. TOBBA, the ſon of Haſſan, the ſon of Colaicarb, ſurnamed Tobba minor, ſucceeded Abd Celal [r].

37. NEXT

[f] Poc. ubi ſup. [g] Al Jauharius, Al Firauzabadius, &c. [i] Poc. ubi ſup. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Idem ibid. [m] Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Al Jannabius, &c. [n] Al Korân. Mohammed. c. 50. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Al Jannabius, Scholiaſt. Ebn Abduni, &c. [o] Pocock. ubi ſupra, p. 61. [p] Idem ibid. [q] Idem ibid. [r] Abulfed. apud Pocockium, ubi ſup.

37. NEXT came Al Hareth, who embraced Judaiſm [s]. Al Hareth.

38. The thirty-eighth king of Yaman was Morthed, the ſon of Celal [t]. Morthed.

39. WACIAA, the ſon of Morthed, was declared king after his father's deceaſe [u]. Waciaa.

40. ABRAHAH, the ſon of Alſabah, reigned after Waciaa [w]. Abrahah.

41. SABBAN mounted the throne upon Abrahah's death, or, according to ſome of the Oriental writers, Ebn Dakikan. Ebn Dakikan had that famous ſword of Ebn Maad Cerb called Samſama; this ſword came afterwards into the hands of the khâlif Râſhid, who with it cut in two ſeveral noble ſwords, ſent him as a preſent by the Greek emperor, in the preſence of that prince's embaſſadors, who brought them, without doing it the leaſt damage. How far this ſtory may be depended upon, we ſhall not take upon us to determine [x]. Sabban.

42. DHU SHANATER, according to Al Firauzabadius, had ſix fingers on each hand. He was dethroned by the Hamyarites for being abandoned to an unnatural ſpecies of luſt, and abuſing ſeveral youths of ſome of the nobleſt families amongſt them [y]. Dhu Shanater.

43. YUSEF, ſurnamed Dhu Nowas, from his flowing curls, lived about ſeventy years before Mohammed. He perſecuted all who would not turn Jews, putting them to death by various tortures, the moſt common of which was, throwing them into a glowing pit of fire; whence he had the opprobrious appellation of "the lord of the pit." This perſecution we find mentioned in the Korân [z]. Yuſef.

44. DHU JADAN, i. e. "the perſon with a ſweet voice," ſucceeded Dhu Nowas, and was the laſt of the Hamyaritic monarchs, according to Abulfeda; but Ahmed Ebn Yuſef and Al Jannabius make Dhu Nowas the laſt prince of the true Hamyaritic line, reigning in a continual ſucceſſion. He was a bigotted Jew, as juſt obſerved, and treated his Chriſtian ſubjects with ſuch barbarity, that Eleſbaas, or Eleſbaan, king of Ethiopia, ſent over forces to aſſiſt them. Dhu Nowas, not being Dhu Jadan.

[s] Pocock. ubi ſup. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Idem ibid. [w] Pocock. ubi ſup. [x] Abulfeda, Al Jannabius. [y] Al Firauzabadius. Vide etiam Pocock. ubi ſupra, p. 62. [z] Baronius in annal. ad ſec. 6. Theophan. Niceph. Calliſt. Sim. Metaphraſt. Pag. &c. Vide etiam Aſſaman. bibliothec. Orient. vol. i. p. 359--- 385.

being able to make head againſt the Ethiopians, was at laſt drove to that extremity, that he forced his horſe into the ſea, and loſt both his crown and life together. According to Ahmed Ebn Yuſef above-mentioned, he reigned ſixty-ſix years, which, though improbable, does not exceed all belief, as does the length of his reign recorded by Al Jannabius. The Najâſhi, or king of Ethiopia, after this, eſtabliſhed the Chriſtian religion in Yaman, and fixed upon the throne there.

Aryat. 45. ARYAT, an Ethiopian [a].

Abraha al Aſhram. 46. ABRAHA EBN AL SABAH, ſurnamed Al Aſhram, i. e. "the ſlit-noſed," from a ſlaſh in his face, where he had formerly received a wound, was the ſecond Ethiopian king, or rather viceroy to the Najâſhi, in Yaman. He was ſtyled "the lord of the elephant;" the reaſon of which appellation appears from the following ſtory, handed down to us by the commentators upon the Korân. Abraha built a magnificent church for the Chriſtians in Sanaa, the metropolis of Yaman, with a deſign to draw the Arabs to go in pilgrimage thither, inſtead of viſiting Mecca, as they before had done; which he imagined would greatly contribute towards their converſion to Chriſtianity: for he doubted not aboliſhing paganiſm, could he deſtroy the veneration of the Arabs for the Caaba, by bringing them to a place more ſumptuous and grand, and which would more ſtrongly attract their curioſity, and gradually excite their devotion. This had ſoon ſuch an effect, that the devotion and concourſe of the pilgrims at the Caaba began conſiderably to diminiſh; which being obſerved by the Koreiſh, who were ſuperſtitiouſly fond of that place, they ſent one Nofail, as he is named by ſome, of the tribe of Kenânah, to offer an indignity to the Chriſtian church at Sanaa, in order to leſſen that religious regard, which the Arabs began to have for it. Nofail therefore getting into it by night, upon a ſolemn feſtival, defiled the altar and walls thereof with his excrements; and, making his eſcape by favour of the night, publiſhed every-where what he had done. At this profanation Abraha being highly incenſed, vowed the deſtruction of the Caaba, and to that end aſſembled a conſiderable body of forces, wherein were ſeveral elephants, which he had obtained of the king of Ethiopia, their number being, as ſome ſay, thirteen; though others mention but one, at the head of which he advanced towards Mecca. The Meccans, unable to

[a] Abulfed, Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, & Al Jannabius. Prideaux's life of Mahom. p. 61.

to defend their temple and city, and terrified at Abraha's approach, particularly on account of his elephants, none of which creatures had ever before been ſeen in Arabia, retired to the neighbouring mountains, where they entrenched themſelves. But GOD HIMSELF, at this juncture, interpoſed in an extraordinary manner: for when the Ethiopian drew near to Mecca, and would have entered it, the elephant on which he rode, being a large one, and named Mahmud, refuſed to advance any nigher to the town, but kneeled down whenever they endeavoured to force him that way, though he would riſe, and march briſkly enough, if they turned him towards any other quarter. As he was the chief of the elephants, and, both by reaſon of his ſize and whiteneſs, greatly revered by the others, they immediately followed him, ſo that Abraha could not ſo much as reconnoitre the town. The Meccans, obſerving this from their retrenchment, were at a loſs to what to attribute ſo unexpected a motion, believing that the enemy were going to return home. In the mean time, whilſt matters were in this ſituation, a large flock of birds, called Ababil, like ſwallows, came flying on a ſudden from the ſea-coaſt, every one of which carried three ſtones, one in each foot, and one in its bill, of a middle ſize betwixt a ſmall lentil and a vetch, but ſo ponderous, that, being let fall, they pierced through the helmets and bodies of men, and even, according to ſome, the elephants likewiſe, which they threw down upon Abraha's ſoldiers, certainly killing every one they ſtruck. Then GOD ſent a flood, which ſwept the dead bodies, and ſome of them who had not been ſtruck by the ſtones, into the ſea: the reſt fled towards Yaman, but periſhed by the way, none of them reaching Sanaa, except only Abraha himſelf, who died ſoon after his arrival there, being ſtruck with a ſort of plague, or putrefaction, ſo that his body opened, and his limbs rotted off by piece-meal. It is ſaid, that one of Abraha's army, named Abu Yacſum, or, according to others, Abraha himſelf, eſcaped over the Red Sea into Ethiopia, and, going directly to the king, told him the tragical ſtory. Upon which, that prince aſked him what ſort of birds they were, that had occaſioned ſuch a deſtruction; in anſwer to which queſtion he pointed to one of them, which had followed him all the way, and was at that time hovering directly over his head; which he had no ſooner done, than the bird let fall the ſtone, and laid him dead at the king's feet. Some of the Mohammedan writers ſay, that the names of all the perſons to be deſtroyed were inſcribed on the ſtones that deſtroyed them; them; that this flock of birds conſiſted of two ſorts, one whoſe feathers were black, and bill white; the other all over green except the bill, which was yellow: and that they threw all their ſtones at once upon the Ethiopians. This memorable event, according to the Mohammedans, is ſaid to have happened in the time of Abd al Motalleb, the grand-father of Mohammed, and the very year in which that impoſtor was born [b].

THAT this piece of hiſtory has all the air of one of thoſe fictions with which the Arab writings in general, and the Korân in particular, abound, will be readily acknowledged by all our intelligent readers. We therefore, with Dr. Prideaux, rather take the fact therein aſſerted to be a creature of Mohammed's brain, than a feat of evil ſpirits, as is ſuggeſted by father Marracci; and yet, ſuppoſing it a real fact, we ſee no abſurdity in this laſt notion. The very learned Mr. Sale, to our no ſmall ſurprize, is of opinion, that this ridiculous ſtory, for ſo we cannot help terming it, is not without ſome foundation, ſince "it ſeems to him, that there was ſomething extra-"ordinary in the matter." The reaſons he alledges in ſupport of this opinion, are the two following. 1. The event is ſaid to have happened not above fifty-four years before the pretended revelation mentioning it was made; and therefore had it been a fiction, ſeveral living witneſſes could have diſproved it; which we find never was done, and conſequently may preſume, that the reality of this remarkable action could not be denied. 2. Mohammed had no occaſion to coin a miracle to gain the temple of Mecca any greater veneration, the people of Mecca being already ſo religiouſly attached to it, that he was obliged, contrary to his original plan, to make it the chief place of his new-invented worſhip. In anſwer to the firſt reaſon, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that, according to Mr. Sale himſelf, after Abu Becr had vouched for Mohammed's veracity, in the twelfth year of his miſſion, which falls within the time mentioned, his diſciples were ready to ſwallow whatever he was pleaſed to impoſe upon them; that the ſtory, as told in the Korân, is ſuppoſed a revelation, and and therefore might only deſcribe the ſupernatural unknown cauſe of a noted defeat; that Mr. Sale himſelf allows the thing might be worked up into a miracle, at which it muſt be owned, none of the preceding Arabs had ſo excellent a knack as Mohammed; and, laſtly, that the ſame turn and genius appear in this as in the moſt extravagant abſurdities of that impoſtor. To the ſecond reaſon it may be replied, that we are under no neceſſity to allow, though Dr. Prideaux ſuppoſes it, that the gaining a veneration to the Caaba amongſt the pagan Arabs was the motive to the forging ſuch a ſtory; on the contrary, it appears that this could not poſſibly be the motive, even from Mr. Sale's own obſervation, viz, becauſe the Meccans, or pagan Arabs, held their temple in the higheſt veneration at the time this pretended revelation happened. But, notwithſtanding this, Mohammed might coin a miracle, either to draw the chriſtian Arabs to Mecca, and make them converts to his religion, or to render them odious to all the other Arabs; which, from the whole tenour of the ſtory, appears to have been his deſign. But as what Mr. Sale has offered on this occaſion ſeems rather to proceed from a deſire of ſhewing ſome diſreſpect to Dr. Prideaux, on account of his attachment to religion in general, than a full perſuaſion of the truth of what he ſeems to advance, we ſhall offer nothing farther on this head, but immediately reſume the thread of our hiſtory [c].

[b] Al Korân. Mohammed. c. 105. Al Zamakhſhar. Al Beidawi, Jallalan. Al Ceſhaf, Abulfed. hiſt. Gen. Al Jannab. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Ebno'l Athir apud Abulfed. Al Gjuzius, in lib. de ritib. peregrinat. c. 78. Khondemir, Houſſain Vaez com. in Al Kor. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. in voc. Abraha. Prideaux's life of Mahomet, p. 61. Vide etiam Pocockium ubi ſupra, p. 64.

47. YACSUM, the ſon of Abraha, ſucceeded him; but we find nothing remarkable related of him by any antient hiſtorians [d]. Yacſum.

48. MASRUK, another ſon of Abraha, and the laſt of the Ethiopian princes in Yaman, came to the throne after Yacſum. The Ethiopians, according to ſome eaſtern writers, occupied the kingdom of Hamyar about ſeventy-two years [e]. Maſruk.

49. SEIF EBN DHU YAZAN, of the old royal family of Hamyar, having obtained ſuccours of Khoſrû Anuſhirwân, king of Perſia, which had been denied him by the emperor Heraclius, recovered the throne, and drove out the Ethiopians, but was himſelf ſlain by ſome of them, who were left behind. The Perſians appointed the ſucceeding princes, Wahzar, Marzaban, Sihan, Jorjis or Georgius, and Bazan, Seif Ebn Duh Yazan.

[c] Sale's tranſlation of the Korân, ch. cv. p. 501, 502. & not. Prid. ubi ſupra, & ſeq. Ludovicus Marraccius, in refut. Alcoran. p. 823. Patavii, 1698. [d] Pocock. ubi ſup. [e] Al Jannabius.

till Yaman fell into the hands of Mohammed, to whom Bazan, or rather Badhân the laſt of them, ſubmitted, and embraced his new religion. This induced Mohammed to give Shahr, the ſon of Bazan, part of his father's dominions [f].

Duration of the kingdom of Hamyar.

THUS ſtands the ſeries of the kings of Hamyar, which we wiſh was more perfect. The petty princes already mentioned, tributary to the king of Hamyar, were ſtyled Al Kail, and the governors of provinces Al Makawel. According to Abulfeda, this monarchy continued 2020, years or above 3000, if we will believe Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, and Al Jannabius. The length of the reign of each prince muſt be allowed to be very uncertain. The hiſtory of the kings of Hamyar, ſurnamed Tobba or Tobbai, which the Arabs pronounce Tababêah, and Tabbâïah, has been wrote by Shahabeddin Ahmed Ebn Abdalvahah; Al Bekri, Al Teïmi, Al Kendi, ſurnamed Nouaïri, author of an univerſal hiſtory, which he dedicated to Naſſer Mohammed Ebn Calaoun, ſultan of the Mamalukes. For an account of this work, we muſt refer our readers to M. D'Herbelot. Nouaïri died in the year of the Hejra 732 [g].

The inundation of Al Arem.

IT has been already obſerved, that Saba made a vaſt mound or dam, to ſerve as a baſon or reſervoir, to ſupply the inhabitants of the city built by him, and called after his name, with water, which it conſtantly received from the mountains, as alſo to keep the country his predeceſſors had ſubdued in greater awe, by rendering him maſter of the water. This building ſtood like a mountain above the city, and was by the Sabæans eſteemed ſo ſtrong, that they were under no apprehenſion of its ever failing. The water roſe to the height of almoſt twenty fathoms, and was kept in on every ſide by a work ſo ſolid, that many of them had their houſes built upon it. Every family had a certain portion of this water diſtributed by aqueducts. But at length GOD, being highly diſpleaſed at their pride and inſolence, and reſolving to humble and diſperſe them, ſent a mighty flood, which broke down the mound by night, while the inhabitants were aſleep, and carried away the whole city with the neighbouring towns and people. This inundation is ſtyled in the Koràn the inundation of Al Arem, and occaſioned ſo terrible a deſtruction, that from thence it became a proverbial ſaying, to expreſs a total diſperſion, that they

[f] Pocock. ubi ſupra, p. 64, 65. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, ibid.
[g] Al Jauharius, Abulfeda, Al Firâuzabadius. Vide etiam Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, & Al Jannabium, apud Pocockium ubi ſupra, p. 62, 63. D'Herbel. in voc. Nouairi, p. 674, 675. & voc. Tobba, p. 889.

they were gone and ſcattered like Saba. Al Beidawi ſuppoſes the aforeſaid mound to have been the work of queen Balkîs, and that the above-mentioned cataſtrophe happened after the time of JESUS CHRIST. But both theſe notions run counter to the moſt received opinion, which attributes the building of Al Arem to Saba, and fixes its deſtruction about the time of Alexander the great. Be that as it will, no leſs than eight tribes, viz. thoſe of Anmâr, Jodhâm, Al Azd, Tay, Khozâab, Banu Amela, &c. were forced to abandon their dwellings on this occaſion, ſome of which gave riſe to the kingdoms of Hira and Ghaſſân [h] (B).

Foundation of the kingdom of Hira.

THE kingdom of Hira was founded by Malec, a deſcendent of Cahlân, in Chaldæa or Irâk; but after three deſcents the throne came by marriage to the Lakhmians. Theſe princes, whoſe general name was Mondar, preſerved their dominion, notwithſtanding ſome ſmall interruption by the Perſians, till the khalifat of Abubecr, when Al Mondar Maghrûr, the laſt of them, loſt his life and crown by the arms of Khaled Ebn al Walîd. The kingdom of the Mondars, ſuppoſed to be the deſcendents of Nadar Ebn Rabia, continued, according to Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, ſix hundred twenty-two years and eight months. Its princes were under the protection of the kings of Perſia, whoſe lieutenants they were over the Arabs of Irâk, as the kings of Ghaſſân were for the Roman emperors over thoſe of Syria. The Lakhmians were deſcended from Lakhm the ſon of Amru, the ſon of Saba. If the kingdom of the Lakhmians or Mondars was not of any longer duration than ſix hundred and twenty-two or twenty-three years, Al Beidawi ſeems not to be much miſtaken, when he affirms the inundation of Al Arem to have happened after the birth of CHRIST, notwithſtanding the authority of thoſe who carry it above three centuries higher. This [h] Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 87. Geogr Nubienſ. clim. 2. par. 6. Al Korân. Mohammed. c. 34. Al Beidawi. Jallal. Poc. not. in ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 42, 45, 66.

(B) At this time likewiſe, probably happened the migration of thoſe tribes or colonies which were led into Meſopotamia by three different chiefs, Becr, Modar, and Rabîa; from whence the three provinces of that country are ſtill named Diyar Becr, Diyar Modar, and Diyar Rabîa (2).

(2) Golii notæ ad Alfragan. p. 232.

ſpace was taken up by the reigns of the following kings, according to the beſt Oriental hiſtorians [i].

Malec. 1. MALEC, who, ſay ſome of the eaſtern writers, flouriſhed in the time of the kings of the provinces, that is, of the governors Alexander the great appointed to preſide over the provinces of Perſia [k].

Amru. 2. AMRU, Malec's brother [l].

Jodaimah. 3. JODAIMAH, the ſon of Malec, ſurnamed Al Abraſh, who firſt uſed amongſt the Arabs that military engine called a balliſta. He defeated Amru, an Arab prince of the tribe of Amalek, who reigned in Meſopotamia, and put him to the ſword; but was afterwards himſelf aſſaſſinated, by the contrivance of Zoba, Amru's daughter, with whom he was greatly enamoured [m].

Amru. 4. AMRU, the ſon of Ad and Rakaſh the ſiſter of Jodaimah, by the aſſiſtance of one Koſair, who had been ſervant to Jodaimah, revenged the murder of his uncle by the following ſtratagem: Koſair, at his own deſire, had his ears cut off, and was whipped in a moſt cruel manner, by Amru's order; after which he fled to Zoba, making the heavieſt complaints of the inhuman treatment he had met with. By this means he ſoon became a confident of Zoba, who permitted him to convey into her caſtle ſome large cheſts, full, as was given out, of wares, but, in reality, of armed men, who immediately diſpatched her. The memory of Amru is ſtill preſerved amongſt the Arabs by ſeveral proverbs which particularly allude to him [n].

Amrio'l Kais. 5. AMRIO'L KAIS, the ſon of Amru, ſurnamed Albada, ſucceeded his father [o].

Amru. 6. AMRU, the ſon of Amrio'l Kais, flouriſhed in the time of Sabur, or Sapor, Dil Actaf, king of Perſia. This Perſian monarch, whoſe ſurname imports as much, according to Abulfeda, cut off the ſhoulders of all the Arabs he took priſoners, in a war he had with that nation. His mother's name was Mary, whoſe ear-rings occaſioned a proverb amongſt the Arabs. If this piece of hiſtory may be depended upon, it is an additional proof of the truth of what Al Beidawi has advanced in relation to the time when the innundation of Al Arem happened [p].

7. AUS,

[i] Poc. ubi ſupra, p. 66, 74. Procop. in Perſ. apud Photium, p. 71, &c. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Al Beidawi, &c. [k] Poc. ubi ſupra, p. 66. [l] Idem ibid. [m] Mohammedes Al Firauzabadius, Al Jannabius, Ahmed Ebn Yuſef. [n] Pocockius ubi ſupra, p. 67, 68. [o] Idem ibid. [p] Abulfeda, Al Beidawi.

7. AUS, the ſon of Kalam, an Amalekite[q]. Aus.

8. ANOTHER Amalekite prince, whoſe name is not known, ſucceeded Aus; after whoſe deceaſe the crown reverted to the family of the Lakhmians, after an interruption of two deſcents[r]. An anonymous king.

9. AMRIO'L KAIS, the ſon of Amru, next aſcended the throne. He was ſurnamed Almohrek, or the burner, becauſe he firſt tortured criminals with fire[s]. Amrio'l Kais.

10. AL NOOMAN, the ſon of Amrio'l Kais, ſurnamed Alawar, or the blinkard, who, when he had reigned thirty years, abdicated the government, and retired from the world, ſaying, "What ſignifies a kingdom that will certainly have "an end?" Al Nooman built thoſe caſtles or towers called Khaouarnak and Al Sadir, ſo celebrated by the Arab poets and proverbs. Senemmar, the builder of Khaouarnak, was thrown head-long from thence by Al Nooman's order, which gave occaſion to the proverb, "The reward of Senemmar." We are told, that Al Nooman became a convert to the Chriſtian religion, and in conſequence thereof thought fit to reſign the reins of government to his ſon Hendu, as juſt hinted. Jezdegerd, king of Perſia, committed the care of his ſon's education, and the eſtabliſhment of his conſtitution, to Al Nooman, who was afterwards very inſtrumental in fixing him upon the throne of his anceſtors. The cauſe of Senemmar's tragical end, and all the other remarkable particulars relating to the reign of the prince we are now upon, our readers will find an ample account of in the hiſtory of the Perſians[t]. Al Nooman.

11. AL MONDAR EBN NOOMAH, the Hendu of the Perſian hiſtorians, attended Baharam, the ſon of Jezdegerd, into Perſia, with an army of 40000 men, to enable him to dethrone one Kerſa, an uſurper whom the Magi had elected king. The ſucceſs and particulars of this expedition have been already related at large in that part of this work to which they moſt properly belong[u]. Al Mondar Ebn Noomah.

12. AL ASWAD, ſon to Al Mondar, overthrew the king of Ghaſſân, and took many of his relations priſoners, according to ſome of the Oriental hiſtorians; but Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Al Aſwad.

[q] Pocock. ubi ſupra, p. 68. [r] Idem ibid. [s] Idem ibid. [t] Al Firauzabadius, Safioddin. Al Meidan. Lebtarikh. Mirkhond. Khondemir. &c. Vide etiam Univ. hiſt. vol. xii. p. 202, &c. [u] Lebtarik. Mirk. Khondem. ubi ſupra. Univ. hiſt. ubi ſupra.

Yuſef relates, that the king of Ghaſſân prevailed againſt him, and ſlew him, after a ſhort reign [w].

An anonymous king.

13. He was ſucceeded by his brother Al Mondar, whoſe true name has not reached us. It is probable, nothing of moment happened whilſt this prince ſat on the throne, ſince the eaſtern writers ſay little of him [x].

Al Kamah.

14. Al Kamah, ſucceſſor to the laſt king, was ſtyled Al Damyali, from the family of Damyal, of which he was a member. All the tranſactions that happened during his reign, are likewiſe buried in oblivion [y].

Amrio'l Kais, the ſon of Nooman.

15. Amrio'l Kais, the ſon of Nooman, the ſon of Amrio'l Kais al Mohrek, next ſwayed the ſceptre of Hira. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef aſſerts, that it was he who threw Senammar headlong from the top of the caſtle of Khaouarnak, with whom agree herein Abulfeda and Al Jannabius [z].

Al Mondar Ebn Amrio'l Kais, Ebn Nooman.

16. Al Mondar, the ſon of the laſt king and Mawiah the daughter of Aus, a lady of ſuch tranſcendent beauty, that ſhe was called Maiſſamai, i. e. water of heaven, governed after his father in Hira. From his mother he and his poſterity were likewiſe ſurnamed Al Mondar Ebn Maiſſamai; which appellation they had in common with the kings of Ghaſſân, according to Al Jauharius. For theſe laſt princes were ſo denominated from Abu Amer, of the tribe of Azd, the father of Amru Mazikia, who by his ſurpriſing liberality and beneficence ſupplied the want of rain, furniſhing his people with corn, when an extreme drought had rendered it ſo dear, that they were incapable of buying it. This prince was depoſed by Khoſrû Kobâd, king of Perſia [a].

Al Hareth.

17. Al Hareth Ebn Amru, of the tribe of Kenda, was placed on the throne of Hira by Khoſrû Kobâd, in the room of Al Mondar Ebn Amrio'l Kais, whom he had depoſed. However, Kobâd's ſon and ſucceſſor Anuſhirwân, ſurnamed the juſt, in whoſe reign Mohammed was born, reſtored the lawful king to his dominions, and drove away the uſurper Al Hareth Ebn Amru. Kobâd embraced the tenets of an impoſtor called Mazdak, who pretended himſelf a prophet ſent from God to preach a community of women and poſſeſſions, ſince all men were deſcended from the ſame common parents; and in moſt points agreed with Manes. By rendering wealth and women common, he propoſed taking away away the luſt of both ; from whence, he inſinuated, generally aroſe the feuds, quarrels, and animoſities, that diſturbed the repoſe and tranquillity of mankind. Such a doctrine well ſuiting the diſpoſition of Kobâd, he not only profeſſed himſelf a convert to Mazdak's religion, but likewiſe obliged all his dependents to do the ſame ; and therefore, when Al Mondar Ebn Amrio'l Kais refuſed this, he ſtripped him of his dominions, and appointed Al Hareth, who had declared himſelf a zealous follower of Mazdak, to preſide over them in his ſtead. But Anuſhirwân, called Nouſchirvan by the Perſian hiſtorians, in conſequence of a vow he had made before his acceſſion, reſtored the Mondar family to the throne of Hira, put Mazdak to death, and aboliſhed the profeſſion of his impious opinions. It is ſaid, when Mazdak knew his fate, he told Anuſhirwân, "that GOD had raiſed him to the throne of "Perſia to protect his ſubjects, and not to deſtroy them." To which that monarch anſwered, "True, abandoned vil- "lain ; but doſt thou not remember, that with the utmoſt "difficulty, even by kiſſing thy loathſome feet, I prevailed "upon thee not to lie with my mother, when my father, at "thy impudent requeſt, had given thee a permiſſion ſo to do?" "Yes," replied Mazdak. Upon which, the king ordered him to be executed immediately, cut off many of his followers, and eſtabliſhed once more amongſt his ſubjects the antient Magian religion [b].

[w] Ahmed Ebn Yuſef. [x] Pocockius ubi ſupra, p. 69.
[y] Idem ibid. [z] Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Abulfeda, & Al Jannabius.
[a] Al Jauharius.

18. AL MONDAR EBN AMRIO'L KAIS was ſucceeded by his ſon Al Mondar, ſtyled, according to Al Jauharius, Modret ol' Hajarah, from his ſurpriſing ſtrength, and unparallelled bravery. Other authors, from his mother Henda, give him the ſurname of Ebn Henda. In the eighth year of his reign the falſe prophet Mohammed was born [c]. Al Mondar, Ebn Amrio'l Kais, Ebn Henda.

19. KABUS, the brother of Amru, comes next, of whom we find nothing worthy of notice related by the eaſtern writers [d]. Kabus.

20. AL MONDAR, brother to the former prince, ſucceeded him [e]. His brother, Al Mondar.

21. AL NOOMAN, ſurnamed Abu Kabus, was the twenty-firſt king of Hira, and became a convert to Chriſtianity on the following occaſion : In a drunken fit he had ordered two Al Nooman Abu Kabus.

of

[b] Abulfed. in vit. Anuſhirwân. Shareſtan. apud Pocockium, ubi ſupra, p. 70. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, ibid. p. 71. Mirkh. Khond. & Univ. hiſt. ubi ſupra, p. 214, 218. [c] Al Jauharius. [d] Pocockius ubi ſupra, p. 72. [e] Idem ibid.

of his intimate companions, who, overcome with liquor, had fallen asleep, to be buried alive. When he came to himself, he was extremely concerned at what he had done; and, to expiate his crime, not only raised a monument to the memory of his friends, but set apart two days, one of which he called the unfortunate, and the other the fortunate, day; making it a perpetual rule to himself, that whoever met him on the former day, should be slain, and his blood sprinkled on the monument; but he that met him on the other day, should be dismissed in safety, with magnificent gifts. On one of the unfortunate days, there came before him accidentally an Arab, of the tribe of Tay, who had once entertained this king, when fatigued with hunting, and separated from his attendants. The king, who could neither discharge him, contrary to the order of the day, nor put him to death, against the laws of hospitality, which the Arabs religiously observe, proposed, as an expedient, to give the unhappy man a year's respite, and to send him home with rich gifts, to make his family amends for the great loss they were to sustain, on condition that he found a surety for his returning at the year's end, to suffer death. One of the prince's court, out of compassion, offered himself as his surety, and the Arab was discharged. When the last day of the term came, and no news of the Arab, the king, not at all displeased to save his host's life, ordered the surety to be brought out to execution. Those who were by represented to the king, that the day was not yet expired, and therefore he ought to have patience till the evening: but in the middle of their discourse the Arab appeared. The king, admiring the man's generosity, in offering himself to certain death, which he might have avoided by letting his surety suffer, asked him, what was his motive for so doing? To which he answered, he had been taught to act in that manner by the religion he professed; and Al Nooman demanding what religion that was, he replied, the Christian. Whereupon the king, desiring to have the doctrines of Christianity explained to him, was baptized, together with all his subjects; and not only pardoned the man and his surety, but abolished his barbarous custom. This prince, however, was not the first king of Hira who professed himself a convert to the Christian religion; Al Mondar, the son of Amrio'l Kais, his grandfather, declared himself a Christian, and built large churches in his capital. As Al Nooman took a particular delight in tulips, and would not permit mit them to grow in all gardens, the Arabs, from him, call them "the variegated flowers of Al Nooman." After a reign of twenty-two years, Al Nooman was ſlain by Khoſrû Parwiz, by whom the kingdom of Hira was tranſlated from the family of the Lakhmians to Ayas the Tayite [f].

22. MOHAMMED's miſſion commenced in the ſixth month of Ayas's reign [g]. Ayas.

23. ZADAWAIH, the ſon of Mahan of Hamadan, ſucceeded Ayas [h]. Zadawaih.

24. AL MONDAR, Ebn Nooman, Ebn Mondar, Ebn Mondar, Ebn Maiſſamai, ſurnamed Al Maghrûr, governed Hira, from the death of Zadawaih to the conqueſt of the kingdom of Hira by the arms of Khaled Ebn al Walîd. The four royal families of Perſia, governing that kingdom before this period, were the Piſhdadian, the Caianian, the Aſhganian, and that of Khoſrû; which, as Hira was a ſtate dependent on the Perſians, we thought not improper to be obſerved [i]. Al Mondar. Ebn Nooman. Ebn Mondar. Ebn Mondar. Ebn Maiſſamai. Al Maghrur.

THE kingdom of Ghaſſân, as well as that of Hira, owed its origin to the inundation of Al Arem. The founders of this kingdom were of the tribe of Azd, who, according to ſome, ſettling in Syria Damaſcena, near a water called Ghaſſân, thence took their name; though others make them to have gone under this appellation before they left Yaman. Having driven out the Dajaamian Arabs, of the tribe of Salîh, who before poſſeſſed the country, they made themſelves maſters of a very conſiderable territory. Here they maintained their kingdom four hundred years, as others ſay, ſix hundred, or, as Abulfeda more exactly computes, ſix hundred and ſixteen. If Ghaſſân was their name prior to this migration, they probably were the Caſſanitæ of Ptolemy. Be that as it will, five of the kings of Ghaſſân were named Hâreth, which the Greeks and Latins wrote Aretas; and one of them it was, whoſe governor ordered the gates of Damaſcus to be watched to take St. Paul. Dr. Pocock gives us the following liſt of the kings of Ghaſſân, extracted from the Oriental hiſtorians [k]. The kingdom of Ghaſſân.

1. JAFNAH

[f] Al Meidani, Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Abulfed, &c. Vide etiam Sale ubi ſupra, p. 23, 24. [g] Pocockius ubi ſupra, p. 73, 74. [h] Idem ibid. [i] Procop. de bell. Perſ. Ahmed Ebn Yuſef, Al Jannab. Abulfed. Al-Firauzabadius, & Pocock. ubi ſupra, p. 74, 75. [k] Al Beidawi. Poc. not. in ſpec. hiſt. Arab. p. 42, 45, 66, 75, 76, 77.

Jafnah. 1. JAFNAH EBN AMRU, Ebn Thaalibah, Ebn Amru, Ebn Mazikia, to whom, after the excision of the royal family of Salîh, the Kodaensian Arabs, and the Greeks in Syria Damascena, submitted themselves.

Amru. 2. AMRU, the son of Jafnah, who is said to have built many monasteries in Syria.

Amru. 3. AMRU, the son of Thaalibah.

Al Hâreth. 4. AL HARETH, or Aretas, the son of Thaalibah.

Jabalah. 5. JABALAH, the son of Al Hâreth.

Al Hâreth. 6. AL HARETH, the son of Jabalah.

Al Mondar. 7. AL MONDAR AL ACBAR, that is, "the great," the son of Al Hâreth.

Al Nooman. 8. AL NOOMAN, the brother of Al Mondar.

Jabalah. 9. JABALAH, the brother of Al Nooman.

Al Ayham. 10. AL AYHAM, brother to the last two princes.

Amru. 11. AMRU, who was brother to his three last predecessors.

Jafnah Alasgar. 12. JAFNAH, surnamed Al Asgar, the son of Mondar Al Acbar, who set the city of Hira on fire; whence his posterity were said to be of the family of the incendiary.

Al Nooman. 13. AL NOOMAN AL ASGAR, brother to JAFNAH.

Al Nooman. 14. AL NOOMAN, Ebn Amru, Ebn Mondar.

Jabalah. 15. JABALAH, Ebn Nooman, who waged war with Al Mondar Ebn Maissamai.

Al Nooman. 16. AL NOOMAN, the son of Al Ayham.

Al Hâreth. 17. AL HARETH, brother to Al Nooman Ebn al Ayham.

Al Nooman. 18. AL NOOMAN, the son of Al Hâreth.

Al Mondar. 19. AL MONDAR, the son of Al Nooman.

Amru. 20. AMRU, Al Mondar's brother.

Hajar. 21. HAJAR, brother to Al Mondar and Amru.

Al Hâreth. 22. AL HARETH, the son of Hajar.

Jabalah. 23. JABALAH, the son of Al Hâreth.

Al Hâreth. 24. AL HARETH, the son of JABALAH.

Al Nooman. 25. AL NOOMAN, the son of Al Hâreth, who is called by some eastern writers Abu Carb, and Kotam.

Al Ayham. 26. AL AYHAM, the son of Jabalah, who was likewise lord of Tadmor.

Al Mondar. 27. AL MONDAR, brother to Al Ayham.

Sharahil. 28. SHARAHIL, brother to the two last princes.

Amru. 29. AMRU, another of their brothers.

Jabalah. 30. JABALAH, Ebn al Hâreth, Ebn Jabalah.

31. JABALAH

31. JABALAH, the ſon of Al Ayham, and the laſt of the kings of Ghaſſân, who, on the great ſucceſſes of the Arabs in Syria, under the khalif Omar, profeſſed Mohammediſm; but, receiving afterwards a diſguſt from him, returned to his former faith, and retired to Conſtantinople. As in the regal line of Hamyar, Hejâz, and Kenda, we find the name of Hâreth, or Al Hâreth, we think Scaliger had ſome colour of reaſon, when he aſſerted this to be a general name amongſt the Arab emirs or phylarchs, though Dr. Pocock is of another opinion. The ſcholiaſt on the poem of Ebn Abduni differs ſomething from Abulfeda in his account of the kings of Hira. For he tells us, that Al Hâreth Ebn Amru, Ebn Amer, Ebn Hâreth, Ebn Amrio'l Kais, Ebn Mazen, Ebn Al Azd, ſurnamed Ebn Abi Shâmer, was the firſt king; and that the whole ſeries of theſe princes contained thirty-ſeven kings, the laſt of which was Jabalah, who embraced Chriſtianity in the khalifat of Omar: which if we admit, and that St. Paul was at Damaſcus A. C. 34. as Calviſius will have it, the Aretas mentioned by that apoſtle was in all likelihood one of the moſt antient kings of Ghaſſân (C), and probably the firſt of them. From whence it will follow, that Al Beidawi has probability on his Jabalah.

(C) In oppoſition to this it may be urged, that we find ſeveral princes called Aretas, kings of the Arabs, ſeated in Syria, or, at leaſt, near the frontiers of that country, mentioned in the Maccabees, as likewiſe in Joſephus, before the period here hinted at. But to this it may be replied, that theſe princes might preſide over the Dajaamian Arabs, expelled by thoſe of the tribe of Azd above-mentioned, or reign in Arabia Petræa and Deſerta, eſpecially if we admit Hâreth to have been a general name amongſt the Arab emirs or phylarchs. And, in ſupport of the laſt notion, it may be obſerved, that Petra was the metropolis of the Aretan princes mentioned by Joſephus. But we leave our readers to determine for themſelves, in relation to the commencement of the kingdoms of Hira and Ghaſſân. The tranſactions ſpecified in the paſſages here referred to, in which the Arabs were concerned, our readers will find an account of in the hiſtory of the Jews, to which they properly belong (3).

(3) 1 Maccab. c. v. ver. 39. c. xi. ver. 16, 37. c. xii. ver 31. 2 Maccab. c. v. ver. 8. c. xii. ver. 10, &c. Joſeph. Antiq. Jud. l. xiv. c. 2. l. xvi. c. 9, 10. l. xvii. c. 3. de bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 7. & alib. Univ. hiſt. vol. xii. p. 219, 231, 233, 432, & alib.

his side, when he affirms the inundation of Al Arem to have happened after the birth of Christ; since the kingdom of Ghassân commenced immediately after that inundation. And some sort of sanction is given to this notion even by Abulfeda himself, when he intimates, that Amru the son of Jafnah, the second king of Hira, founded many monasteries in Syria. Be that as it will, had the Arab historians not been so defective in point of chronology, their works would have been much more valuable, and deserved a much greater degree of credit, than at present the learned are willing to allow them [l].

The kingdom of Hejâz.

It has been already observed, that Jorham, the son of Kahtân, founded the kingdom of Hejâz, where princes of his line reigned till the time of Ishmael, who married the daughter of Modâd, one of those princes. Some authors relate, that Kidâr, one of Ishmael's sons, had the crown resigned to him by his uncles the Jorhamites; but, according to others, the descendents of Ishmael expelled that tribe, who retiring to Johainah, were, after various fortune, at last all destroyed by an inundation. The following catalogue of the kings of Hejâz, taken from Dr. Pocock, is the best that has been hitherto exhibited to the public [m].

Jorham. 1. JORHAM, the brother of Yaarab.
Abd Yalil. 2. ABD YALIL, the son of Jorham.
Jorsham. 3. JORSHAM, the son of Abd Yalil.
Abdo'l Madan. 4. ABDO'L MADAN, the son of Jorsham.
Nogailah. 5. NOGAILAH, the son of Abdo'l Madan.
Abdo'l Masih 6. ABDO'L MASIH, the son of Nogailah.
Modâd. 7. MODAD, the son of Abdo'l Masih
Amru. 8. AMRU, the son of Modad.
Al Hâreth. 9. AL HARETH, brother to Amru.
Amru. 10. AMRU, the son of Al Hâreth.
Basher. 11. BASHER, brother to Amru.
Modâd. 12. MODAD, the son of Amru, the son of Modâd.
Anonym. 13. ------ ANONYM.

14. KIDAR,

[l] Scalig. apud Pocockium, ubi supra, p. 77. ut & ipse Pocock. ibid. & p. 78. Abulfeda, Scholiast in poëm. Ebn Abduni. 2 Cor. c. xi. ver. 32. Seth. Calvis. apud Pocockium, ubi supra, p. 78. Al Beidawi. Vide etiam Sale's notes on the Koran, p. 354. & Ockley's hist. of the Saracens, vol. i. p. 174. [m] Al Jannabius. Poc. ubi supra, p. 38, 78, 79. Vide etiam Sale's prelim. disc. p. 11, 12.

14. KIDAR, the ſon of Iſhmael, whoſe mother, according to the Oriental hiſtorians, was of the houſe of Jorham. Kidâr.

AFTER the expulſion of the Jorhamites, the government of Hejâz ſeems not to have continued many centuries in the hands of one prince, but to have been divided among the heads of tribes; almoſt in the ſame manner as the Arabs of the deſert are governed at this day. The tribe of Khozâah, deſcended from Cahlân, the ſon of Saba, after the inundation of Al Arem, fled into the kingdom of Hejâz, and ſettled themſelves in a valley called Marri, near Mecca; in which territory they founded an ariſtocracy, aſſuming to themſelves both the government of the city of Mecca, and the cuſtody of the Caaba or temple there. Their name they derived from their being cut off or ſeparated from the other tribes of Yaman by the accident above-mentioned. They continued maſters of the city and territory of Mecca, as well as preſidents of the Caaba, for ſeveral ages; till at length one Koſa (C), of the tribe of Koreiſh, circumvented Form of government in Hejâz.

(C) Koſa was the ſon of Kelâb, who firſt gave the months of the year thoſe names by which the Arabs ever ſince have called them, even to this day. The antient names were Mutemer, Nagir, Chavan, Savan, Ritma, Ida, Aſam, Adil, Natil, Vaïl, Varna, and Burec. The preſent names Kelâb derived from ſome contingencies that happened in the months to which they are applied; which names, receiving a ſanction from Mohammed's authority, who made them one of the diſtinguiſhing marks of his followers, have been continued ever ſince they were firſt impoſed. It will not be improper to obſerve here, that the Arabs had antiently four ſacred months, in which they could not carry on any war, eſpecially amongſt themſelves. Something of this kind was obſerved amongſt the Greeks; ſince, according to Pauſanias, they had always a reſpite from war, during the time of the celebration of the Olympic games. Some authors intimate, that the antient Arabs abſtained from war only in that month which is at preſent called Muharrem or Moharrem (3).

(3) Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 3, 4, 5. Cazvinius in lib. de admirandis creatar. rer. Alkodaius apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 272, 273, 274. Jauhar. in theſaur. ling. Arab. Pauſan. p. 293. Vid. etiam Meſûdem & Nowaïrium, apud Gol. ubi ſup.

ed Abu Gabſhan, a weak and ſilly man, of whom, while in a drunken humour, he bought the keys and cuſtody of the Caaba, for a bottle of wine. But when Abu Gabſhan grew cool, and came to reflect upon what he had done, he ſufficiently repented of his imprudence; whence the proverbs of the Arbs: "More vexed with late repentance "than Abu Gabſhan; More fooliſh than Abu Gabſhan:" which are applied to thoſe perſons who part with things of great moment for a trifle, and are afterwards ſorry for what they have done. The tribe of Khozâah endeavoured afterwards to give ſome diſturbance to the Koreiſh in the poſſeſſion of what Koſa had purchaſed; which furniſhed the latter with an opportunity of deveſting the former of the civil government of Mecca. Notwithſtanding what has been ſaid, it is not certain, whether the tribe of Khozâah were the deſcendents of Iſhmael or Joktan. We find Amru, one of their kings, a deſcendent of Cahlân, frequently mentioned by the Arab hiſtorians; but as nothing remarkable is related either of him, or his ſon Caab, we ſhall take no further notice of them. After the Koreiſh had poſſeſſed themſelves of Mecca, they kept up there the ſame form of government that before had prevailed [n].

Besides the kingdoms that have been already taken notice of, there were ſome other tribes, which in latter times had princes of their own, and formed ſtates of leſſer note. The tribe of Kenda in particular had ſeveral kings, of which the three following were the principal [o]:

Hojr. 1. Hojr, ſurnamed Accelo'l Morar, i. e. "the eater of "Morar," a fruit of a bitter taſte, on which camels feed. That ſurname was given him by his wife, who had an averſion to him, becauſe his lips were ſo contracted, that they did not cover his teeth; which made him reſemble a camel, when brouzing upon the aforeſaid ſhrub. Kenda, from whom the tribe deduced its name, was alſo called Thaur. Abulfeda aſſerts, that before the time of Hojr the people of Kenda were without any kind of government, from whence many inconveniences enſued; which induced them to chuſe him for their king [p].

2. Amru,

[n] Pocockius, ubi ſup. p. 42, 50, 342. Ecchelens. hiſt. Arab. p. i. c. 3. Fortal. Fidei, l. iv. conſid. 1. Abulfeda Vide etiam Prid. life of Mahom. p. 2, 3, 4. [o] Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 79, 80. [p] Abulfeda. Al-Jauharius. Al-Firauzabadius.

2. AMRU, the son of Hojr, surnamed Al Maksur, i. e. "contracted or confined," because he did not attempt to extend the dominions left him by his father [q]. Amru.

3. AL HARETH, the son of Amru, was by Khosrû Kobâd elevated to the throne of Hira, and deposed by Anushirwân, for the reasons already mentioned. He endeavoured to avoid his enemies by flying to Diyar Calb, where he died, but in what manner we are not told. Al Hâreth placed his son Hojr over the Bani Asad, and his other sons over other tribes. Hojr was the father of Amrio'l Kais, a celebrated poet. The Bani Asad endeavouring to take off Hojr by treachery, he treated them with great rigour and severity; which occasioned his meeting with a violent death. Amrio'l Kais, being apprised of this, assembled a body of forces out of the tribes of Becr and Taglab, with which he defeated the Bani Asad. But afterwards, his troops being dispersed through the fear of Al Mondar, he found himself obliged to fly to the Romans, in order to implore their protection, and died in his return home near Ancyra. Some authors say, that Cæsar gave him a poisoned garment, which was the cause of his death; but Abulfeda looks upon this as a downright fable, meriting no regard. To the kings of Kenda here mentioned we find one Ebn Ommil' Kotam added by Al-Firauzabadius [r]. Al Hâreth.

THE following princes, or chiefs of tribes, deserve likewise a place in the history of the antient Arabs:

1. ZOHAIR EBNOL HABAB, who presided over the tribe of Kelab, and, by reason of his wonderful sagacity, was surnamed "the wise." He attained to a very old age, and died at last covered with glory. He invaded the Bani Gatfan with a powerful army, because they pretended to build a temple in opposition to the Caaba, and entered into an alliance with Abrahah al Ashram, styled "master of the elephant." Notwithstanding what has been said of him here, some authors intimate, that he came to his end by excessive drinking [s]. Zohair.

2. COLAIB EBN RABIAH governed the Bani Maad, the Saraceni Maadeni of Procopius, and was so proud, that he would not suffer any one to hunt in his neighbourhood, Colaib.

[q] Pocock. ubi sup. p. 79.

[r] Abulfeda in vit. Anushirwân, & alib. Al-Firauzabadius apud Pocockium, ubi sup. p. 80. ut & ipse Pocock ibid.

[s] Poc. ubi sup. p. 81.

nor any camels to be watered with his, nor any fire to be lighted near that which he himself used. He was at last slain by one Jassas, for shooting a camel named Sarab, that he found grazing on a prohibited spot of ground. This camel belonged to an Arab, who had been entertained by Basus, a near relation of Jassas. The murder of Ebn Rabiah occasioned a forty years war, whence came the Arab proverbs: "A worse omen than Sarab; More ominous than "Basus." It may not be improper here to observe, that the kings and chiefs of the Arabs generally forbad others to bring their flocks upon those places and pastures, which they chose for themselves. In order to ascertain the limits of these pastures, when they came to a fruitful valley or plain, they caused a dog to bark, and the whole extent of ground over which he could be heard, they appropriated to themselves (D).[t]

Mohalhel. 3. MOHALHEL EBN RABIAH, brother to Colaib, formed an army out of the families of Taglab, with which he carried on a long and bloody war, as hinted above, with those of Becr, in order to revenge his brother's death [u].

Zohair. 4. ZOHAIR EBN JODAIMAH, who received a certain toll or tribute from the Arabs, that frequented the celebrated fair of Ocadh above-mentioned, was assassinated by one Khaled, who afterwards fled to Al Nooman king of Hira. That prince took him under his protection; however, he was privately

[t] Procop. de bell. Pers. c. 19, 20. Al-Jauhar. Al-Firauzabad. Ebno'l Athir. Pocockius in not. ad carmen. Tograi. p. 80, & ubi sup. p. 82. [u] Poc. ubi sup. p. 82.

(D) Though the flocks and herds of inferior people were absolutely prohibited coming into that spot of ground, which was looked upon as the property of the prince, yet his flocks and herds might go into any of their pastures. Mohammed abolished this custom, and did not permit a spot of ground to be confined to the use of any particular animals, except horses that had served in wars carried on for the propagation of his religion, or camels consecrated to, and set apart for, sacred uses (4).

(4) Poc. not. in carm. Tograi, p. 81. & not. ad. spec. hist. Arab. p. 333.

vately murdered by one Al Hâreth, who had purſued him, which occaſioned long and bloody broils [w].

5. KAIS, the ſon of Zohair Ebn Jodaimah, had two fa- Kais.
mous horſes, called Dahes and Gabrah, which ran with two others, upon a challenge, belonging to one Hadifa, for a prize of an hundred camels. This event gave riſe to that bloody war called by the Arab hiſtorians the war of Dahes and Gabrah, which continued, without intermiſſion, forty years. King Kais, in order to atone for ſo great an effuſion of blood, is ſaid to have embraced the chriſtian religion, and even entered upon the monaſtic ſtate [x].

THUS have we gone through the hiſtory of the antient Arabs before Mohammed, as far as it can be collected from the moſt noted of the Arab hiſtorians. But, in order to render that branch of this work we are now upon the more complete, we ſhall give a brief account of the principal tranſactions the antient Arabs were concerned in with the Egyptians, Perſians, Greeks, and Romans, extracted from the moſt approved writers of the two laſt nations.

ACCORDING to Diodorus Siculus, Seſoſtris, that is, as Joſephus and Sir Iſaac Newton will have it, Seſac, in his father's life-time, ſubdued Arabia. However, that the Arabs were never thoroughly ſubjugated, nor even long paid any ſort of homage to the kings of Egypt, appears from hence, that, according to the ſame author, Seſac himſelf was obliged to draw a line from Heliopolis to Peluſium, in order to ſecure Egypt from the excurſions of the Arabs and Syrians. The Scenite Arabs contiguous to Paleſtine and Syria, therefore, at leaſt, muſt have been independent on that prince. Nor indeed can it be inferred from Diodorus, that he ever traverſed Arabia Felix, though he had a fleet of four hundred ſail upon the Red Sea, but only coaſted it, or at fartheſt ſeized upon ſome of its maritime provinces in his voyage to India. As the words Arabia ſometimes denotes only Arabia Deſerta, at other times Arabia Petræa, and ſometimes Arabia Felix, or a part of that country, in the Greek and Latin authors, it can by no means be inferred from any of them, that the whole peninſula of the Arabs ever was, at leaſt for any conſiderable time, in a ſtate of ſervitude to the Egyptians. But the contrary ſeems to appear, even from Diodorus Siculus himſelf, who gives us the moſt pompous account of the conqueſts of Seſoſtris or Seſac [y].

The Arabs never, at leaſt for any long time, ſubject to the Egyptians.

[w] Idem ibid. [x] Idem ibid. p. 83. [y] Diod. Sic. l. i. Joſeph. in antiquit. Newt. in chronol. aliiq; ſcript. plurim. paſſ.

Neither the Medes, Persians, nor Assyrians, could ever get any considerable footing amongst them.

We learn from the same author, that neither the Assyrians, Medes, nor Persians, could ever get any considerable footing amongst them. The Persian monarchs, indeed, were their friends, and so far respected by them, as to have an annual present of frankincense: yet they could never make them tributary; and were so far from being their masters, that Cambyses, on his expedition against Egypt, was obliged to ask their leave to pass through their territories. This we learn from Herodotus; nor does any other antient author, that we know of, contradict him herein [z].

They were not afraid of Alexander.

When Alexander the Great had subdued the Persian empire, notwithstanding his exorbitant power, the Arabians had so little apprehension of him, that they alone, of all the neighbouring nations, sent no embassadors to him, either first or last; which, with a desire of possessing so rich a country as that they inhabited, made him form a design against them; and, had he not died before he could put it in execution, this people might possibly have convinced him, that he was not invincible. The happiness of its climate, and its great fertility, as well as riches, induced him to attempt the conquest of Arabia, in order to fix there his royal seat, after his return from his Indian expedition. But, according to Strabo, he had another motive likewise to this hazardous undertaking: for, being informed, that the Arabs had only two divinities, Jupiter and Bacchus, whom they worshipped, because they supplied them with all the good things they enjoyed, he was likewise desirous, that they should esteem him as their third deity; and, in order to deserve this, he proposed first to conquer them, and then to leave them in the full possession of their antient liberty and independency; which he believed would merit divine honours, as much as the greatest benefaction. Full, therefore, of this scheme, he fitted out a powerful fleet, composed of ships built in Phœnice, Cyprus, and Babylonia, to favour the operations of the land-forces. But death put an end to this, as well as all the other towering projects of that ambitious prince [a].

The Arabs cut in pieces a body of troops sent against them by Antigonus.

Antigonus, after the reduction of Syria and Phœnicia, advanced into that part of Arabia bordering upon those countries, having entertained a notion, that the Arabs were not favourably disposed towards him. However, he did not formally invade them, but detached Athenæus, one of his captains, with a body of four thousand foot and six hundred horse, horſe, to ravage and lay waſte the territories of the Nabathæans. That general marched to Petra without oppoſition, which finding in no poſture of defence, the Nabathæans, then under no apprehenſion of an enemy, being gone to a neighbouring fair, and having left only their wives, children, ſick, and aged in Petra, with an inconſiderable garriſon, he ſeized upon it, put to the ſword, or took priſoners, all the ſoldiers found therein, and carried off a booty of five hundred talents of ſilver, together with a vaſt quantity of frankincenſe and myrrh. However, this advantage was owing rather to expedition and ſurprize, than the valour of his troops, he having traverſed two thouſand two hundred ſtadia in thrice twenty-four hours, and they not being appriſed of his deſign; ſo that no diſpoſitions could poſſibly be made by them for giving him a proper reception. But the Arabs, receiving intelligence of what had happened, left the fair, and, having aſſembled a conſiderable body of forces, purſued the Greeks with great celerity. They found them aſleep about two hundred ſtadia from Petra, without any guards poſted to appriſe them of any impending danger, not imagining it poſſible for the Arabs to come up with them ſo ſoon. Whereupon they fell upon them, and deſtroyed the whole detachment, except fifty horſe, that made their eſcape to Antigonus, and brought him the melancholy advice of the blow he had received [b].

[z] Diod. Sic. l. ii. p. 131. Herodot. l. iii. c. 91, 97.
[a] Strab. l. xvi. Arrian. 161.

Demetrius undertakes a ſecond expedition againſt them without ſucceſs.

HOWEVER, the Nabathæans, dreading the reſentment of Antigonus, ſent a letter to him written in the Syriac (E) character, to complain of Athenæus, and to excuſe what had happened. That prince, finding it impoſſible to deal with men inhabiting a deſert by pure force, diſſembled his reſentment, [b] Diod. Sic. l. xxi.

(E) It is evident from this curious paſſage, that the Nabathæans, or Iſhmaelites, uſed letters above three hundred years before the commencement of the chriſtian æra. Theſe letters probably were the ſame with thoſe we ſee on ſeveral of the antient Syriac coins, ſtruck in the times of Alexander's ſucceſſors, which reſemble the Phœnician, if they were not that character. They likewiſe bear ſome reſemblance to the moſt antient Syriac character called the Eſtrangelo, which the learned believe to be three hundred years more antient than the birth of Chriſt. This paſſage, in conjunction with the above-mentioned coins, ſeems to confirm that notion. The probability of a great affinity betwixt the moſt antient Syriac and Arabic alphabets from hence likewiſe plainly appears;

ment, and diſowned the orders he had given Athenæus, telling their embaſſadors, that he was well ſerved for his unjuſt invaſion of their country. This gave great ſatisfaction to the Arabs; though, in order to ſecure themſelves againſt any unforeſeen event, they erected watch-towers to give notice of an approaching enemy, and took care always to have ready a body of troops to repel any ſudden incurſion. Antigonus, finding them upon their guard, for ſome time continued in a ſtate of friendſhip with them; but at laſt imagining, that a fair opportunity of revenging the late diſgrace offered, he ſent his ſon Demetrius, with a choice detachment of four thouſand foot and as many horſe, to chaſtiſe them for it. But the watch-towers above-mentioned giving them timely notice of the enemy's approach, they threw a ſufficient garriſon into Petra, and made all the other neceſſary diſpoſitions for their defence. However, Demetrius arrived before Petra, and immediately attacked it with great fury; but was repulſed and obliged to draw off. The next day, when he began to renew the attack, an Arab from the walls ſpoke to him in the following terms: "King Demetrius, what would you have? "What has induced you to invade a people inhabiting the "wilderneſs, where neither water, corn, wine, nor other "things you cannot ſubſiſt without, are to be found? We "inhabit theſe deſolate plains for the ſake of liberty, and ſubmit to ſuch inconveniences as no other people can bear, in "order to enjoy it. You can never force us to change our "ſentiments, nor way of life, neither can you, for want of "neceſſaries, ſtay long here: therefore we deſire you to re-"tire out of our country, as we have never injured you, to "accept appears; and that they both, as well as the Phœnician, were deduced from the antient Hebrew or Aſſyrian letters, we have elſewhere obſerved. The preſent Arabic letters derive their origin from the ſame ſource. The alphabet of the Mendæans or Nabathæans, at preſent in uſe amongſt the poſterity of the old Aſſyrians and Chaldæans, given us by Dr. Hyde, is only a corruption of the old Syriac letters. In ſhort, this paſſage, as we apprehend, may lead us, by a proper attention to it, to ſeveral curious diſcoveries, equally entertaining and uſeful (5).

(5) Diod. Sic. in loc. cit. Bernard. tab. alph. Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 298. & vol. xvi. p. 653. Hyde hiſt. relig. vet. Perſ. p. 524. Monarch. Aſiatico.-Saracen. a Georg. Jacob. Kehr. edit. Lipſiæ, 1724. p. 3——6.

" accept of ſome preſents from us, and to prevail upon your " father Antigonus to rank the Nabathæan Arabs amongſt his " friends." Demetrius, having received ſuch preſents as were agreed upon between him and their chief, and hoſtages for their future good behaviour, raiſed the ſiege, and marched with his army to the lake of Aſphaltitis, where he encamped. Plutarch relates, that Demetrius's ſurpriſing intrepidity in the moſt imminent dangers ſo aſtoniſhed the Arabs, that they not only ſuffered him to retire quietly out of their territories, but alſo to carry off with him an immenſe booty, and, among other things, ſeven hundred camels [c].

They did not ſuffer Antigonus to collect bitumen on the lake Aſphaltitis.

ANTIGONUS was greatly diſſatisfied with the ill ſucceſs of this expedition, imagining, that the Arabs would grow more inſolent upon it. But he appeared highly pleaſed with his ſon Demetrius, for diſcovering the lake Aſphaltitis, which, it ſeems, till that time, had been unknown to the Greeks, eſpecially as he imagined his revenue would be much encreaſed by the bitumen brought from off that lake. He appointed, therefore, Hieronymus Cardianus the hiſtorian his treaſurer for that part of the revenue, ordering him to build ſhips, and collect all the bitumen that could be got out of the lake. But the Arabs, being appriſed of this, drew together a body of ſix thouſand men, with which they attacked the people Cardianus employed, and cut them almoſt all off; which obliged Antigonus to lay aſide the project he had formed. Mr. Sale ſays, he does not find any of Alexander's ſucceſſors, either in Aſia or Egypt, ever to have made any attempts upon the Arabs, which we own ourſelves aſtoniſhed at. As greatly are we ſurpriſed to find, that the paſſage he quotes on this occaſion makes directly againſt him [d].

Pompey made an Arab tribe tributary to the Romans.

As for the Romans, they never conquered any part of Arabia properly ſo called; though that the Arabs ſubmitted to Lucullus, is aſſerted by Plutarch. The moſt they did was to make ſome tribes tributary to them, as Pompey did one commanded by Sampſiceramus or Shams' alkerâm, who reigned at Hems or Emeſa. His people were more civilized, and lived under a better form of government, than the other Arabs, as we learn from Strabo [e].

THAT the Arabs frequently made dreadful incurſions into Syria, whilſt under the Romans, we have already obſerved from from Strabo; and are now farther to obſerve, that theſe incurſions ſometimes brought upon them the Roman arms. Pompey, as we learn from Plutarch, obliged one Aretas, an Arab prince, whoſe dominions bordered upon Syria and Meſopotamia, to ſubmit to him, and to receive a Roman garriſon: and the ſame general likewiſe ſubdued the Arabs, who dwelt about mount Amanus, by his lieutenant Afranius. After which the king of the Arabs reſiding in Petra, who till now had made no account of the Romans, ſubmitted himſelf by letter to him; but that Pompey ever poſſeſſed himſelf of that ſtrong-hold, does not appear. Plutarch rather ſeems to inſinuate, that he was recalled from thence, by the death of Mithridates, before he could make full proof of the ſincerity of that prince's ſubmiſſion. And this is the more probable, becauſe Gabinius, who ſucceeded ſoon after to the government of Syria, made preparations for an expedition againſt the Arabians, but was diverted from his deſign by Ptolemy's ſolicitation to be reſtored to his kingdom [f].

[c] Idem ibid. Plutarch. in Demetr.

[d] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. Sale's prelim. diſc. p. 13, 14.

[e] Plut. in Lucul. Strab. l. xvi.

AGBARUS, or, according to others, Ariamnes, not far from the time we are now upon, an Arab emir or phylarch, miſled and deluded Craſſus to his own deſtruction. Not long after which event, the Arabs probably defended the Palmyrenians, when Antony ſent a detachment of horſe to ravage their city. For Appian tells us, that the body of troops defending them conſiſted of archers, "who excelled in that "way;" which is one of the moſt diſtinguiſhing characteriſtics of the Arabs [g].

Ælius Gallus's expedition.

BUT none of the Romans ever penetrated ſo far into Arabia as Ælius Gallus, or Ælius Largus, as he is called by Dio, in the reign of the emperor Auguſtus. That general, after traverſing vaſt deſerts, came within two days journey of the aromatiferous parts of Arabia. For the carrying on of this expedition, he built eighty biremes, beſides ſeveral triremes, and a great number of ſmaller veſſels, imagining, that a fleet of ſuch ſhips would be of ſignal ſervice to him. But, finding himſelf deceived in that expectation, he equipped another fleet conſiſting of an hundred and thirty tranſports, with which, after he had put on board all his forces, he ſailed for Leucocome, a maritime city of the Nabathæans on the coaſt of the Red Sea. As this was an extremely dangerous navigation, on account of the many rocks and ſhelves, which are in that part of the Arabian gulf, and Syllæus, who had undertaken to be his guide, treacherouſly conducted him the worſt way through it, he was fifteen days in his paſſage, and loſt many of his ſhips.

Had

[f] Plut. in Pomp. & alib.

[g] Appian. de bel. civil.

Had he marched his army by land, as was at firſt intended, he might have avoided this diſaſter; but Syllæus prevented the execution of that ſalutary deſign, informing Gallus, that there was no ſafe paſſage by land for his troops through the country of the Nabathæans, though nothing was more common than for merchants to travel through it in caravans almoſt as numerous as an army. Soon after his arrival at Leucocome, a ſtrange diſtemper, that chiefly affected the mouth and thighs of the patient, made great havock in his army, which obliged him to remain inactive in that neighbourhood the remaining part of the ſummer, and the following winter. This diſtemper, according to Dio, firſt ſeized the head, where, if it ſettled, it proved mortal; but if the humour occaſioning it retired into the thighs, the patient recovered. Early in the ſpring Gallus, moving out of his winter-quarters, advanced to the frontiers of Hira, where he met with a moſt kind reception from Al Hareth, or, as Strabo names him, Aretas, a near relation of Abd Wadd, or Obodas, king of the Nabathæans, his ally. After a ſhort ſtay here, he reſumed his march, and in thirty days having croſſed a vaſt deſert, he arrived upon the borders of Arrarena, a country inhabited by the Scenite Arabs, and governed by one Sabus. This region he likewiſe traverſed in fifty days, and took poſt with all his forces at the city of Najrân, ſeated in a pleaſant and fruitful country, whoſe king abandoned it upon his approach. Gallus, having taken this city by aſſault, continued his march ſouthward, and arrived the ſixth day at a river, where he was met by a numerous body of Arabs who had aſſembled with a deſign to diſpute his paſſage; but as they were only a raw and undiſciplined multitude, armed with lances, bows and arrows, ſwords, ſlings, hatchets, &c. in an irregular manner, Gallus eaſily routed them, and cut ten thouſand of them in pieces, with the loſs of two men only. He then made himſelf maſter of ſeveral conſiderable places without oppoſition, and penetrated as far as Marſyabæ, a city of the Rhamanites, governed by a petty prince named Ilaſarus, or Al Aſar, which he beſieged ineffectually, being obliged to drop that enterprize for want of water. In the mean time finding his men carried off daily in great numbers, by various diſtempers proceeding from the heat of the climate, the inſalubrity of the air, water, and herbs of the country, he thought it adviſeable to march back into the country of the Nabathæans, and from thence purſue his rout into Egypt. Accordingly, he ſet out on his march homeward, and, by the aſſiſtance of more faithful ful guides, reached the city of Negra, one of Obodas's maritime towns, by the road of Anagrana, Chaalla, Malotha, &c. in ſixty days. Here he embarqued his troops, and, croſſing the Arabian gulf, landed at Myos Hormus, on the Egyptian ſide; from whence he led back the poor remains of his army to Alexandria. The bad ſucceſs Gallus met with on this occaſion ought to be attributed chiefly to the treachery of Syllæus, whoſe view, in the total deſtruction of the Roman army, ſeems to have been the acquiſition of ſome of the Roman conqueſts for his maſter Obodas, who likewiſe concurred with his chief miniſter, by not ſupporting Gallus, as he had promiſed. Be that as it will, the Roman general diſcovered the perfidy of Syllæus before his return out of Arabia; but, for ſome political reaſons, he thought proper then to diſſemble his reſentment. However, after his arrival in Egypt, he ſent the traitor to Rome, where, for this, and other enormous crimes, he had his head ſtruck off by the emperor's order; that thereby others might be deterred from the like villainous conduct for the future. We muſt not omit obſerving, that Gallus ſpent two years in this unfortunate expedition [f].

The Roman hiſtorians falſly aſſert Trajan to have conquered Arabia,

FROM this time to the reign of Trajan, we hear little of Arabia; but the eighth year of that reign was famous for the entire reduction of Arabia Petræa by Aulus Cornelius Palma, governor of Syria, according to Dio. Euſebius relates, that the inhabitants of Petra and Boſtra computed their time from this year, in which their country was firſt annexed to the Roman empire. Nay, Arrian, Eutropius, Lucian, and Dio, intimate, that Trajan conquered Arabia Felix, which ſeems to be confirmed by ſome medals coined after the fourteenth year of his reign; and meditated the conqueſt of India. But all this was groſs flattery, meriting not the leaſt regard, as will appear from the reception the Hagareans gave him, when he marched againſt them about ſix years after the period above-mentioned. This, which happened in the laſt year of Trajan, is a convincing proof, that he never was maſter of Arabia Petræa, much leſs Arabia Felix, notwithſtanding the mean adulation of his coins, orators, and hiſtorians [g],

TRAJAN,

[f] Strab. ubi ſup. Plin. l. vi. c. 28. Dio, l. liii. p. 516, & ſeq. ad an U. C. 730. Vide etiam Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xiii. p. 380, 381. [g] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 777. Euſeb. in chron. p. 206. Arrian.

TRAJAN, receiving intelligence, that the Hagarenes had declared against him, marched from Ctesiphon into their territories with a powerful army, and laid siege to their capital city. As it was situated on the top of a high and steep mountain, surrounded with strong walls, seated in a barren country, and defended by a numerous garrison, Trajan could not reduce it, though he made a breach in the wall. The emperor narrowly escaped being killed in one of the attacks; for having laid aside the ensigns of his dignity, that he might not be known, he headed his men in person: but the enemy knowing him, notwithstanding that disguise, by his grey hairs, and majestic air, aimed chiefly at him, wounded his horse, and killed an horseman by his side. Besides, as often as the Romans advanced to the attack, they were driven back by violent storms of wind, rain, and hail, and dreadful flashes of lightning. The apparitions of rainbows likewise dazzled and frightened them in an extraordinary manner. And at the same time they were in a strange manner infested in their camp by swarms of flies; so that Trajan was in the end obliged to raise the siege, and retire. As the metropolis of the Hagarenes, from some circumstances hinted at by Dio, must have been the same with the modern Errakim or Arrakeh, we cannot help thinking, that the Romans were never absolute masters of even Arabia Petræa, whatever homage they might have received from the Arabs of that country. Neither are their coins, an evidence of good authority in some points, to be relied on in the present case; as will more fully appear from an observation already made towards the close of the history of the Ethiopians [h].

That emperor is forced to retire out of Arabia.

ABOUT eighty years after, the emperor Severus, being greatly incensed at the Arabs bordering on Syria, for assisting Niger, laid siege to Atræ their capital with a formidable army, and a vast train of military engines invented by Priscus, the most celebrated mechanic of his age. He pushed on the siege with incredible vigour, not being able to bear that of all nations the Hagarenes only should stand out still against againſt the Romans. Being repulſed in the firſt attack with great ſlaughter, he ordered a ſecond to be made; when he might have carried the place, but choſe rather to ſound a retreat, hoping by this means, to induce the Arabs to ſue for peace; which he was determined not to grant, except they would diſcover their hidden treaſures ſuppoſed to be conſecrated to the Sun. But for a whole day they made not the leaſt overture. In the mean time the ardor of his troops cooled to ſuch a degree, that the Europeans refuſed to begin another aſſault and the Syrians were repulſed in one that they made. This ſo chagrined the emperor, that, when one of his officers repreſented to him, that he would engage to ſtorm the place with five hundred and fifty European ſoldiers, he replied, But where ſhall I find ſo many? God, ſays the hiſtorian, preſerved the town by the backwardneſs of the emperor one day, and by that of his troops the next. He was, therefore, obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and retire, with great precipitation, into his own dominions [i].

As is Severus, after he had ineffectually laid siege to Atræ.

Arrian. in peripl. Mar. Erythr. p. 6, 8, 46. Francisc. Mediobarb. Birag. p. 116. Occo. p. 215. Fest. in breviar. p. 551. Eutrop. in Trajan. Lucian. philop. Vid. etiam Univ. hist. vol. xiv. p. 575.

[h] Idat. & Cassiodor. in Fast. Dio. ubi sup. p. 785. & l. lxxv. p. 854. Herodian. l. iii. p. 528. Vid. & Univ. hist. vol. xiv. p. 580. & vol. 18. p. 162.

Short account of the Arabs to the time of Mohammed.

From this time to the birth of Mohammed we find not many particulars of moment related of the Arabs in general, or of the Saracens, the moſt noted people of them, in particular, by the Greek and Latin hiſtorians. The Saracens, however, we are told, ravaged Meſopotamia in the time of the emperor Conſtantius, and joined the Perſians againſt Julian. That prince, it ſeems, and ſome of his predeceſſors, had paid the Saracens, that they might have a body of troops always on foot for the ſervice of the Romans: but this he took into his head to diſcontinue; and when they ſent deputies to complain of this treatment, Julian told them, that a warlike prince had ſteel, but no gold; which they reſenting, went over to the Perſian, and ever after continued faithful to him. Mavia, queen of the Saracens, ſent a body of her troops to the aſſiſtance of the Romans againſt the Goths, who, after the defeat and death of Valens, by their vigorous ſallies, forced thoſe barbarians to retire from before Conſtantinople, which metropolis they had beſieged. About the year of the chriſtian æra 411, they committed great diſorders on the frontiers of Egypt, Paleſtine, Phœnicia, and Syria; but ſoon retired of their own accord. In the reign of Theodoſius, Alamundarus, or Al Mondar, with a numerous army, aſſiſted the Perſians againſt that that prince; but the greateſt part of his men, being ſeized with an unaccountable panic, threw themſelves headlong into the Euphrates, where, to the number of an hundred thouſand, they are ſaid to have periſhed. A. D. 452, the Saracens, Nubians, and Blemmyes, broke into the Roman empire; but were overthrown by the troops of the emperor Marcian, and forced to ſue for peace, which the emperor granted them upon terms highly advantageous to the empire. In the beginning of the ſixth century, a prince of the Mondar family, who was a renowned warrior, did incredible damage to the Romans, as we learn from Procopius. He ſo haraſſed them for fifty years together, by ravaging all their territories, from the borders of Egypt to the confines of Meſopotamia, killing vaſt numbers of their ſubjects, and exacting immenſe ſums for the redemption of others taken priſoners, that, to uſe Procopius's expreſſion, he brought them quite down upon their knees. He flew from Egypt to Meſopotamia like lightning, being ſo quick in his incurſions, that the Roman troops ſcarce ever began their march to put a ſtop to his depredations, before he had brought his plunder home. He generally defeated the Romans, when he found himſelf obliged to come to an engagement with them. In one action he made a whole Roman corps priſoners, with their general Demoſtratus, the brother of Rufinus, and John the ſon of Lucas, for whoſe ranſom he had an immenſe ſum of money paid him. Being at the head of all the Saracens bordering upon the Perſian dominions, and capable of making an irruption into which of the neighbouring Roman provinces he pleaſed, he was one of the moſt formidable enemies the Romans had. None of their generals, nor any of the Arab phylarchs in their intereſt, could ever make head againſt him. Juſtinian, in order to annoy him, veſted Aretas, another Arab prince, with the regal dignity, thinking this would enable him to puſh on the war with greater vigour againſt Alamundarus, for ſo Procopius calls him. However, Al Mondar was victorious in every engagement with Aretas, either vanquiſhing him by downright force, or prevailing upon him to betray the Romans. In fine, this prince, with Azarethes the Perſian general, defeated the renowned Beliſarius, and ſcattered terror where-ever he came. The diſpute he had with Aretas, who pleaded the cauſe of the Romans, about a territory called Strata, our readers will find related in Procopius. But as the rapid conqueſts of the Saracens, racens, and the principal transactions they were concerned in, happened after the death of Mohammed, we shall reserve what we have to say of that warlike nation, till we come to the modern history of Arabia [k].

[i] Dio, p. 948. Herodian. l. iii. Euſeb. chron. Spartian. in Sever. Goltz. p. 84. Univ. hiſt. vol. xv. p. 101.

Arabia famous for heresies, after the introduction of christianity.

THAT Arabia, after the introduction of christianity, was famous for heresies, has been already observed. The Hamyarites were infected with the Arian heresy in the reign of the emperor Constantius, as we learn from Theophilus Indus in Philostorgius. Some christians of this nation believed, that the soul died with the body, and was to be raised again with it at the last day. These Origen is said to have convinced. The heresies of Ebion, Beryllus, the Nazaræans, and Collyridians were also broached, or at least propagated, among the Arabs. The Collyridians were so denominated from a sort of twisted cake called collyris, which they offered to the virgin Mary, whom they worshipped as GOD. Other sects likewise there were within the borders of Arabia, who took refuge there from the proscriptions of the imperial edicts; several of whose notions Mohammed incorporated with his religion, as will hereafter be shewn [l].

Many Jews converted by a miracle to christianity.

THE Jews, though an inconsiderable and despised people in other parts of the world, were very powerful in Arabia, whither they fled from the destruction of Jerusalem, as well as the great havock made amongst them by the emperor Hadrian, and brought over several tribes to their religion. The Jews of Hamyar, we are told, not far from the time of Dhu Nowâs above-mentioned, challenged some neighbouring christians to a public disputation, which was held sub dio three days, before the king and his nobility, and all the people. The disputants were Gregentius, bishop of Tephra or Dhafâr for the christians, and Herbanus for the Jews. On the third day, Herbanus, to end the dispute, demanded, that Jesus of Nazareth, if he were really living, and in heaven, and could hear the prayers of his worshippers, should appear from heaven in their sight, and they would then believe on him; the

Jews

[k] Ammian. Mercellin. l. xiv. l. xxv. & l. xxix. Socrat. p. 357---360. Evagr. l. ii. c. 5. p. 295. Procop. de bel. Pers. l. i. p. 49, 50, 51--54, 55, 88. Vid. etiam Univ. hist. vol. xv. p. 459, 540. & vol. xvi. p. 29, 189, 205, 253. [l] Sulpic. Sever. in hist. sacr. p. 112, &c. Sozom. hist. ecclesiast. l. i. c. 16, 17. Eusеb. hist. ecclesiast. l. vi. c. 33. & c. 37. Epiphan. de hæres. l. i. hær. 40. ut & l. iii. hæres. 75, 79. Theophilus Indus apud Philostorgium, l. iii. Sale's prelim. disc. p. 34, 35.

Jews crying out, with one voice, "Shew us your CHRIST, "alas, and we will become chriſtians." Whereupon, after a terrible ſtorm of thunder and lightning, JESUS CHRIST appeared in the air, ſurrounded with rays of glory, walking on a purple cloud, having a ſword in his hand, and an ineſtimable diadem on his head; and ſpake theſe words over the heads of the aſſembly: "Behold, I appear to you in your ſight, "I, who was crucified by your fathers." After which the cloud received him from their ſight. The chriſtians hereupon cried out, "Lord, have mercy upon us;" but the Jews were ſtricken blind, and recovered not, till they were all baptiſed [m].

Conclusion of the hiſtory of the ancient Arabs.

DHU NOWAS, as has been obſerved, was a Jew, and perſecuted all, the chriſtians particularly, who were not of his religion. He burnt three hundred and forty chriſtians in the city of Najrân only. Not content with this, he ſent an embaſſy to Al Mondar, king of Hira, offering him large ſums of money, if he would perſecute the chriſtians throughout his dominions. The patriarch of Alexandria preſſing Eleſbaas (E) the Najaſhi, or king of Ethiopia, to revenge ſuch inhuman cruelty, that prince croſſed the ſtreights of Bab-al-Mandab with a fleet of four hundred and twenty-three ſail, and an army of an hundred and twenty thouſand men, with which he made a deſcent in Yaman. With theſe forces he overthrew Dhu Nowâs, ſeized upon his kingdom, and made St. Aretas's ſon governor of Najrân. The Abaſſines kept poſſeſſion of this kingdom, till they were driven out by Seif the ſon of Dhu Yazan of the tribe of Hamyar, who was, however, himſelf ſlain by ſome of them that had been left behind. The war of the elephant we have already given our readers an account of; and therefore ſhall conclude our hiſtory of the [m] Gregentius in diſput. cum Herban. Judæ, & Sale ubi ſup. p. 22, 23.

(E) According to ſome of the Syriac writers, Eleſbaas or Eleſbaan, whom they call Aidog, king of Ethiopia, undertook an expedition againſt one Dimion, king of the Hamyarites, for maſſacring ſome chriſtian merchants, that were Romans, in their paſſage through Yaman into Ethiopia; which he did, to revenge the cruelties exerciſed on the Jews, of whoſe communion, it ſeems, he was a member, in the dominions of the Roman emperor. They add, that Eleſbaas did not undertake this expedition out of a religious motive, but to revenge the injury his ſubjects might ſuſtain the antient Arabs, or the time of ignorance, as it is called by the Mohammedans, with obſerving, that Abd al Motalleb, the grandfather of Mohammed, was prince or chief of the Koreiſh at the time this war happened; that Mohammed himſelf was born the very year the Abaſſines were overthrown in their expedition to Mecca; that on this year, A. D. 578, commenced the æra of the elephant, from which the Arabs computed their time for twenty years; and that another, called the æra of the unjuſt war (F) ſucceeded this, which continued to the Hejra [n] (G).

CHAP.

[n] Abulfed. hiſt gen. Al-Gjuzius in lib. de ritib. peregrinat. cap. 78. Al Zamakhſhar. Al Beidawi, Jallal. D'Herbel. bibl. Orient. art. Abrahah. Prid. life of Mahom. p. 61, &c. Al Kodaius apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 172, 173. Sim. Metaphraſtes in vit. S. Aret. & ſocior. apud Surium, tom. v. p. 943. Al Jauhar. Al Firauzabad. Al Shareſtan. Job Ludolph. in comment. ad hiſt. Æthiop. p. 61, 62, 255, 256. Golii not. ad Alfragan. p. 54. aliiq; auctor. ſupra laudat.

ſuſtain in point of trade upon this occaſion. Before the Arab and Ethiopian armies engaged, Eleſbaas, according to the ſame authors, vowed ſolemnly to embrace the chriſtian religion, in caſe he was victorious. The armies then joining battle, Dimion was vanquiſhed and ſlain, and Eleſbaas or Aidog profeſſed himſelf a chriſtian, and placed a chriſtian prince upon the throne of Hamyar. Upon the death of this king, the Jews, who were ſtill very numerous there, found means to fix Dhu Nowâs upon that throne, who, at their inſtigation, proved a bitter enemy to the chriſtians. The particulars of his cruel behaviour towards them are ſet forth at large by Metaphraſtes, Simeon Beth-Arſamenſis, and other authors of good repute already mentioned (5).

(F) This was called the unjuſt and impious war, becauſe the principal actions of it happened betwixt the Kais Ailan and the Koreiſh, two powerful Arabian tribes, in the ſacred months abovementioned. Theſe ſacred months were Moharran, Rajeb, Dulkaada, and Dulhaga. In them all acts of hoſtility amongſt the jarring tribes, how violent ſoever their reſentment might be, entirely ceaſed. They then laid aſide all weapons of war, and converſed together in the moſt friendly manner. Nay, if an Arab met with the perſon that had killed his father or brother, he could not then

(5) Simeon Beth-Arſamenſ. epiſcop. & Joan. Aſiæ epiſc. apud Aſſeman. in bibl. Oriental. vol. i. p. 359---385. ut & ipſe Aſſeman. ibid.

CHAP. [X.]

The hiſtory of the empires of Nice and Trapezond, from their foundation, the former by Theodore Laſcaris, and the latter by the Comneni, to their final abolition, the one by Michael Paleologus, the other by Mohammed the Great.

THESE are the two laſt empires we have left to mention on the other ſide the Mediterranean, and before we repaſs into Europe. We have given them the laſt place, and have joined them in the ſame chapter, as they were of the moderneſt date, ſmalleſt extent, and ſhorteſt duration, of any of thoſe we have had occaſion to ſpeak of, either in Aſia or Africa, that are now extinct; and as they were both diſmembered from the Greek empire about the ſame time, that is, ſoon after the taking of its great metropolis by the Latins, mentioned in a former volume [a]. That of Nice was founded by Theodore Laſcaris, and that of Trapeſond by David and Alexius Comneni, whilſt Baldwin reigned at Conſtantinople. As for the Vandals, and their kingdom in Africa, it made ſo ſmall and ſhort a figure, and we know ſo little of its extent, and other particulars, except what we have ſo lately taken A. C. 1204.

 notice

[a] See vol. xvi. p. 505.

then offer any violence to him. The Hejra did not take place, till it was agreed upon, in the khalifat of Omar, that the Arabs ſhould ſuppute their time from thence (6).

(G) Several remarkable events ſupplied the Arabs with epochs before the Hejra, viz. the invaſion and reduction of Yaman by the Abaſſines; the expulſion of the Amalekites, by the family of Jorham, from the territory of Mecca; the battle of Ebn Wayel; the wars called Al Baſus and Dahes; the inundation of Al Arem; the fire Derar, which appeared in a ſtony diſtrict of the kingdom of Yaman, &c. The people of Yaman, however, for the moſt part, ſupputed their time according to the reigns of their kings (7).

(6) Golii not. ad Alfragan. p. 54. Al Jauhar. Al Firauza. had Al Shareſtan. Al Kodaius, & Pocock. ubi ſup. p. 173, 174.
(7) Al Kodaius apud Pocockium, ubi ſup. p. 172, 173, 174. ut & ipſe Pocock. ibid. Vid. & Ludolph. ubi ſup.

notice of in their hiſtory, that we think we need not repeat it here; but refer our readers to a former chapter in volume xvi. p. 221, & ſeq.

The empire and emperors of Nice.

Theodore Laſcaris founds the empire of Nice.

THEODORUS LASCARIS, ſon-in-law to the tyrant Alexius Angelus, having happily eſcaped out of Conſtantinople, and fled into Bithynia, was there received with ſuch demonſtrations of joy by the inhabitants, that he ſoon made himſelf maſter of Phrygia, Myſia, Lydia, and Ionia, from the Meander to the Black or Euxine Sea. Theſe he erected into an empire, and fixed his imperial reſidence in the famous city of Nice, from which this new empire took its name [b]. It was not long, however, before he ſaw himſelf invaded by two powerful enemies, his father-in-law, and Jathatines ſultan of Iconium, his old friend and ally, whom he called to his aſſiſtance againſt the new emperor. They marched accordingly againſt him with an army of twenty thouſand men, and laid ſiege to the city of Antioch, on the Meander, the then boundary of this new empire on that ſide.

Defeats Angelus and the Turks.

Laſcaris, though he could then muſter but two thouſand men, was yet forced to march to the relief of that place, leſt its falling into their hands ſhould open them a way to the heart of his dominions. They were ſurpriſed to find him come ſo ſuddenly, and with ſuch an handful of men, againſt them; but ſuch was his valour, and that of his troops, eſpecially of eight hundred of his Italians, that he gave the enemy a ſignal overthrow: but his Greeks being ſomewhat intimidated at the ſight of the ſuperior enemy, the ſultan, thinking that a proper time to renew the onſet, fell ſuddenly upon them, and, having ſingled Laſcaris out, threw him off his horſe at the firſt blow. Laſcaris ſoon recovered himſelf, unhorſed his competitor, ſtruck off his head, and, fixing it on the point of a lance, threw the enemy into ſuch a panic, that they betook themſelves to flight. Alexius, the author of this war, was taken priſoner, and carried in triumph to Nice, where he ended his days in a monaſtery, where Laſcaris had confined him. The Turks were ſoon after glad to accept of ſuch a peace as he was pleaſed to grant to them; and another being concluded between him and Henry the brother and ſucceſſor of Baldwin, he was then at full leiſure to

[b] Nicet. in Bald. c. 1, & ſeq.

to ſecure his new-founded empire to himſelf and ſucceſſors, which he did with vaſt ſucceſs and bravery, both againſt the Turks and Latins, during the ſpace of eighteen years [c].

At his death he left only a ſon, then an infant, and three daughters, the eldeſt of whom, named Irene, he had married to the brave John Ducas, ſurnamed Vataces, to whom he bequeathed his new monarchy; tho' he had two brothers, viz. Alexius and Angelus, whom it might be expected he would have entruſted with the care of his ſon and empire: but he ſeems to have been more intent in ſtrengthening and enlarging the latter, than to ſecure it to his neareſt kindred; and accordingly named his ſon-in-law his ſucceſſor, as the moſt capable of anſwering his deſign; and ſuch he really proved. His death and ſucceſſor.

2. John Ducas was accordingly crowned at Nice by Manuel the great patriarch, and proved no leſs brave and ſucceſsful than his predeceſſor. We have formerly had occaſion to mention his great ſucceſs againſt the Turks, and eſpecially the Latins, whom he defeated in ſeveral battles, and from whom he took a conſiderable number of places, which we ſhall forbear repeating here [d]. He died after a glorious reign of thirty-three years, in the ſixty-ſecond of his age, after having extended his conqueſts, not only in Aſia, but in Europe, and even almoſt to the gates of Conſtantinople; and was ſucceeded by his ſon, John Ducas crowned emperor. A. C. 1222.

3. Theodore Lascaris; who, during his ſhort reign, was likewiſe very ſucceſsful againſt the Bulgarians, and the deſpot of Epirus, as we have formerly ſeen [e]. One great overſight this prince was guilty of, was, the recalling the traitor Michael Paleologus, who was gone from him over to the Turks, and reſtoring him to his former dignity; for that gave him an opportunity of depriving his ſon of the empire, as we ſhall ſoon ſee. Theodore died in the third year of his reign, and was ſucceeded by his ſon, Theodore Laſcaris crowned. A. C. 1255.

4. John Lascaris, then about nine years of age; for which reaſon his father committed him, and the care of the John Laſcaris crowned. A. C. 1258.

[c] Idem ibid. c. 11. ad fin. See before vol. xvi. p. 505, paſſ.
[d] Ibid. p. 510, & ſeq. Vid. & Geor. Acrop. l. i. c. 2.
[e] Idem ibid. c. 12, & ſeq. See before vol. xvi. p. 510, & ſeq.

the empire, to Arſenius the then patriarch of Nice, and to the famed Muzalo, a perſon indeed of mean extract, but of great merit and fidelity, and deſervedly raiſed to the higheſt poſts in the empire. For this, Muzalo incurred the envy of the nobles, who, notwithſtanding the ſolemn oath which he had obliged them to take to the young prince, ruſhed with their ſwords drawn upon that brave miniſter, on the very day and place where the funeral obſequies of the deceaſed monarch were performed; and, in the midſt of the divine ſervice, diſpatched him at the foot of the altar, to which he had fled for ſanctuary. It is not improbable, that the treacherous Paleologus had the greateſt hand in the contriving and conducting of this aſſaſſination, as it was the moſt likely means to open him the way to the ſeizing on the imperial dignity, which he never muſt have ſo much as aimed at, whilſt the young prince was under the care of ſo brave and worthy a guardian. However that be, Muzalo was no ſooner diſpatched out of his way, but the traitor cauſed himſelf to be choſen to ſucceed him in the guardianſhip of the young emperor, and to be declared protector of the empire, without the leaſt notice or regard to the patriarch, who, tho' no conſummate ſtateſman, was yet a perſon of ſingular learning and merit.

Muzalo aſſaſſinated.

Paleologus choſen protector.

His treachery and treaſon. A. C. 1259.

His new dignity was ſoon after ſignalized with a complete overthrow, which his brother John gave to the deſpot of Epirus, who had then invaded the provinces of Thrace and Macedon. The news of this action no ſooner reached Magneſia, the place where the new protector then reſided, but he was ſaluted emperor by a number of his creatures, both of the nobility and populace. For this the worthy patriarch threatened to excommunicate him, and all his adherents; and Paleologus found no better expedient to ward off the blow, than by binding himſelf under a ſolemn oath to reſign the empire to the young prince, as ſoon as he came to be of age. This having for the preſent ſatisfied the too credulous prelate, he was eaſily perſuaded to crown him emperor. As we are no further concerned with any particulars of that uſurper's reign, than as they relate to the Nicean empire, to which he now put an end, we ſhall refer our readers to what has been ſaid of them in a former volume [f]; and only add here, that having ſoon after, that is,

[f] Before vol. vi. p. 513.

is, in the ſecond year of his reign, taken Conſtantinople from the Latins, he removed the ſeat of the empire from Nice to that antient metropolis, where he cauſed himſelf to be crowned afreſh emperor of the eaſt. The unfortunate young prince fell a ſacrifice to that tyrant's ambition, who cauſed, not long after, his eyes to be put out, and himſelf to be proclaimed the ſole lawful and rightful poſſeſſor of the empire. Arſenius, now convinced, though too late, of his fatal credulity, thundered out an excommunication againſt him, and all his adherents; but neither this, nor the great oppoſition which he met with from abroad, could wreſt the empire from him, tho' it proved a very troubleſome and thorny one, as we have elſewhere ſhewn [g]. This was the end of the Nicean empire, about fifty-ſeven years after its foundation. As for Nice, the metropolis of it, though it was in a great meaſure deveſted of its grandeur by the removal of the court to Conſtantinople, yet it continued to be ſo conſiderable a city, that it paſſed once and again from the Greeks, to the Turks, and back again, till it was at length taken by Orchanes in the manner as has been heretofore related [h]. A. C. 1261.

The empire of Trapezond.

THIS monarchy, which was founded, as we lately hinted, much about the ſame time with that of Nice, laſted much longer, and made a much more conſiderable figure in the world. It took its name from the famed city of Trapezond or Trapeſus, which was now made the imperial ſeat of the Comneni, and metropolis of this their new empire (A). David and Alexius Com- The foundation of the empire of Trapezond. A. C. 1204.

[g] Ibid. p. 517, & ſeq. et Pachym. l. i. & ii. paſſ. [h] Before, ibid. p. 531, & ſeq.

(A) Trapeſus or Trapezond, called alſo Trebizond, and by the Turks Tarabozan, was a Greek city in Pontus, founded by the antient Sinopians, and tributary to them, as we learn from Xenophon, who marched by it in his famous retreat, ſpoken of in a former volume (1). It is ſituate on the foot of a hill, which makes a kind of peninſula, on the Black or Euxine Sea, where it

(1) See before vol. v. p. 174, & ſeq.

neni (B), grandſons to the tyrant Andronicus, who had been lately put to ſuch a cruel, yet deſerved, death by Iſaac Angelus, as it begins to turn towards the eaſt. Its port is large and convenient, and the city itſelf well peopled, and ſurrounded with ſteep mountains (2).

It was formerly of ſuch conſideration, that the emperors of Conſtantinople always kept a deputy there; and, ſince its being brought under the Turks, it is become the reſidence of a beglerbeigh. After the overthrow of Mithridates, who had taken it, the Romans reſtored it, as they did moſt of the Greek cities in Aſia, to its former privileges and liberty (3).

But what rendered it ſtill more famous, was, its being made and continued the imperial reſidence of the Comneni from the foundation of their empire we are now upon, to the taking it by Mohammed II. of which we ſhall ſpeak in due place. The reader may ſee an account of its preſent ſituation, commerce, &c. in the volume laſt quoted.

Ariſtotle tells us of a kind of honey that was gathered off the box-trees in the neighbourhood of Trapezond, which was an almoſt infallible cure for the epilepſy; but adds, that if any perſon in health did venture to eat of it, it bereaved them of their ſenſes (4): he doth not tell us indeed whether it was this very Trapezond we are ſpeaking of, or ſome other; for there were more cities of that name, particularly one in Arcadia, ſaid to have been founded by, and named from, Trapeſus the ſon of Lycaon.

(B) The family of the Comneni was very antient and conſiderable. The reader may ſee a long account of it in the author quoted in the margin (5); but it became much more ſo after its having been honoured with the imperial diadem in the perſon of Iſaac Comnenus, who was raiſed to that dignity againſt Michael Stratioticus, by the officers of the army, as we have formerly ſeen (6). Andronicus, the grandfather of theſe Comneni, was of that family, and uncle to Alexius Comnenus then upon the throne, but no more than twelve years of age: againſt him he raiſed a revolt, in which he cauſed himſelf and young Alexius to be ſaluted as co-partners, and took him as his collegue to the empire, but ſoon after cauſed him to be murdered; for which, and his other tyrannies and cruelties, he was put to a moſt ſhameful and dreadful death (7).

(2) See Stephan. de urb. Baudran. & al. in voc. (3) See before, vol. ix. p. 375. (4) De mirab. orb. Vid & Steph. de urb. ſub voc. Pauſan. in Arcadic. (5) Du Freſne, hiſt. Byzant. de familiis Comnen. p. 160, & ſeq. ſtemm. 28. (6) See vol. xvi. p. 455, & ſeq. (7) Ibid. 491, 495.

as we have formerly ſeen [i], were the firſt founders of it. Theſe, having the good fortune to eſcape out of Conſtantinople together, came and ſeized on the more eaſtern parts of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia, and erected them into an empire; and Trapezond being then the ſtrongeſt and moſt conſiderable city in their dominions, they made it the ſeat of their reſidence, and called their new empire by its name. It doth not indeed appear, that they immediately took upon them the imperial title; much leſs, that they were ſoon acknowledged as ſuch. On the contrary, Vincent de Beauvais ſtyles them only lords of Trapezond [k]; but it is plain, that they ſoon arrived at a conſiderable height of power and intereſt, ſince the emperor Baldwin, about thirty-four years after A. C. 1239. their ſettling at Trapezond, ſought their alliance and friendſhip, and was by them aſſiſted in ſome conſiderable enterprizes againſt Vataces emperor of Nice, who had invaded ſome of his dominions, as we hinted under the laſt article, and elſewhere [l]. However, it is not improbable, that neither theſe of Trapezond, nor thoſe of Nice, took upon them the title of emperors till ſome time after the foundation of their monarchies; perhaps, as ſome conjecture [m], not till the uſurper Michael Paleologus had ſeized on that of Nice, and got himſelf crowned emperor at Conſtantinople; at which time the Comneni, either in contempt to him, or becauſe they could not brook an inferior title to his, did likewiſe aſſume the imperial dignity. However that be, it is certain, that, after they had once aſſumed it, their ſucceſſors maintained it with great ſucceſs and bravery; and cauſed themſelves to be acknowledged as ſuch by foreign powers, as long as their empire laſted, that is, till it was ſubdued and put an end to by Mohammed the Great, who, like an irreſiſtible inundation, drove all before him, as we ſhall ſee at the concluſion of this chapter.

Their religion, patriarchs, &c.

THE Trapezuntines were of the Greek church, and after the foundation of this new empire they had a patriarch of their own; but, whether choſen by the emperor, or the clergy, can only be darkly gueſſed at. After their becoming ſubject to the Turks, the latter ſtill choſe their patriarchs, who were afterwards confirmed by the ſultan. This was done done every-where, it ſeems, throughout the Turkiſh conqueſts, in the ſame manner as it was practiſed under the chriſtian emperors, that is, without paying any fine to the treaſury. The clergy of Trapezond were the firſt who cáuſed this dignity to be ſaddled with one of a thouſand ducats; which by degrees came afterwards to extend to thoſe of their other conqueſts. The occaſion of it being ſomewhat remarkable, we ſhall give it our reader in the margin (C). As for other particulars of their religion, laws, cuſtoms, &c. there is the leſs neceſſity to dwell longer on them, conſidering that theſe two empires were only diſmembered from the grand one, and differed in nothing from it but in their change

[i] Ibid. p. 495. [k] See before vol. ix. p. 375. [l] See before, vol. xvi. p. 512. & Acrop. in Vatac. c. 12. & ſeq. [m] Cruſius annotat. in lib. i. Turco-Græc. p. 60. & ſeq. Baudrand. ſub voc. Trapez. Du Freſne, hiſt. Byzant. p. 166, & ſeq.

(C) The Trapezontines were at that time under a patriarch named Mark, who was ſo ill beloved by his clergy, and by the nobles and people, that they agreed upon depriving him of his dignity, and to nominate unto it one Simeon, a countryman of theirs, then a monk or canon at the great church of Conſtantinople, a perſon of merit on ſeveral accounts, but eſpecially for his extraordinary hoſpitality. To compaſs their deſign, they fell upon the following doughty expedient: they accuſed Mark of having introduced a new kind of ſimony, till then unheard of among them, that is, to have agreed to pay one thouſand ducats into the ſultan's treaſury, as ſoon as he was confirmed in his dignity. The innocent patriarch in vain endeavoured to wipe off the foul accuſation by the moſt ſolemn oaths; his enemies had bribed ſo many conſiderable perſons, ſome of them eccleſiaſtics, to ſwear it againſt him, that he was adjudged guilty, and not only ipſo facto deprived of his dignity, but alſo worthy of excommunication and baniſhment. This being done, they took one thouſand ducats, and went with them to the ſultan, and told him, that ſince Mark, a perſon odious to the clergy and laity, had promiſed him that ſum upon his elevation to the patriarchate, they would now pay it to his highneſs, provided they might be permitted to raiſe their favourite monk to it.

The ſultan, who knew nothing of ſuch a promiſe, could not at firſt forbear ſmiling at the propoſal, and heſitated ſome time whether he ſhould accept of it; at length conſidering, that this would ſerve for a good precedent to oblige the future candidates to that dignity to the payment of the like ſum, owned to them, that Mark had indeed promiſed it to him: But, continued he, and taking the money at the ſame time, ſince he is ſo obnoxious to you, e'en turn him out, and appoint whom you will in his place; which was done accordingly (8).

(8) Du Freſne, hiſt. Byzant. ſtemm. 28. p. 169.

change of government, or rather governors. As for their trade, conſidering the excellent ſituation of their metropolis, and of ſome other of their cities, of which we have formerly given an account in the Pontic hiſtory [n], we need not doubt but the emperors encouraged it all they could; and the medals produced by Tournefort [o], as well as the coins mentioned by Du Freſne [p], leave us no room to doubt of the trade and opulence, both of their empire, and its metropolis, tho', ſince their falling into the hands of the Turks, they have fared like all the reſt of their conqueſts, and greatly failed of their antient commerce and ſplendor. It only remains, that we give an account of the Trapezontine monarchs from Alexius their founder to David their laſt emperor, and of their different wars, by which they maintained themſelves in their high dignity againſt ſo many powerful enemies, ſuch as were, ſome time, the Latins and the Greeks, eſpecially thoſe of the new Nicean empire, and at other times the Turks, Saracens, Perſians, &c. Theſe would doubtleſs make a conſiderable figure in this hiſtory, had they been tranſmitted to us in an uninterrupted ſeries; but the misfortune is, that the Byzantine hiſtorians, from whom we have all our chief intelligence, have only mentioned them occaſionally, and as they were immediately linked with the affairs of the Conſtantinopolitan empire; ſo that we muſt be content with the ſeries of thoſe eleven emperors, and with ſuch few particulars as we find recorded of them. We ſhall only add, that the duration of the Trapezontine empire was about two hundred and fifty-ſeven or two hundred and fifty-eight years, being founded in the year of Chriſt 1204, and ſubdued An. 1461, or 1462.

Trade.

Emperors of Trapezond.

1. ALEXIUS COMNENUS, ſurnamed the Great, and his brother David, were the ſons of Manuel, and grandſons of the tyrant Andronicus Comnenus. We have already ſpoken of the uſurpation and tyranny, as well as the diſmal end, of the latter. As for Manuel, he was the eldeſt ſon of Andronicus; but was ſo unlike his father in his vices, that he was Alexius the Great.

[n] See before, vol. ix. p. 375, & ſeq. [o] Voyages au Levant. [p] Hiſt. Byzant. ſtemm. 28. p. 168.

was diſinherited and impriſoned by him (D), and his next brother John appointed his ſucceſſor; but, when he found the whole populace exaſperated at it, he then tried in vain to appeaſe them, by pretending, that he always deſigned the empire for Manuel, and promiſing to name him to it. Upon the death of Andronicus, and the reſtoration of Iſaac Angelus, or rather ſoon after the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins, Manuel's two ſons, Alexius and his brother David, fled into Pontus, ſeized on Heraclea, and ſoon after made themſelves maſters of that whole province, together with Paphlagonia, Colchis, Galatia, Cappadocia, with ſome others of leſs note; and Alexius fixed his imperial ſeat at Trapezond [q]. He ſoon after made an alliance with Baldwin emperor of Conſtantinople, and aſſiſted him againſt Theodore Laſcaris, as we have already hinted. It doth not however appear, that he took the imperial title, moſt authors being of opinion, that it was either his grandſon or great-grandſon that firſt aſſumed it [r]; and that he only took that of duke or lord of Trapezond, as he is called by an antient author, who mentions him on account of his being uſed to furniſh the ſultan of Iconium with two hundred lances [s]. He was ſucceeded by,

2. ----COMNENUS; and he by

3. ----COMNENUS (E); of whoſe name and father we know nothing but what was hinted in the laſt note.

4. JOHN

[q] Nicetas in Baldwin. Acrop c. 7. Aithon. c. 13. [r] Vid. Cruſ. ubi ſup. Du Freſne ſub Alex. Mag. [s] Vincent. Bellovac. ſub ann. 1240.

(D) Among other things, by which Manuel diſobliged his father, one was, that he conſtantly refuſed to marry Agnes the daughter of Philip king of the Franks, and wife of Alexius the depoſed emperor of Conſtantinople, though his father earneſtly preſſed him to it, and promiſed him, upon his complying, to make him partner in the empire. His refuſal, which, our author ſays (9), he excuſed on account of ſuch a marriage being contrary to the eccleſiaſtical laws, did ſo incenſe the tyrant, that at laſt he caſt him into a priſon, and appointed his next ſon to ſucceed him (10).

(E) We have nothing recorded concerning theſe two, not even their names; only we are told, that John, the next in order, was

(9) Cruſius Turco-Græc. p. 124, & ſeq. (10) Nicet. in Andronic. lib. ii. n. 8. & ſeq. in Alex. Mag. n. 4. & in Iſaac. l. i. n. 5.

4. JOHN COMNENUS; the firſt, as is generally ſuppoſed, that took upon him the title of emperor. We hinted a little higher, the probable reaſon of his aſſuming it, viz. out of emulation againſt Michael Paleologus. To this we may add what a cotemporary author, who was protonotary to the ſaid Paleologus, ſays [t]; viz. that John rather ſuffered himſelf to be complimented with it by the Greeks, out of ſpite and contempt to that uſurper, who, by his ſubmiſſion to the pope, and uniting the Greek and Latin churches, had rendered himſelf odious to them. Another, who lived near the ſame time [u], hints much the ſame thing, when he ſays, that the province of Trapezond was antiently under the government of dukes, who were ſent thither in that quality by the Conſtantinopolitan emperors; that one of thoſe governors having made himſelf abſolute maſter there, took upon him the title of king; and that he that then reigned there, had aſſumed that of emperor. We do not find, however, that Michael made any oppoſition to this new-aſſumed title. The odium and other misfortunes he then laboured under, of which we took notice under the laſt article, rather obliged him to confirm it to him; at leaſt he thought fit to court his friendſhip and alliance by offering him his daughter Eudocia Paleologina in marriage; which John readily accepted of, and went to Conſtantinople to eſpouſe her; and it is probable enough, that his new title was then acknowledged and confirmed to him by his father. All that we know further of him is, that he was earneſtly courted by pope Nicolas IV. to engage in the holy war about the year 1291, and that he died about four years after, and left two ſons behind, by his wife Eudocia, viz. Alexius II. who ſucceeded him, and John his younger brother,

John, the firſt who is ſtyled emperor.

A. C. 1281.

A. C. 1295.

[t] Ogerius ap. Wadd. Vid. Du Freſne ſub Joh. Comn. [u] Aithon. c. 13.

was the grandſon, according to ſome, or the great-grandſon (11), according to others, of the great Alexius. Among theſe the famed Ogerius, protonotary of Michael Paleologus, who wrote about the year 1279, calls the then reigning emperor, that is, the John we are now ſpeaking of, the great-grandſon of Alexius the great; ſo that, according (12) to his account, there muſt have been two princes between theſe two laſt-named (13).

(11) Gregoras, lib. v. (12) Oger. apud Wadd. ubi ſup. (13) Vid. Du Freſne ſub Alex. Comn. p. 192.

ther, whom that princeſs took with her, being then very young, to Conſtantinople, ſoon after the emperor's death [w].

Alexius II. 5. ALEXIUS II. was born in 1282 [x], and left, by his father's laſt will, under the guardianſhip of Andronicus Paleologus the elder [y]. He married the daughter of an Iberian prince, tho' he had the offer of a much richer wife, which An-

A. C. 1303. dronicus Auguſtus had deſigned for him. He defeated the Genoeſe, and ſoon after entered into an alliance with them [z]. He was ſucceeded by his ſon, Baſilius I. 6. Baſilius I. who was forced to fight his way through to

A. C. 1320. gain his paternal inheritance [a]. He was highly courted by pope John XXII. to go over to the church of Rome [b]. His wife, or, as ſome think, hisſecond, was Eudocia the natural daughter of Andronicus Paleologus the younger [c]. He was ſucceeded by,

Baſilius II. 7. Baſilius II. called alſo the younger [d], to diſtinguiſh him, as is ſuppoſed, from his father. He married Irene Paleologina, daughter of Andronicus the younger; which ſhews, that he muſt be different from the former, who had married Eudocia, another of that monarch's daughters; for it was contrary to the canons of the Greek church to marry two ſiſters. Irene, however, was afterward ſet aſide to make way for another woman of the ſame name, with whom the emperor was fallen deeply in love; which ſo exaſperated his queen, that ſhe ſoon after hatched both their ruins: him ſhe cauſed

Cut off by his wife 1339. to be killed by ſome private means, and her ſhe ſent with her children under a guard to Conſtantinople. She governed the empire for ſome time, during which ſhe diſpatched ſome embaſſadors to her father, to deſire him to ſend ſome proper perſon, to whom ſhe might be lawfully married, and have children by, to ſucceed to the empire. The matter was no ſooner known at Trapezond, than an inſurrection was made againſt her; which ended in a civil war, in which Tzanychita, a Trapezuntine nobleman, who was head of one of the factions, was killed [e]. What became of her, or how the matter was concluded, we are not told; only that Baſil the emperor died in the year of Chriſt 1339 [f]. He left children both by his wife, and his concubine; the latter of which were,

as

[w] Pachym. lib. vi. c. 32, & ſeq. Gregoras, lib. v. & vi. Bzov. ſub an. 1181. n. 12. Wadd. apud Du Freſne ſub Joh. Comn. p. 192. [x] Pachym. l. ix. c, 27. [y] Gregor. l. v. [z] Idem ibid. Bzov. ubi ſup. [a] Gregor. l. xi. [b] Od. Reinald. ſub an. 1329. n. 95. [c] Greg. ibid. Vid. Du Freſne in Baſil. I. [d] Gregor. ibid. [e] Excerpt. ex Greg. ap. Du Freſne in Baſil. II. p. 193. [f] Gregor. ibid. Vigner. in bibl. hiſtor.

as we hinted, sent with their mother to Constantinople. He was succeeded by a son of the former,

8. ---COMNENUS, whose christian name has not been transmitted to us, and this last by his son Alexius. --Commenus.

9. ALEXIUS III (F). and the famed princess Eudocia Comnena, seem, by all circumstances of time, place, &c. to have been brother and sister, though their father's name is not recorded by any historian; neither is it easy to guess, at what time the former began to reign. As to his sister, she was a lady of extraordinary beauty, and, after having been married some time to a Turkish nobleman of great distinction, and having several children by him, as soon as she was a widow, she was courted and betrothed to Manuel the son of John, emperor of Constantinople, who brought her accordingly thither to consummate his marriage; but here that old monarch, though decrepit with age, gout, and other infirmities, fell so enamoured with her, that he married her himself about the year 1380 [g], that is, towards the latter end of his life and reign, at which time this Alexius was upon the throne of Trapezond. This last married, if we may believe Laonicus [h], some great lady of the Cantacuzenian family, who being already in love with a Trapezuntine nobleman, said to have been the keeper of the imperial wardrobe, she was reported to carry on a shameful intrigue with him. His eldest son was no sooner apprised of it, than he took an opportunity to dispatch her paramour, and then shut her up with the emperor in a room, with a design to have sent them both out of the world by the same way; he was, however, prevented by the people from committing that double parricide, and forced to flee into Spain. Alexius was so exasperated at his son, that he disinherited him, and named Alexander his younger son to succeed him; but John found means, by the help of some Spaniards and Genoese, to return to Trapezond; where he caused his father to be privately murdered, and afterwards to be magnificently interred. Alexius III. Murdered by his son.

[g] Laonic. l. ii. Phranz. l. iii. c. 2. [h] Lib. ix.

(F) Some have imagined this last to have been the son of Basilius II. and have struck out the anonymous one, who stands the eighth in the list; but it is scarce credible, that he could be the son of that Basil, who died An. 1339, whereas Alexius was still alive A. C. 1428, when he gave Mary his daughter to John then emperor of Constantinople (14).

(14) Du Fresne, ibid. p. 193.

magnificently interred in the cathedral of that metropolis, to avoid being ſuſpected to have a hand in his death [i].

John II. 1449. 10. JOHN II. called alſo Calo-Joannes, having thus diſpatched his father, mounted the throne, but found it very difficult to keep himſelf upon it; for the Turks, by this time grown very powerful, fell foul upon him on all ſides, ſo that he was forced to pay an anual tribute of three thouſand ducats to Amurat, and afterwards to his ſon Mohammed II. to enjoy the quiet poſſeſſion of it [k]. At his death he left only one ſon, named Alexius, then but four years of age, who was afterwards carried captive with the reſt of the family, at the taking of Trapezond, by Mohammed above-mentioned, and a daughter, named Catharina Comnena, who was by her uncle David given to Aſan Beigh, vulgarly called Uſum Cazanes, in order to prevail upon that monarch to aſſiſt him againſt the continual irruptions which the Turks made againſt him [k]. This was, however, done with this condition, that ſhe ſhould not be obliged to change her religion. John had theſe two by the daughter of one of the kings of Spain, whom ſhe married during his abode there [l]. Some will have her to have been David's own daughter [m], the laſt emperor of Trapezond, but without any foundation; for Laonicus expreſly calls her the daughter of John; and David himſelf, in his letter to Philip duke of Burgundy, ſays plainly enough, that ſhe was the daughter of Calo-Joannes [n].

David the laſt emperor. 11. DAVID COMNENUS, the third brother of John, and laſt emperor of Trapezond, ſeized on the crown, in wrong of his nephew, the young ſon of Alexius. He was a man of a ſavage and cowardly dipoſition [o]. He had married the princeſs Irene, of the Cantacuzen family, a lady highly celebrated for her greatneſs of ſoul, and conſtancy under adverſities [p]. Againſt David, Mohammed II. ſurnamed the Great, who by that time had made himſelf maſter of Græcia, Raſcia, and Servia, and of the city of Conſtantinople, declared war, under pretence, that he had aſſiſted Uſum Cazanes, king of Perſia, and was become tributary to him. David had neither courage courage nor ſtrength ſufficient to oppoſe him; ſo that he marched directly againſt his capital, and laid cloſe ſiege to it by ſea and land. The ſiege had laſted little above a month, when David, having in vain implored the aſſiſtance of chriſtian princes, particularly of Charles VII. king of France, agreed to deliver up this metropolis, and with it the whole empire, on condition, that his and his family's lives ſhould be ſpared, and he permitted to carry with him all his children and treaſures into Europe; and that, when there, he ſhould have a ſufficient revenue aſſigned to maintain him and them. Mohammed at firſt refuſed theſe offers with great indignation, not doubting to be ſoon maſter of that metropolis; but a ſecond parley being deſired, he in appearance accepted of them; but having once got the unfortunate emperor in his power, he treacherouſly cauſed him to be loaded with chains, and to be kept cloſe priſoner. Being now maſter of the city, he ſeized on the emperor's wife (G), daughters, and upon the reſt of his family, with as many of the nobility as he found in that metropolis, and cauſed them to be ſent in triumph to Conſtantinople. Of the reſt of the Trapezuntines he choſe as many as he thought fit for his ſervice, and ordered eight hundred promiſing youths to be brought up janiſaries. The handſome females he diſtributed among his captains and favourites, and ſome of the fineſt amongſt his own ſons. He left in the city none but the meaneſt of the people, put a ſtrong garriſon of janiſaries into the caſtle, another of common ſoldiers in the town, and made his admiral governor of both. The other cities of the empire ſubmitted to the conqueror in a little while after; ſo that the whole was Trapezond taken by Mohammed.

[i] Id. ibid. Vid & Phranz. l. ii. c. 1. Ducas, c. 22, & 45. Du Freſne ſub Alex. p. 194. [k] Phranz. l. ii. c 1. & ſeq. Laonic. l. ix. [k] Leuncl. in pand. Turc. n. 188. & Vigner. bibl. hiſtor. in an. 1456. Vid. & Cruiſ. not. in Turcogræc. p. 61. [l] Iid. ibid. [m] Spandugin. pius in Aſia, c. 53. & al. [n] Laonic. ubi ſup. Æneæ. Sylv. epiſt. 391. [o] Doroth. Monemb. ap. Leon. Allat. de conſenſ. utr. eccleſ. [p] Phranz, l. iii. Spandug. Laonic.

(G) So ſome authors affirm, and add, that ſhe ſaw, with the utmoſt conſtancy, her husband, and ſeven of her ſons, cruelly butchered by the tyrant, becauſe they would not turn Mohammedans; and that ſhe herſelf died ſoon after (15): but Laonicus affirms, that ſhe found means before the Turkiſh fleet appeared on their coaſts, to make her eſcape to Mamia (16); but what the author means by that word, whether ſome place of ſafety, or ſome relation, or friend, is not poſſible to gueſs. Another author affirms David to have been killed by a blow which Mohammed gave him with his doubled fiſt (17).

(15) Doroth. Menemb. Spandugin. Phranz. & al. (16) Lib. ix. (17) Phranz. lib. iii. c. 2.

was reduced to his obedience in few months, and he returned triumphant into Conſtantinople [q].

The royal family butchered by him.

SOON after his arrival thither, he ſent the emperor David, and his children, priſoners to Adrianople; and not long after, upon ſome motions made, or pretended to have been made, in their favour by the wife of Uſum Cuzanes, he cauſed them to be put to death. He ſtrove to root out, as much as lay in his power, the whole Comnenian family; and none of them were ſpared, but George the youngeſt ſon of David, who turned Mohammedan, and one of his ſiſters, who became afterwards Mohammed's concubine [r]. Thus ended the Trapezuntine empire, in the year of Chriſt 1462, and in the 257th or 258th of its foundation [s].

A. C. 1462.

[q] Iid. ibid. Doroth. Monemb. & al. Vid. & Cruiſ. Du Freſne, & auct. ab eis citat. [r] Laonic. l. ix. & x. Hiſt. politic. p. 21. Ricaut. Ottoman empire, &c. [s] Iid. ibid.

CHAP. X.

The antient ſtate and hiſtory of Spain, to the expulſion of the Carthaginians by the Romans, and briefly continued to the deſcent of the Northern nations.

SECT. I.

Deſcription of Spain.

Limits and extents of Spain.

AS the only land contiguous to Spain was Gaul, from whence it was ſeparated on the N. by the Pyrenees, we may conſider it as a peninſula. On the other ſides we find it ſurrounded by the Mediterranean, the Sinus Gaditanus or bay of Cadiz, the Fretum Herculeum or ſtreights of Gibraltar, the weſtern ocean, and ſea of Cantabria. It muſt have extended, from E. to W. near thirteen degrees, ſince Lisbon is 9°. 30′. W. of London, and cape de Bauger in Catalonia 3°. 15′. E. of that city; and from N. to S. about 9°. 40′. ſince cape de Ortegal, the northern extremity of modern Spain, is in 44°. 10′. N. lat. and the ſouthermoſt point of Tariffa,

CANTABRIANS
PART OF GAUL
GULF OF GAUL
The Pyrenean Mountains
Artabrum pr. Finister
Artabri
Transmontani
Lucenses
Gallaici
Augustani
Cantabri
Concani
Autrigones
Vardüli
Vascones
Tolosates
Suessitani
Lacetani
Cempsi
Barguſii
Iacce'tani
Cerretani
Aufetani
Ilergetes
Ilergetes
Sedetani
Laletani Ones
Hedetani
Celtiberi
Celtici
Turdetani
Turdetani
Turduli
Turdulorum
Vettones
Areva'ci
Vaccæi
Berones
Pelendones
Lusitani
Carpetani
Lusones
Olcades
Contestani
Bæturia
Baſtitani
Baſtuli
Gades
Oretani
Oretum
Oretum Malum
Mentiſſa
Castulo
Tugia
Illiberis
Pompeii Tropæa
Veneris Fanum and prom.
Rhoda
Emporiæ
Gerunda
Blanda
Barcino
Rubricatus R.
Tarraco
Iberus R.
Derfosa
Incibilis
Ildum
Urbs Turdetanorum
Segobriga
Hedeta
Valentia
Sucro R.
Bigerra
Orcelis
Dianium
Illici
Lucentum
Ophiusa I.
Alone
Carthago Nova Spartarius Campus
Virgi
Murgis opt. Virgi
Portus magnus
Abdera
Basti
Menoba
Malaca
Singili
Ostipo
Urso
Singules R.
Iliberis
Ulia
Epora
Corduba
Calpurniani
Bæcula
Oningi
Accaturci
Oringa alt. Aurinx
Ilipa Mag.
Italica
Carriana
Merobriga
Araci
Julia Myrtilis
Ceria
Onoba Aestuaria
Ossonoba
Balsa R.
Ilipula M.
Ex Sex Selambrina
Charidemi Promont.
Gades
Basippo
Patria Melæ
Mellaria
Barbesul
Ilniani
Saldubа
Iuel
Menesthei Portus
Munda
Segontia
Arta
Tarteſsus
Tigia
Ostium Oppidanum
Sacrum promont.
Tarteia
Calpe prom. alt. Columna
Septa
Streights of Hercules
P. of AFRICA
Traducta
Baſtuli
Turduli
Lancia Oppidana
Lancia
Segisama
Pintia
Vallaria
Interamnium Vallaviæ
Palantia
Astuſica Augusta
Brigecum
Porta Intercatia
Tela
Visontium
Numantia
Uxama
Clunia
Durius R.
Mirobriga
Salamantica
Aqueductus
Hurbida
Cauca
Arcobriga
Celsa
Iberus R.
Ilerda
Carthago Vetus
Cinga R.
Iscoris R.
Cæcilogena alt. Ercavica
Bilbilis R.
Bilbilis
Segontia
Controbia
Complutum
Titulcia
Althæa
Alce
Consaburum
Toletum
Caput Anæ
Livinosa
Segobriga
Turias R.
Segontia
Aebura
Caſarea
Norba
Tagus R.
Turmuli F.
Ad VII
Meidobriga
Hierabriga
Olisipo
Augusta Emerita
Metallinum
Mirobriga
Badia alt. Pax Augusta
Ceniani
Cetobrix
Ebora
Salacia
Salticis
Julia Regiana
Mariani Mts
Tucci Aug. Gemella
Castulo
Tugia
Terebus R.
Bæcula
Oringa alt. Aurinx
Accaturci
Ilipa Mag.
Epora
Corduba
Calpurniani
Italica
Carriana
Merobriga
Araci
Julia Myrtilis
Ceria
Onoba Aestuaria
Ossonoba
Balsa R.
Hispalis
Ostippo
Tigia
Tarteſsus
Arta
Segontia
Ostium Oppidanum
Sacrum promont.
Gades
Basippo
Patria Melæ
Mellaria
Barbesul
Ilniani
Saldubа
Iuel
Menesthei Portus
Munda
Malaca
Singili
Singules R.
Iliberis
Ulia
Ostigi
Hispalis
Onoba Aestuaria
Ossonoba
Balsa R.
Ilipula M.
Ex Sex Selambrina
Charidemi Promont.
Abdera
Portus magnus
Basti
Menoba
Urso

Tariffa in 35°. 50′. N. lat. According to this determination, antient Spain, including Luſitania or Portugal, was about five hundred and ninety-four miles long, and five hundred and eighty broad. As the natural limits of antient and modern Spain are the ſame, they may be looked upon entirely as the ſame region. Some modern geographers have aſſigned this kingdom too large an extent, as our readers will find by conſulting them [a].

Names of Spain.

THE generality of the Greek writers call Spain Ἰβηρία Iberia, either from a colony of Iberians, a people bordering upon mount Caucaſus, planted there, or from the Iberus, the Ebro of the moderns, one of the moſt noted rivers of this country. However, the antients who lived before Polybius, by Iberia underſtood only that part of Spain extending from the Pyrenees to Calpe, or the ſtreights of Gibraltar, and terminated by the Mediterranean; the other part being unknown to, and conſequently going under no name amongſt, the Greeks and Romans. As the Iberus was by far the moſt conſiderable river of this tract, it might have received the denomination of Iberia from thence, as Egypt, according to ſome, did its name from the Nile, which Homer intimates to have been called Ægyptus. But, notwithſtanding what is here advanced, we apprehend, that the true and proper Iberia was originally only that part of Spain called Celtiberia, from a body of Celts ſettling in it, bounded by the Iberus, the Pyrenees, and the Mediterranean; which if we admit, it is no wonder, that the Phœnicians gave it the name of Iberia. For the Hebrew עבר Eber, as well as the Chaldee, Syriac, or Phœnician עברא Ebra or Ibra, in the ſingular number, ſignifies a paſſage, and in the plural bounds or limits. The Phœnicians, therefore, might either have called the moſt conſiderable river of this tract, and one of its boundaries, Eber, Iber, Ebra, &c. and from thence ſtyled the inhabitants of it Iberians; or have denominated the tract itſelf Iberia, from its ſituation, it having been generally conſidered by them as one of the remoteſt regions, or weſtern limit, of the earth. Be that as it will, we can by no means think it probable, that any part of Spain was called Iberia, from a colony of Iberians ſettled there, ſince hiſtory does not in the leaſt countenance ſuch a notion. Feſtus Avienus places the Iberi upon the coaſt of the Atlantic ocean, to the weſt of the Iberus, a little river between the Bœtis and the Anas, the Rio Tinto, or Rio de Azeche, of the moderns. But his authority, with regard to the ſituation of the moſt antient Iberia, muſt gave way to that of Polybius [b].

[a] Strab. l. iii. Plin. nat. hiſt. l. iii. c. 1. Ptol. geogr. l. ii. c. 4. Vid. & Chriſtophor. Cellar. in geogr. ant. l. ii. c. 1. ſub init. Joan. Luyts philoſ. profeſſ. introd. ad geograph. nov. & vet. c. 6. p. 50, 51. Traject. ad Rhen. 1692. Morden, Moll, Cluver, &c.

Whence called Spania or Hiſpania.

It appears from Bochart and others, that the Phœnicians called Spain, at leaſt that part of it known to them, שפנ'ה Sphanija, or Spanija, from שפן Shaphan, or Span, a rabbet, becauſe it abounded with thoſe animals. In ſupport of this notion, it may be obſerved, that in many manuſcripts of Curtius, Juſtin, Capella, Apuleius, Julius Capitolinus, Athenæus, &c. for Hiſpania is found Spania, as we learn from Caſaubon and Salmaſius. From the Phœnician Spanija, the Romans deduced their Spania or Hiſpania; which appellation, as well as Iberia, in common with the Greeks, they applied to the whole continent of Spain. That this country, or at leaſt a conſiderable part of it, produced rabbets, in vaſt abundance, may be evinced from the concurrent teſtimony of Varro, Strabo, Pliny, Ælian, and many other writers of good authority; but, that the Saphan of the Phœnicians anſwered to the rabbet, can by no means be allowed. However, as the former, in many particulars, bore a near reſemblance to the latter, the Phœnicians, at their firſt arrival in Spain, might take them to be the ſame animal, and from thence impoſe upon this country a name, which has ever ſince prevailed. The antients ſometimes, from its ſituation, denominated Spain likewiſe Heſperia, and Heſperia Ultima; but theſe, and other poetical appellations, as being applied to other countries, deſerve little or no regard [c].

As

[b] Chriſtoph. Ceſſar. ubi ſup. Polyb. lib. iii. Homer. apud Bochart. in Chan. l. i. c. 35. ut & ipſe Bochart. ibid. Val. Schindler. lex. pentaglot. in voc. עברה. Claudian. in Stilich. Strab. l. iii. p. 169. & Poſidon. apud Strabon. ibid. Philoſtrat. in vit. Apollon. Tyan. l. ii. c. 14. Pind. olymp. iii. ſub. fin. & ſcholiaſt. Pind in loc. Plin. nat. hiſt. l. iii. c. 7. Feſtus Avien. in or. maritim. [c] Rom. c. xv. ver. 24. 28. Theophyl. ad Autolyc. l. ii. Euſeb. in chronic. p. 13. Epiphan. in hæreſ. lxvi. ſect. 83. Pæan. de Hadrian. Scholiaſt. vet. Juvenal. in ſat. xiv. Athen. deipnoſoph. l. viii. ſub init. Salmaſ & Caſaub. apud Bochart. in Chan. l. i. c. 35. ut & ipſe Bochart. ibid. Varro de re ruſtic. l. iii. c. 12. Strab. l. iii. p. 144. 168. Plin. nat. hiſt. l. iii. c. 5. & l. viii. c. 29. 58. Ælian. de animal. l. xiii. c. 15. Galen.

de

As Spain, before the Carthaginians made any conqueſts there, was inhabited by many cantons, governed by their own reguli, and independent on one another, it muſt have been originally divided into various petty kingdoms, the preciſe number of which it is impoſſible for us at this day to determine. What number of provinces the Carthaginians divided that part of Spain ſubject to them into, for want of ſufficient light from antient hiſtory, we muſt likewiſe own ourſelves incapable of aſcertaining. As for the Romans, the firſt diviſion they made of Spain, or rather that part of it they had reduced, was into Hiſpania Citerior and Hiſpania Ulterior; and this, according to Livy, took place immediately after the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war. However, for ſome political reaſons, they thought proper to unite theſe two provinces, in the beginning of the Macedonian war; and again disjoined them in the conſulate of Q. Ælius Pætus and M. Junius Pennus. This laſt diſpoſition of Spain remained till the reign of Auguſtus, who altered it, by dividing Hiſpania Ulterior into two provinces, viz. Provincia Bœtica, and Luſitania, and affixing the name of Provincia Tarraconenſis to Hiſpania Citerior. In ſome of the ſucceeding reigns we find Hiſpania Ulterior and Hiſpania Citerior again mentioned; notwithſtanding which, that the diviſion introduced by Auguſtus continued as long as the Romans had any footing in Spain, appears extremely probable, both from the antient geographers, and many antique inſcriptions exhibited by Gruter and Reineſius. Upon this plan, therefore, we ſhall here beg leave to give our readers a geographical deſcription of antient Spain [d].

Various diviſions of Spain.

The limits of (A) Luſitania not having been always the ſame, we cannot take upon us to define them. That it extended de aliment l. iii. nic. &c. p. 376. p. 80. & l. iv. c. 9. Hor. l. i. od. 36. & Cellar. ubi ſup.

Limits and extent of Luſitania.

[d] Polyb. & Liv. paſſ. Cic. pro Fonteio, c. 3. & pro lege Manil. c. 12. Strab. in extrem. par. geograph. Dio, l. liii. p. 503. Pompon. Mel. l. i. c. 6. Solin. c. 23. Tacit. an. iv. c. 13. Plin. l. iii. c. 7. Steph. Byzant. de urb. & Luc. Holſten. in loc. Grut. inſcript. xiii. p. 31. & alib. Reineſ. inſcript. claſ. ii. n. 13. & alib. Vid. & Cellar. ubi ſup.

Shaw's phyſical obſervations, &c. in Syr. Phœ-Proſp. Alpin. hiſt. nat. Ægypt. par. i. c. 20.

(A) Bochart ſays, that the country called Luſitania derived its name from לוז Luz an almond, becauſe it produced vaſt quantities of tended from the Tagus to the Cantabrian ocean, or at leaſt the Promontorium Celticum, is intimated by Strabo. That part of it ſituated betwixt the Anas and the Tagus went by the name of Celtica, or the country of the Celts, as has been obſerved by Iſaac Voſſius. After Auguſtus had made the diſpoſition of Spain above-mentioned, the Anas bounded Luſitania on the ſouth, and the Durius, or Douro of the moderns, on the north; ſo that the whole tract lying betwixt the Durius and the Cantrabrian ocean was annexed to the Provincia Tarraconenſis. The interior limits of Luſitania, upon the frontiers of the Vettones and Carpetani, are fixed differently by different authors; which, as Cellarius intimates, may have been owing to a miſtake adopted by ſome of thoſe authors; viz. that the province of Luſitania correſponded exactly with the country of the Luſitani; whereas, according to Pliny, not only the Luſitani, but the Celtici, Turduli, Vettones, &c. were ſeated in that province. The Luſitani poſſeſſed the diſtrict bordering upon the Atlantic ocean, and ſtretching itſelf from the mouth of the Anas to the Promontorium Sacrum, now known by the name of Cape St. Vincent. As for the Celtici, whoſe true name was Mirobrigenſes, according to Pliny, their ſituation may be collected from what has been already obſerved. Some of the antient geographers make the Turduli and Turdetani one nation, particularly Ptolemy and Strabo; though they ſeem to have been conſidered in a different light by Polybius. Be that as it will, the Turdetani were undoubtedly a powerful people, ſince they occupied a conſiderable part both of Luſitania and Bœtica, as appears from Strabo. The ſame may be ſaid of the Vettones, who ſpread themſelves over a large tract, terminated on the north by the Durius, and on the ſouth by the Tagus. However, as the antients differ with regard to the extent of territory every one of thoſe nations or cantons poſſeſſed, it is probable, that their frontiers were not always the ſame. Some authors aſſert Vettonia, or the country of the Vettones, to have been

a

of that fruit, as he proves from various authors. But we think, unleſs our readers ſhould take it to be of Celtic original, it ought to be deduced from לוז and תנו or אגוז Luz and Tani or Tana, an almond, and ing; for that Luſitania produced both thoſe kinds of fruit, Bochart clearly evinces in the place referred to. It is plain, therefore, from hence, that the word Luſitania is not of Roman extraction (1).

(1) Bochart. Chan. lib. i. c. 35. Val. Schind. lex. pentaglot. in vocib.

a province diſtinct from Luſitania, and limited on the ſouth by the Anas; and this notion ſeems to be countenanced by an inſcription in [e] Gruter. The principal cities of this province are the following:

OLISIPO, or Oliſippo, called at preſent, by the Engliſh, Liſbon, and, by the Portugueze, Liſboa. It ſtands at the mouth of the Tagus, and was corruptly named, by ſome of the antients, Ulyſippo; from whence ſome have imagined, that it was built by Ulyſſes, in his return home from the Trojan war. But this notion ought to be looked upon as a mere fiction, deſtitute of the leaſt ſhadow of hiſtorical proof to ſupport it. We cannot, therefore, but believe, that Oliſipo, or Oliſippo, which, from Pliny, the Itinerary, and Gruter, appears to have been the genuine proper name of this city, was originally formed from the two Phœnician words עליץ עבא alis ubbo, or olis ippo, "the pleaſant bay". For, that the antient Oliſipo was ſeated on a bay, we learn from Mela; and that the bay, on which Liſbon ſtands, is extremely pleaſant, all the moderns allow. Oliſipo, or Liſbon, the capital of the preſent kingdoms of Portugal and Algarve, is in 39°. 10′. N. lat. and 9°. 30′. W. of London [f]. Oliſipo.

TALABRICA, or Talabriga, a city ſeated upon the Vacus, mentioned by Pliny, Antoninus, and Appian. The citizens of Talabriga, from their frequent violations of treaties concluded between them and the Romans, ſeem to have had an uncommon averſion to that people; which is the principal thing we find related of them [g]. Talabrica.

LANGOBRIGA (B), a town ſituated between the Vacus and the Durius, not far from the ſea-coaſt. As both Pliny Langobriga.

[e] Strab. l. iii. p. 96. 105, & alib. Iſaac Voſſius in Pompon. Mel. Plin. ubi ſup. Polyb. ubi ſup. Prudent. paſſion. Eulal. ver. 186. Petr. de Marca, Marcæ Hiſpanic. l. ii. c. 2. Grut. inſcript. p. 383. n. 7. & Cellar. ubi ſup.. [f] Solin. c. 23. Grut. inſcript. p. 252. num. 5. Plin. l. iv. c. 22. Cellar. ubi ſup. p. 56. Pompon. Mela & Mercator apud Bochart. ubi ſup. ut & ipſe Bochart. ibid. [g] Antonin. itinerar. Plin. l. iii. Appian. in bel. Hiſp.

(B) The word Brica or Briga, in the old Spaniſh language, ſignified a city, as we learn from Reſendius. Therefore Cetobriga, Arabriga, Langobriga, Meidobriga, &c. are equivalent to the city of Ceto, the city of Ara, the city of Lango, the city of Meido, &c. Hence, probably, came the words Brigantes, Brigantii, and Antoninus take particular notice of it, it muſt have been a place of ſome repute [h].

Ara Ducta. ARA DUCTA, or, according to Reineſius, Ara Tradućta, a Roman town, ſtanding to the W. of Langobriga. Our readers will find it in Ptolemy's liſt of the towns appertaining to Luſitania [i].

Æminium. ÆMINIUM, a city of this province, mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy, near the northern bank of the Munda, a little to the S. of Talabriga [k].

Conimbrica. CONIMBRICA, a city ſeated on the oppoſite bank of the Monda. Out of the ruins of this place has ariſen the modern Coimbra, one of the fineſt towns in Portugal, and celebrated all over the learned world, for the famous univerſity which has ſo long flouriſhed there [l].

Arabriga, Sellium, and Concordia. ARABRIGA, Sellium, and Concordia, betwixt Conimbrica and the Tagus, ſeem to have been places of ſome note, though we have ſcarce any particulars relating to them handed down to us by the antient geographers [m].

Collippo. COLLIPPO, a Roman municipium, between the Munda and the Tagus, upon the coaſt of the Atlantic ocean. We find this town named, by an inſcription in Gruter, COLLIPRO; but, that the R there was originally a P, appears from the beſt manuſcripts of Pliny, as well as another inſcription. Not far from this city, in a ſouth-weſtern direction, ſtood Eburobritium, or, as, in our opinion, it ought to have been written, Eburobriga. As the ſtones, that preſerved the above-mentioned inſcriptions, were in the neighbourhood of Liria, ſome believe, that the ruins of the antient Collippo are to be ſought for there [n].

Scalabis. SCALABIS, or Scalabiſcus, as ſome think it called by Ptolemy, has been conſidered by Cellarius as the fifth Roman colony of Luſitania, ſurnamed Præſidium Julium. The Spaniſh writers writers almoſt unanimouſly agree, that the ſpot, on which this town ſtood, is at preſent occupied by Santerien, a Portugueſe town about forty miles N. E. of Liſbon; though the Scalabiſcus of Ptolemy had a ſituation aſſigned it to the N. of the Munda [o].

[h] Plin. & Antonin. ubi ſup. [i] Ptol. geograp. l. ii. c. 5. Tho. Reines. apud Cellar. ubi ſup. [k] Plin. & Ptol. ubi ſup. [l] Plin. ubi ſup. Laur. Andr. Reſend. in antiquit. Luſitan. l. iv. [m] Ptol. & Antonin. ubi ſup. [n] Plin. Ptol. & Reſend. ubi ſup. Grut. inſcript. p. 323. & p. 1155.

Brigantii, Brigæcum, Brigobanna, &c. all which are evidently of Celtic extraction (2).

(2) Laur. Andr. Reſend. in antiquitat. Luſitan. l. iv. in Cetobriga.

Aritium Prætorium and Hierabriga.

ARITIUM Prætorium and Hierabriga, in the neighbourhood of Scalabis, are mentioned by the Itinerary. The former place ſtood thirty-eight Roman miles from Oliſipo, and the latter thirty [p].

Norba Cæſaria.

NORBA CÆSARIA, a town of repute during the government of the Romans in Spain, on the ſouthern bank of the Tagus, near the famous ſtone bridge built over that river, and dedicated to Trajan. Pliny calls the inhabitants of this city Colonia Norbenſis. Some Spaniſh authors believe Norba Cæſaria to have been contiguous to Trajan's bridge. But other writers of that nation, well verſed in the antiquities of their country, maintain the contrary. The latter, in ſupport of their opinion, affirm the city of Alcantara, ſeated on the ſpot adjoining to the noble ſtructure above-mentioned, to have been built by the Saracens; but the former think it may have ariſen out of the ruins of the antient Norba. Pliny and Ptolemy ſeem to favour the ſentiment of thoſe, who place Norba at ſome diſtance from the bridge; ſince they make that town, or, which is the ſame thing, the Colonia Norbenſis, to have been ſituated in a territory to the ſouth of the Tagus. Be that as it will, we are informed by an antient Roman inſcription in Gruter, that the Roman municipia of Luſitania, by ſums raiſed amongſt themſelves, finiſhed the aforeſaid bridge, in the reign of the emperor Trajan. The names of theſe municipia, or rather their inhabitants, have been preſerved by a ſtone, belonging formerly either to the bridge or the town of Norba, viz. Icadita, Lancia Oppidana, Arabriga, Mirobriga, Lancia Tranſcudana, Colarnum, Meidobriga, Interamnia, &c. Some, if not all, of theſe municipia undoubtedly made a conſiderable figure, though we are ſupplied with very few particulars relating to them by the antient geographers and hiſtorians [q].

Bletiſa.

BLETISA was ſituated near ſome of the above-mentioned municipia, on the ſouthern bank of the Durius, as as may be inferred from an inſcription in Gruter. The modern name of Bletiſa is Ledeſma, according to Mariana, who ſuppoſes the antient and modern cities, going by thoſe names, to have been the ſame. As to any farther particulars of this place, we are entirely in the dark [r].

[o] Plin. Ptol. Reſend. & Cellar. ubi ſup. [p] Antonin. itinerar. ubi ſup. [q] Plin. Ptol. Reſend. ubi ſup. Nonius & Vaſæus, apud Cellar. ubi ſup. p. 58. Grut. inſcript. p. 162.

Salmantica. SALMANTICA, called at this day Salamanca, was in the neighbourhood of Bletiſa, as appears from the above-mentioned inſcription. It is at preſent famous all over the world, on account of the flouriſhing univerſity founded there, which for ſeveral ages, has been deemed the principal ſeat of literature in Spain. [s].

Auguſta Emerita. AUGUSTA EMERITA, the capital of this province in the Roman times, upon the Anas, was built by a body of ſuperannuated ſoldiers, to whom Auguſtus aſſigned a diſtrict in Luſitania; from whence this city deduced its name. This colony we find frequently mentioned by antient Roman coins and inſcriptions. Emerita at firſt appertained to the Turduli, according to Strabo; though afterwards it was ranked amonſt the towns of the Vettones, as we learn from Prudentius. This may be eaſily accounted for, if we conſider, that the Vettones, in proceſs of time becoming more powerful than the Turduli, at length made themſelves maſters of their country. Our readers will find a more minute account of this city and colony in the authors here referred to [t].

Ebora. EBORA, called, by the Romans, Liberalitas Julia, was ſeated between the Tagus and the Anas, though it approached nearer the latter than the former river. The ſame ſpot is at preſent occupied by Evora, where there has long flouriſhed a famous univerſity. This town was a Latin municipium, as appears from ſeveral antient coins and inſcriptions [u].

Salacia. SALACIA, the Alacer do Sal of the moderns, ſtood ſome miles to the W. of Ebora. From ſome antient inſcriptions in Gruter it may be inferred, that this place was a Roman municipium [w].

PAX

[r] Grut. inſcript. p. 199. num. 2. Marian. l. vii. c, 4. Cellar. ubi ſup. [s] Ptol. & Gruter ubi ſup. [t] Strab. ubi ſup. Dio, l. liii. p. 114. Num. Auguſt. & Num. Tiber. apud Cellar. ubi ſup. p. 60. Prudent. ubi ſup. Ludovic. Non. c. 31. [u] Plin. ubi ſup. Grut. inſcript. p. 489. num. 9. Num. var. Auguſt. apud Cellar. ubi ſup. p. 62. [w] Plin. ubi ſup. & alib. Grut. inſcript. p. 13. num. 16.

Pax Julia. PAX JULIA, the Beja of the moderns, a city in the ſouthern part of the province, ſtood near the frontiers of the Turdetani, if it did not actually belong to that nation. It is taken notice of by Pliny, Ptolemy, and Antoninus. Near this place a vaſt number of Roman coins and inſcriptions have been found within theſe few years. All the remaining tract to the ſouth of this city, limited on the eaſt, weſt, and ſouth, by the Anas, the Atlantic ocean, and bay of Gades, from its figure, was called Cuneus by Pomponius Mela and Strabo. Myrtilis, Balſa, Oſſonaba, and other places of this tract, deſerve not any great regard. However, it may not be improper to obſerve, that, according to Reſendius, Mortola, or Mertolo, a modern town upon the Anas, and Tanilla, or Tavira, a conſiderable city of Algarve, anſwer to the antient Myrtilis and Balſa. As for Oſſonaba, if we will believe the ſame author, it has for a long time lain in ruins, though ſome footſteps of it are ſtill remaining, particularly in the walls of Faro, another town of Algarve upon the ſea-coaſt. The Lacobriga of Mela ſtood under the Promontorium Sacrum, known in theſe times by the name of Cape St. Vincent, upon a ſpot occupied at preſent by a village called Lagoa by the Portugueſe, near the city of Lagos, where ſome remains of it are ſtill to be ſeen [u].

As the other towns of Luſitania, whoſe names only have been handed down to us by the antient geographers, were either inſignificant and obſcure, or almoſt all traces of them have been loſt, our readers will not expect any account or deſcription of them. Neither is it reaſonable, in a work of this nature, to take any notice of what merits not the leaſt attention [w].

Promontories of Luſitania. THE chief promontories of Luſitania were the Promontorium Sacrum, Promontorium Barbarium, and the Promontorium Magnum, or Oliſiponenſe; to which ſome add a fourth, called, by Pliny, Cuneus. The Promontorium Sacrum, or Cape St. Vincent, formed an angle projecting into the bay of Gades and the Atlantic ocean, which was termed the weſtern extremity of the world by Strabo. The Promontorium Barbarium, at preſent Cape Spichel, lay to the ſouth of Oliſipo, though not very diſtant from the mouth of the Tagus. The Promontorium Magnum, or Oliſiponenſe, [u] Plin. Ptol. Antonini ubi ſup. Pompon. Mel. & Strab. ubi ſup. Laur. Andr. Reſend. in antiquit. Luſitan. & Grut. inſcript. paſſ. [w] Plin. Ptol. &c.

ſiponenſe, ſtyled, by ſome of the moderns, Cape de Rocca Sintra, projected into the Atlantic ocean near Oliſipo, and was made by Pliny the common boundary of Earth, Sea, and Heaven. As for Pliny's Cuneus, it is ſuppoſed to be the promontory at this day known by the name of Cape St. Mary by Cellarius [x].

Ports and iſlands.

The principal ports of this province were thoſe of Oliſipo, at preſent Lisbon, and Hannibal. The ſituation of the former is ſo well known, as not to admit of a diſpute; but that of the latter cannot be ſo eaſily aſcertained. Mela, upon whoſe authority it entirely depends, places it near the Promontorium Sacrum; which is all that we can ſay of it. The only iſland taken notice of by the antients, on the coaſt of Luſitania, is the Londobris of Ptolemy, the Barlenga or Barlinges of the moderns [y].

Mountains.

THE Mons Herminius of Hirtius, the modern Arminno, ſeems to have been the only mountain of note in this country, of which we have nothing farther to ſay, than that, according to Cellarius, Medobriga, or Meidobriga, ſtood at the foot of it [z].

Rivers.

THE moſt celebrated rivers of Luſitania were the Anas, the Tagus, and the Durius. The Anas is called at preſent the Guadiana, the Tagus the Tajo, and the Durius the Douro. To theſe may be added the Munda, which now goes under the name of the Mondego; and the Vacus, now called the Voga. They all flow from E. to W. and empty themſelves into the Atlantic ocean [a].

Curioſities.

WE ſhall here only mention two of the natural curioſities of Luſitania: 1. The lead-mine near Meidobriga, from whence Pliny denominates the inhabitants of that place Plumbarii; which ſtill exiſts. 2. The golden ſand, or ſmall particles of gold mixed with the ſand of the Tagus. This we find atteſted by Pomponius Mela, Ovid, Pliny, Silius Italicus, &c. and the truth of it ſeems confirmed by Reſendius. For that famous antiquary aſſures us, that ſome of theſe golden particles were found intermixed with the ſand of the Tagus in his time; that the laws of Portugal would not permit people to throw up the interior ſand on the banks of the Tagus, with which theſe particles are ſuppoſed to be incorporated, leſt the neighbouring fruitful fields ſhould be thereby damaged; damaged; and that the kings of Portugal have a ſcepter of the Tagan gold, than which no purer is to be found in the world [b].

[x] Strab. l. iii. Plin. l. iv. c. 22. & alib. & Harduin. in loc. Ptol. l. ii. c. 5. Cellar ubi ſup. [y] Mel. l. iii. c. 1. [z] Hirt. c. 48. Cellar. ubi ſup. p. 60. 61. [a] Ptol. ubi ſup. Cellar. ubi ſup. p. 54, 55.

THE ſecond province of Hiſpania Ulterior, or further Spain, was Bœtica, ſo called from the famed river Bœtis, ſince Tarteſſus, and now Guadalquiver, or the great river. We have already mentioned its limits on the weſt or Luſitanic ſide; it was bounded on the ſouth by the Mediterranean, and the Sinus Gaditanus, or gulph of Cadiz; and on the north by the Cantabric ſea, now the ſea of Biſcay. As to its limits towards the north-eaſt, or province of Tarraco, they cannot be ſo well fixed, becauſe they are rightly ſuppoſed to have been in a conſtant fluctuation, as each petty monarch had an opportunity to encroach upon his neighbour. Hence antient authors place thoſe on the ſea-coaſt differently, viz. Ptolemy at Baræa [c]; Pliny ſomewhat higher, at Murgis [d]; though both ſituated on the Sinus Virgitanus, a little below new Carthage. The ſame may be ſaid of the inland ones, which are likewiſe differently placed, either higher or lower from the province of Tarracon, as may be ſeen by the authors above-quoted. The Bœtis above-mentioned divided this province into two parts; on the one ſide of which, towards the Anas, were ſituate the Turdetani (A), from whence the country was called Turdetania, but better known by Bœtica deſcribed.

Its inhabitants.

[b] Pompon. Mel. l. iii. c. 1. Ovid. met. l. ii. Plin. l. iv. c. 22. & l. xxxiii. c. 4. Sil. Ital. l. i. ver. 234. Ptol. & Cellar. ubi ſup. Laur. Andr. Reſend. in antiquit. Luſitan. l. ii.
[c] Univ. hiſt. l. ii. c. 4. [d] Hiſt. l. iii. c. 1. Cellar. l. ii. c. i. ſect. 1. Gerund.

(A) Some add, after Polybius, the Turduli, as different from them. We have already ſpoken of both. They were (1) ſituate on the ſame ſide of the Bœtis, but higher up: but as that author rather diſtinguiſhes them only with regard to their ſituation; and Ptolemy ſeems to intimate, that they were but one people (2); we ſee no reaſon for making two of them, any farther than the diſtinction of higher and lower will go; eſpecially as Strabo makes the two names to be indifferently given to them (3); and theſe are by ſome authors (4) affirmed to have been the antienteſt people in all Spain.

(1) Vid. Gerundenſ. paralip. l. i. (2) Lib. ii. (3) Lib. iii. (4) Vid. Voſſ. chronic. Taraph. de red. Hiſp. Gerund. Gariqai. Antgued. & al.

by the name of Bœturia. On the other ſide were ſituated the Baſtuli, Baſtitani, and Conteſtani, along the Mediterranean coaſts. The reader will find, under the next note, all that can be found concerning thoſe people (B). We forbear mentioning a great number of others, of which we know little more than the names. The reader may ſee them in Cellarius above-mentioned, and, if he cares to depend upon the Spaniſh authors for their ſituation, cities, and other particulars, he may conſult thoſe we have lately quoted both in the text and margin.

Roman colonies.

We come now to ſpeak of the Roman colonies in this province; and of theſe we ſhall, for brevity's ſake, ſingle out only ſome of the moſt celebrated ones; viz. that of the Accitani, ſituate between the Baſtuli and Baſtitani, along the ſame ſhore. We find it mentioned by Pliny [c], and by ſome antient inſcriptions, under the name of COLONIA JULIA GEMELLA ACCITANA [d], whoſe citizens were called Gemellenſes, becauſe that colony was made up of two legions, viz the third and ſixth, as appears by thoſe inſcriptions [e]. It

[c] Hiſt. l. iii. c, 3. [d] Grut. p. 271. n. 6. [e] See Cellarius, lib. ii. c. 1. ſect. 3.

(B) Of the firſt of theſe we have already ſpoken. The Baſtuli, ſuppoſed to be of Phœnician or Libyan extract, extended from the ſtreights of Gibraltar, along the Mediteranean coaſt, till, driven from thence by the Moors, they fled into the mountainous part of Galicia, which they then called by their name Baſtulia. The Baſtetani or Baſtitani were ſeated higher up on the ſome coaſts. The territories of both theſe made what ſince became the kingdom of Granada, in which there is a ridge of very high mountains, called, from the latter, the Baſtetanian mountains. Mention is made alſo of their capital called Baſtitana, a place of ſuch ſtrength, that king Ferdinand was ſix months beſieging it, before he could take it from the Moors (5).

The Conteſtani are by ſome placed in this province of Bœtica, and by others in that of Tarracon. They were moſt likely ſeated between both. They are ſaid by Ptolemy (6) to have been ſettled there by Teſta one of their kings, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel, and called from him Conteſtani, as well as a city called Conſtantinum (7); but that king, though mentioned alſo by Manetho, is generally ranked among the dubious, if not fabulous.

(5) Bulgar. commentar. Serdin. Comec. de geſt. F. Ximeni. (6) Ubi ſup. Vide & Taraph ſub an. 1424. (7) Iid. ibid.

It is ſuppoſed to be the preſent city of Guadiz in Granada, an antient epiſcopal ſee, formerly called the Accitanus, from Acci, the name of that city (C). Thoſe of Gades, Corduba, Aſtigi, and Hiſpal, were famed for their courts of judicature. The other four, whoſe ſituation is leſs known, together with their other municipal and free cities, in a much greater number than any of the other two provinces, the reader may ſee in the author above-mentioned [f]; all which confirm what Pliny ſays of this [g], that it excelled them by far; for ſo it did in richneſs, extent, number of cities and harbours, fertility of its ſoil, commodious ſituation for traffick, and many other particulars: and this may be one great reaſon, why the Romans cultivated and encouraged it more than they did the reſt.

Their cities.

How few of thoſe antient cities this province had before the coming in of the Romans, is not difficult to gueſs, if we only conſult the beſt antient authors with any tolerable attention; though, if we were to truſt to the Spaniſh writers, it muſt have not only abounded with them, but they muſt likewiſe have been vaſtly large, populous, and opulent, even before the coming of the Tyrians, Phœnicians, and other nations, of whom we ſhall give an account in the ſequel. And yet theſe are affirmed by the ſame authors, eſpecially the Tyrians, to have built ſome freſh conſiderable ones, every one in the place where they ſettled themſelves; for all which we have no better grounds, than for that of Uliſipo and its pretended founder, of which we ſpoke under the firſt article of this chapter: but when we come to examine things more cloſely, we find no ſuch traces of this boaſted number of cities. On the contrary it is plain, when the Turdetani had, at the inſtigation of Hannibal, aſſiſted the brave Saguntines their neighbours againſt the Romans, we read but of one city they had, the name of which is not ſo much as recorded (D); and which theſe cauſed to be razed, and [f] Ubi ſup. ſect. 2, & ſeq. [g] Lib. iii. c. 1. De his vid. Gerund. Taraph. Garib. Vaſſeum, & al.

(C) The Spaniards pretend, that Torquatus, a diſciple of James the apoſtle, was by him appointed the firſt biſhop of it (8).

(D) This the Spaniards think to have been called Turvel, ſituate

(8) Vaſſ. chron. c. 20.

and the inhabitants to be sold for slaves [h], as a determent to others from lending their assistance to any, whom they thought proper to war against. Ptolemy mentions but one sea-port town on the coast of the Bastitani, viz. that of Οὐρκὶ Urce, since Vorgi, in the bay of that name, tho' we find some considerable ones on those coasts; such as Menobia, Abdera, Portus Magnus, Beria, and Murgis, and some others. On the islands it has likewse a considerable number, which Pliny, in his natural history, tells us, in his time amounted to an hundred and seventy-two. The greatest part of these being, in all appearance, and from the Roman names given them, either founded or enlarged by that nation, such as those of Asta Nebrisa, Ugia, and Orippa [i], on the banks of the Bœtis, below Hispal, we have not time to dwell upon them, but shall content ourselves with a short mention of those of the greatest note. Among these is the famed city

Hispal. of Hispal, now Seville (E), situated on the river Bœtis abovementioned, and the metropolis of this province. It was formerly a great emporium, by means of that navigable river, which brought vast number of merchandizes up to this city,

Corduba. and thence quite up to Corduba. This city is styled by Pliny Colonia Romulensis, and by some antient inscriptions Colonia Romulea. We took notice above, that it was one of the four courts of judicature. The next city in rank to Hispal is Corduba, now Cordoua, no less famed for its rich mines, and fertile soil, or, as the poet calls it [k], aurifera terra, than the other was for its trade. It is situate on the banks of the same river, was called a patrician colony, and is ate near the spring-head of the river Thurias or Durias, and to which they have given the antient name of Turdeta.

[h] Livy, l. xxi. c. 6. xxiv. c. 42. [i] De his vid. Cellar. ubi sup. [k] Sil. Ital. l. iii. ver. 401.

(E) Some pretend, that it was founded and named by Hispal one of their fabulous kings, and the son of Hercules (9); others, that it was so called from the palus, or marsh, on which it was founded; or rather from the pali, or stakes, upon which the foundation of it was laid (10). That of Seville, or, as it was antiently written, Civilia, is thought to be only a corruption of Civitas Julia, as it is called in some antient inscriptions (11). But, when or by whom it was founded, is not to be guessed at.

(9) Vasf. Garib. & al. sup. citat. (10) Paralip. c. 1. (11) Id. ibid. c. 9.

is ſaid by Strabo to have been the work of Marcellus (F). Tarteſſus was once a famed antient city, pleaſantly ſituate between the two mouths of the Bœtis (G), which made a kind of iſland called, after the name of that city [l], Tarteſſida. This antient city is celebrated by ſome of the Latin poets, as ſituate on the fartheſt verge of the weſtern ſhore [m]; but, for the other particulars of it we muſt refer our reader to the laſt note, as we muſt do, for the remainder of the cities of this province, to the authors ſo often cited already, and eſpecially to the late and accurate Cellarius in the chapter above-quoted; and for Gades or Gadir, now Cadiz, to what we copiouſly ſaid of it in a former volume [n].

We

[l] Strab. ubi ſup. [m] Sil. Ital. ubi ſup. ver. 399, & alib. Ovid metamorph. l. xiv. ver. 416. [n] Vol. xvii. p. 24.

(F) Our author leaves us in the dark which of the Roman generals of that name he meant, ſo that the Spaniſh writers are much divided about it. Vaſæus, often quoted, thinks, that it was he who was contemporary with Cæſar and Pompey; becauſe he finds no mention made of this city before him (12). But Nonius thinks it to be of much older date (13), ſince the ſame Strabo calls it "coloniam primam," or firſt colony which the Romans ſent into this part of Spain. And it is mentioned by Silius Italicus in the ſecond Punic war (14). As for the title of Colonia Patricia given to it, it is not only mentioned by Pliny, but by ſome antient inſcriptions in Gruter, to which we refer (15); and this is further explained by what Strabo adds, that it was from the beginning inhabited by noble men of the Romans, and other nations (16).

(G) Strabo ſays, that the Bœtis formerly emptied itſelf into the ſea at two different places (17) One of them has been ſince ſtopped up. Mela mentions the city of Carteia in the ſame bay (18), which, he ſays, ſome fancy to have been the antient Tarteſſus. Hence authors are divided in their opinions, whether theſe were two diſtinct cities, or the ſame, with different names. We find nothing that can ſatisfy our readers on that head, antient authors often confounding theſe two names and that of Gades together, as the learned Bochart and others have juſtly obſerved.

As for the fabulous account of its having altered its name from Tarteſſus to that of Gades, on account of Hercules's ſetting up his (12) Ibid. c. 20. (13) Ibid. c. 19. (14) Lib. iii. ver. 401. (15) P. 460. (16) Lib. iii. (17) Ibid. (18) De ſit. orb. lib. 2. c. 6.

Bays and sea ports.

We come now to say something of the famous bays and ports of this province; the first of which, next to Gades above-mentioned, is that called Portus Menestæus, mentioned by Ptolemy and Strabo, who doth likewise place here the oracle of that name. The next is that of Besippo, the country of the famed Pomponius Mela, and some others, without the streight's mouth. Calpe, Carteia, Barbesul, Cilniana, Salduba, Suel, and Malaca, within the streight, and on the coasts of the Bastuli Menoba, Selumbina, Abdera, and Portus Magnus, and likewise the famed promontory of Charidemus, all which are mentioned by Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny, Mela, and placed by them on the Bastitanian coasts. Beyond the promontory last-mentioned are the cities of Baria or Barea, and Murgis, in the Virgitanian bay; the former of which is reckoned by Ptolemy, and the latter by Pliny, the last sea-port of the Bastitani, as we hinted a little higher. Those antient authors are, however, neither well agreed, nor easily reconciled, about the situation, names, and some other particulars relating to those cities. Thus, for instance, Calpe, which is by Strabo styled a famed antient Spanish sea-port, Pliny, Ptolemy, Mela, and others, only call a mountain: whence the learned Bochart and Casaubon have thought, that Calpe, in the former, was inserted, by the mistake of the transcriber, for Carteia, especially as no mention is made in the others of any city besides it in that bay. But this has been in a great measure answered, by some learned men, from the inscription on a medal, with these letters, C. I. Calpe; that is, as they read it [o], Colonia Julia Calpe: and this they back with a passage out of N. Damascen [p]; who says, that Octavius overtook Cæsar near the city of Calpia, which is the same with Calpe; so that Strabo's text wants no amendment. Barbesul, Asta, his two columns there (19), it is rightly rejected. We have given a truer account of the foundation of Gades in a former volume, to which we refer, to avoid repetition (20). As for Carteia, a late author endeavoured to prove it to be the present town of Rocadillo distant, about four miles, from Gibraltar (21); but the point is far from being cleared by him, and too dark and prolix for us to dwell longer upon, in a work of this nature.

[o] Spanh. de præst numism. p. 766. Noris cenotaph. Pisan. p. 207. [p] Excerpt. Vales. apud Cellar. l. ii. c. 1. sect. 2. art. 34.

(19) Dionysius Alexandr. Vid auct. Hisp. sup. citat. & Gerund. paralip. l. i. (20) Vol. xvii. p. 24. (21) Conduit. discourse of the situat. of Carteia.

Aſta, and ſome others of the ſea-ports above-named, appear likewiſe to have been conſiderable colonies, as well as a number of inland towns, in particular that of Munda, where Cæſar overcame the ſons of Pompey; but, as we are obliged to ſtudy brevity, we ſhall refer the reſt to the author laſt quoted.

RIVERS of any note there are not in this province, except the Bœtis, often mentioned already, or, as it is ſometimes written, Bœtes and Betis. It hath, according to Pliny [q], its ſpring-head in the Tugienſian foreſt, ſo named from Tugia, a town mentioned in the Itinerarium of Antoninus (H), in the province of Tarracon, at the foot of the Oreſpodan mountains. Others of leſſer note are the Barbeſola near the city or mount Calpe above-mentioned, the Saduca which ſeems to have divided the Baſtuli from the Accitani, and ſome few others not worth dwelling upon. Mountains, of a conſiderable length and height, this province certainly abounds with. We find, however, but few mentioned by antient authors. Ptolemy takes only notice of two, viz. the Mariani and Hipylæ, the latter of which were ſcarcely known to any other antient writers [r]. Theſe, as they run along the territories of Hiſpal or Seville, were, we are told, called Illipæ; and, as they came nearer to Corduba, Themarini and Orthoſdadæ [s]: the former, which are by Pliny called Ariani (I), run along the famed deſert of the ſame name, now known by that of Sierra Modena, in the neighbourhood of the city of Caſtulo. The region of the Baſtitani was likewiſe full of them, as we hinted in a former note; and all that needs be added, with relation to them all, is, that they abounded with metals and minerals of ſeveral kinds, particularly gold, quickſilver, copper, and lead, the greateſt quantities of which appear, however, to have been dug out of thoſe called Mariani, which the Romans improved to no ſmall advantage, having everywhere their procuratores rei metallicæ, or overſeers of the mines.

The river Bœtis, &c.

Mountains.

[q] Lib. iii. c. 1. [r] L. ii. c. 4. [s] Vid. Marin. Sicul. reb. Hiſp. lib i. ſect. de montib.

(H) That author places it in the road between Caſtalo and Malaca, at about thirty-five miles diſtance from the latter.

(I) As theſe mountains are called, by the generality of authors, and by one antient inſcription, by the firſt name; and, by the ſecond, only by Pliny and the Itinerarium; it is ſuppoſed, that the M, in theſe, was, by ſome miſtake of the copyiſts, dropped; but, whether they were the ſame, or different, is not of any great conſequence to enquire, with ſo little help, and under ſo great an uncertainty (22).

(22) De his vid. Cellar. lib. ii. c. 1. in fin. ſect. 2.

mines. That of Calpe, mentioned a little higher, is neither famed for its height, mines, fertility, or on any account but that of its ſituation; and ſo no more need be ſaid of it.

Soil, climate, and produce.

THE goodneſs of the ſoil and air of Spain in general is too well known to need any mention here. This province was particularly remarkable for it, and we ſhall have occaſion in the ſequel to give further proofs of it from the healthineſs and longevity of its inhabitants; and ſo little did they know of phyſic, that, if we may believe Poſidonius, they uſed to lay their ſick relations along the public ſtreets and roads, to have the advice of ſuch paſſengers as could give it to them. He adds, that their very women were ſo robuſt and healthy, that they knew not what it was to keep their bed after they were delivered; but uſed to go to their ordinary work, which was commonly agriculture, after they had taken proper care of themſelves and the child. Their mountains, as well as valleys, afforded them plenty of corn for men, and barley for their horſes and cattle, the former of which they bred from the beginning in great quant ties, and managed with great dexterity both at home and abroad, and eſpecially in their warlike expeditions. The milk of their kine was, it ſeems, ſo very rich and fine, from the fragrant herbs they fed upon on thoſe healthy mountains, that it could not be uſed either for food or drink, or even, as we are told by the above-mentioned author, to make cheeſe with, without ſome mixture of water. As for fruits of all kinds, they grow there in the greateſt perfection; but theſe are topics ſo well known to every reader, that we need not dwell longer upon them. As for mineral waters, they flow in the greateſt quantity, both hot and cold; and the kingdom of Granada is famed for them, and for their medicinal virtues; which need not to be wondered at, conſidering the vaſt ridges of mountains that are in it, and the variety of metals and minerals they abound with. Some of them riſe ſo hot, as to exceed, we are told, even boiling water. The moſt famous of the warm kind are thoſe of Hiſpal, Cordoua, and Granada; to which they attribute the virtue of curing the moſt inveterate, and even the venereal, diſeaſes; which is not altogether improbable, conſidering the quantity of ſulphur, and other minerals, they are impregnated with, and the great perſpiration which the heat of the climate gives to its inhabitants. There are two others of great fame here, viz. that called Bœtio, from a ſmall town near it; it ſprings, in a ſmall rivulet, from the top of a very high rock, and falls, by two ſtreams, into two lakes; and its waters are noted for curing all hæmorrhages, by waſhing. The other is near the town of Antiquaria, which is no leſs famed for diſſolving the ſtone, and bringing it off by urine [t]. We ſhould be drawn into too great a length, were we to enter into ſo copious a ſubject as that of their artificial rarities; their ſtately buildings, ſuch as bridges, churches, eſpecially their palaces, whether thoſe of the Gothic, or of the Roman faſhion: but one thing we cannot forbear obſerving, that there are ſome yet ſtanding almoſt in their priſtine grandeur, eſpecially in the kingdom of Granada, built by the Moors, in a ſtyle peculiar to them, and which has ſcarce any thing common with the other two, and yet ſeems to exceed them in taſte and magnificence. But as this country, as well as the ſeveral authors, who have written upon it, are ſo well known to us, we ſhall enlarge no further upon them.

Natural rarities.

town

TARRACON was the third province in Spain. It was, as we obſerved before, ſtyled by the Romans Hiſpania Citerior, or hither Spain, and diſtinguiſhed, by the name of Tarraconenſis, from the antient city of that name, which was then the capital of it, and the reſidence of the Roman præſes, or governor. We have ſeen, under the two former articles, how hard it is to ſettle the limits of this province, with reſpect to thoſe of Bœtica and Luſitania, on account of their frequent fluctuation. On the three other ſides they are eaſily fixed, it having the Mediterranean on the eaſt, the ocean on the weſt, and the Cantabrian ſea, and the Pyrenees, on the north, by which laſt it is divided from Gaul. Tarracon, being by far the largeſt of the three, had a much greater number of cities, and variety of nations, as well as, in all likewiſe, of petty kingdoms and governments. It was divided into two parts by the famed river Iberus, now Ebro, which ran almoſt acroſs the whole province, having its ſource on the north-weſt ſide of it, between the Cantabrian mountains; and, very near the ſea of that name, and by a ſouth-eaſt courſe, emptying itſelf into the Mediterranean, about thirty miles below the city of Tarraco. Along the ſouth-weſt ſide of that river were ſeated the Celtiberians, the antienteſt, and by far the moſt conſiderable, of all the nations of this province, if the others were not, indeed, ſo many diſtinct tribes deſcended from them, as we are apt to think they moſtly were, from the greateſt part of their names being of Celtic, rather than of any other extract. This canton was called from them Celtiberia, and reached from the mouth of the Iberus quite to the country of Tarracon deſcribed.

Celtiberia.

[t] Marin. Sicul. de reb. Hiſp. lib. i. cap. de fontibus.

Other nations and cantons.

the Cantabri, on the oppoſite coaſts. Along the courſe of it, on that ſide, were, among other people of leſs note, the Illærcaones, ſeated juſt within the mouth of it. Higher up are placed the Hedetani, or Sedetani, Pelendones, Berones, and, laſt of all, the Cantabri. Nearer to Bœtica, and on the borders of it, were, towards the Mediterranean, firſt, the Conteſtani, mentioned alſo under the laſt article; and, as you went forwards, acroſs the country, towards the oppoſite ſhore, you found another tribe of the Turdetani, the Lobetani, Luſones, Carpetani, Arevacæ, and Vaccæi; and theſe two laſt were ſevered from each other by the river Duero, which was the confine of Luſitania on that ſide; and, weſt of the Cantabri and Vaccæi, were, on the Cantabrian coaſt, the Tranſmontani and Artabri; and in this laſt was the Artabrum Celticum, called alſo Promontorium Nericum, now cape Finiſter. In the inland are placed the Aſtures, Auguſtani, Lucences, and Gravii. On the weſtern coaſt, between the cape above-mentioned and the Durius, were the Callaici, alias Callæci, whoſe country was called Callæcia, one tribe or canton of which were called Bracarii, and the country Bracara, and theſe were ſeated on the banks of the Durius; the others were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Lucenſes; and both were ſubdivided by Ptolemy into ſeveral tribes, ſuch as we ſhall ſpeak of, upon another occaſion, under the following note (A). All theſe are mentioned by antient geographers, ſuch as Ptolemy, Strabo, Mela, as ſeated, the former on the other ſide of the Iberus, and the latter on the hither ſide of the Tagus. On the other ſide of the Iberus, along the Mediterranean coaſts, were ſeated ths Latetani and Auſetani, who were parted by the river Rubicatus, or, as Mela calls it, Lubricatus, now Lobragat, near the city of Barcelona. Along the Iberus were the Ilergetes, Jacetani, Sueſſitani, Vaſcones, Varduli, Autrigones, and Concani; and theſe were ſited between the head of the Iberus and the Cantabrian ſea. Nearer to

(A) This canton, which was ſince called Gallicia, and antiently Celtica, was, in all likelihood, either inhabited originally by the Celtes, or was a colony of them ſent from Gaul; for many ſuch they were forced to ſend out of that kingdom into this and other countries, for want of room in their own, as we ſhall ſee, when we come to their hiſtory: the latter ſeems, however, the moſt probable, from the names by which they were diſtinguiſhed, ſuch as Cœlerini, Grovii, Limici, Querquerni, and ſome others, which to us appear to be of Gauliſh extract, and bear a viſible analogy with ſome of thoſe which we find in antient Gaul.

to the Pyrenean mountains, along that vaſt ridge, were the Ceretani, Indigetes, Cemſi, Lacetani, and ſome others of leſs note. Every one of them had its diſtinct metropolis, from which they either took their name, or, which is perhaps more likely, to which they gave that of their own tribe, as may be ſeen by thoſe we ſhall mention (B). We have already obſerved in general on this head, that thoſe diſtricts which end in tania, and the cities which end in briga, are of Celtic extract; and we ſhall add here, that this province abounds with ſuch, more than the other two, as may be ſeen by the liſt of the people we have given below; for where their name terminated in tani the country of courſe ended in tania, as Auſetani and Auſetania.

Celtiberians, their warlike fierceneſs.

IT is not our deſign to ſpeak particularly of every one of them, and much leſs of their cities, many of which we know little elſe of, than their names (C). We may ſay of them in

(B) Thus the Bracarii had Bracara, the Artabri Artabrum, the Aſtures Aſturia, the Sueſſitani Sueſſa, the Lacitani Lacca, the Ilergetes Ilerda, and ſo of the reſt, unleſs where the Romans, ſettling afterwards their colonies, did call thoſe towns by new names, though the people ſtill retained their old ones; eſpecially we find ſome few of thoſe places ſtyled Julia and Auguſta, as Julia Libyca in the canton of the Ceretani; Cæſar Auguſta among the Lacetani; Auguſta Bracara, Porta Auguſta, Auguſti Lacus, in Gallicia, and the like.

Here, by the way, we muſt obſerve, that this laſt province was not called ſo from the Galli, as ſome have imagined, but from its antient metropolis, which was called Calle, ſituate in a pleaſant valley upon the Durius, and near the mouth of it; and the port of it, being become a conſiderable one in time, was ſince named barely Porto and Puerto by the Spaniards, by the Dutch Port a Port, and by us Oporto. From theſe two, Porto and Calle, came the name of Portugal, or Portucalle. As for Calle, it muſt be owned, that it is not mentioned by Strabo, Ptolomy, &c. but we find it in the itinerarium, which places it on the road between Uliſipo or Lisbon and Auguſta Bracara (1).

(C) Thoſe, who are deſirous to know more of theſe antient people, may conſult, if they pleaſe, the Spaniſh writers we have often quoted in this chapter; though, for the moſt authentic account of them, we would rather refer them to the laſt-quoted and accurate Cellarius, who has wholly grounded his own on the teſtimony of antient authors, and rejected all the fabulous and uncertain traſh, which thoſe modern authors have intermingled in theirs upon more precarious, and ſometimes upon no authority at all.

(1) Vid. Cellar. ubi ſup. lib. ii. c. 1. ſect. 3.

in general, that they retained more of the antient Celtic valour, cuſtoms, language, and, we may add, fierceneſs, than thoſe of Bœtica, or even of Luſitania, though the Celtiberians of this laſt province are ſaid to have been the braveſt people in all Spain, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew in the ſequel. And the reaſon, probably, of it is, that they were neither ſo much under the dominion of the Romans, nor ſo converſant with them, as thoſe in Bœtica; for the deſcendents of the Celtes were every-where as famed for their tenaciouſneſs of their antient religion, laws, cuſtoms, language, &c. as the Romans were to propagate their own, where-ever they conquered: and this was one conſtant cauſe, why the former choſe rather to yield their territories to the latter, when they could defend them no longer againſt them, and to retire into more mountainous lands, where they could freely live by themſelves, than to ſubmit to their laws, and conform to their manners, as we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew in the ſequel.

Roman colonies.

We find, however, the following colonies of note (for we ſhall omit the others for brevity's ſake) to have been in time planted amongſt theſe Celtic ſettlements; viz. in Aſturia, the famed Colonia Auguſta. It is mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy; and in ſome antient medals, though differently placed[u], and was a court of judicature, according to Pliny in the place laſt-quoted. It divided the Aſtures into Auguſtanos and Tranſmontanos, which confirms what we lately hinted, the former being, in all likelihood, of Roman extract, ſettled here, whilſt the latter, of Celtic, removed over the ridge of mountains that parted them; for we find Auguſta Gemina.

here alſo the ſeventh Roman legion, which was ſurnamed Gemina, ſettled between the Aſturian ſea and the capital of this diſtrict, called Aſturia Auguſta, now Aſtorga, a city ſtill of ſome note (D). This country was alſo celebrated by the poets [u] Ap. Gruter. p. 193 n. 3. p. 426. n. 5. Vid. & Goltz. Holſtein. & Harduin. ap. Cellar. lib. ii. c. 1. ſect. 3. § 44. Vid. & Strab. lib. iii. Plin. l. iv. c. 22.

(D) Ptolemy indeed makes the Aſtures to have been of Libyan extract. and to have come over with the Carthaginians, and ſettled in this part of Gallæcia. The city was called Aſtorga, from its being ſituate on the banks of a river of that name, which flows into the Durius; and the Romans, having ſeized on it, and the poets for the gold it produced. The next was that infamous one of Calaguris, diſtinguiſhed by Pliny by the name of Naſcica, juſtly execrated, by the Roman authors [w], for the inſurrection and dread cataſtrophe of Sertorius, mentioned in a former volume, and too black to be repeated afreſh [x]. The city was at firſt a municipal one, and in ſome inſcriptions ſurnamed Julia (E), and then made a colony, with ſome others mentioned by Pliny [y], particularly thoſe of Oſca, Ilerda, and Turiaſa. Calaguris, ſince Calahorta, was the head town of the Autrigones, ſeated indifferently by geographers on either ſide, but, by the moſt exact, on the other ſide the Iberus, as we hinted in the laſt note. Grachuris, or Graccuris, mentioned by Ptolemy among the chief cities of the Vaſcones, was, as we are told by Livy [z], built by Tit. Sempron. Gracchus, who took it from the Celtiberians, and called it by his name. Its ſituation is uncertain, only the Itinerarium places it on the road to Cæſar Auguſta, at ſixty-four miles diſtance from it in the road to Tarraco. It is in ſome antient inſcriptions ſtyled Municipium Graccuris. Some chriſtian champions, who ſuffered here for the faith in thoſe early times, are in ſome martyrologies called the Grachurian, and in others the Ilerdan martyrs, from the vicinity, probably, of thoſe two places. The laſt we ſhall name is the famed town of the Vaccæi, called Intercata, celebrated, by antient authors, for a ſingle combat, which was fought, at the ſiege of that city, Calaguris.

Graccuris.

Intercata.

[w] Vid. Valer. Max. l. vii. c. 6. L. Flor. l. iii. c. 22. Juven. ſat. xv. ver. 93. [x] See before vol. xii. p. 616. [y] Lib. iii. c. 3. [z] Epit. xlii.

the adjacent territories, called it Auguſta Aſturica (2). Some derive the names, both of the river and of the city, from Aſtir Memnon's coachman, who came thither with other Trojans, and planted a colony here (3); but this we look upon as fabulous.

As for the ſeventh legion above-mentioned, we find it called in Ptolemy legio ſeptima Germanica; but as there is no mention of any ſuch, either in other authors, or in any antient inſcriptions, but often of legio ſeptima gemina (4), it is rightly ſuppoſed, that it is in that author a mere error of the copyiſt, who miſtook it for Germanica.

(E) It is inſcribed, in ſome Auguſtan coins, Mvn. Calag. Ivl. that is, Municipium Calaguris, Julia; and, in one of Tiberius, city, between Scipio Æmilianus and a bold Spaniſh tribune, in which the latter was killed; and the former had no ſooner eſcaped one danger, than he expoſed himſelf to a greater, and was the firſt that ſcaled the walls of that place [a]. We come now to ſpeak of ſome of the moſt celebrated cities of this province, at the head of which we may juſtly place the metropolis of it,

(2) Geogr l. ii. Vid. & Gerund. paralip. lib. iii. (3) Taraph. de reg Hiſp. ex Lucan. & Sil. Ital. (4) Neila ap. Vaſei chronic. ſub an. Chr. 106.

Tarraco. TARRACO, now Tarragon, ſituate on the Mediterranean coaſt, between the rivers Iberus, or Ebro, and the Rubricatus, now Lobregat. It was a colony planted there by the two Scipio's, Publ. and Cornel. with a juridical court; and was the capital of Hiſpania Romana (F), not ſo much on account of the excellency of its harbour, as Strabo obſerves, as for its being commodiouſly ſituated for all thoſe, who travelled into this kingdom, whether by ſea or land [b]. But Spaniſh authors, though they grant thoſe two Roman generals to have planted berius, M. C. I. C. CELERE, C. RECTO IIVIR. that is, Municipium Calaguris Julia, Caio Celere, Caio Recto, Duumviris.

[a] Liv. epitom. xlviii. Aurel. Vict. in Scip. Æmil. Appian, in Iberic. &c. [b] Lib. iii. Plin. nat. hiſt. lib. iii.

As there were two cities of that name, viz. this of Naſcica, and another ſurnamed Fibularenſis, ſome authors have placed them indifferently on either ſide of the Iberus; but Peter de Marca and Cellarius, whom we chuſe to follow, place the former on the other ſide of that river. As for the latter, which was at ſome diſtance from it, and inferior to it in point of privilege and opulence (5), it was only remarkable for a manufacture of what the Romans called fibulæ, a kind of buckles or buttons to faſten their garments with; and was diſtinguiſhed by that name, on that account.

(F) It is placed by antient geographers in the region or kingdom of the Coſſetani, or Coſſitani, ſituate between the two rivers above-mentioned. It appears from antient medals to have been a very flouriſhing city, eſpecially in Auguſtus's time; and is called by one Colonia victrix, by another Colonia victrix togata Tarraco; and in a third are found theſe words, GENIO COL. I. V. TARRAC. that is, Genio Coloniæ Victricis Togatæ Tarraconenſis. There are ſtill, it ſeems, quantities of ſuch antient coins frequently dug up about the neighbourhood of it; which inclines one to think, it was formerly much larger than it is now, tho' it is at preſent very ſpacious, opulent, and conſiderable (6).

Thoſe,

(5) Vid. Cæſ. comment. lib. i. c. 40. Cellar. lib. ii. c. 1. ſect. 3. (6) Vid. Cellar. lib. ii. c. 1. ſect. 3. § 104. Marin. Sic. de reb. Hiſp. l. iii.

planted a colony there, will by no means allow, that they founded the city, but fetch its origin and etymon much higher: we have given two of them in the laſt note. However that be, this city has been all along very famous, having been, ſince, the metropolis of the kingdom of Arragon, an archiepiſcopal ſee, and famed for a council or two held there; the firſt by John the then metropolitan, and his twelve biſhops, in the year of Chriſt 516, in which it was, amongſt other things, enacted, that the celebration of the Sunday ſhould begin on Saturday evening. Hence that cuſtom hath, it ſeems, ſpread itſelf almoſt all over Spain, to leave off all kind of work from that time [c]. In another held under Berengarius, primate of the ſame place, 1180, it was ordained, that the dates of all public writings ſhould be computed from the year of Chriſt, which before were wont to be reckoned from the reigns of the Frankiſh monarchs [d]. Below Tarraco was the famed city of Saguntus, or Saguntum, on the ſame coaſt, of which having ſpoken amply in the laſt volume, and of its dreadful cataſtrophe, we ſhall refer our reader to it [e]. Va- Saguntus. Valentia.
lentia, another antient city a little below Saguntum, was the capital of the Edetani. It is ſituate on the mouth of the river Thurias, about three miles from the ſea, and was antiently ſtyled Colonia Julia, and founded by Junius Brutus, whilſt he was conſul in Spain [f], and given to his army (G). It was afterwards

[c] Vaſ. chronic. ſub an. 516. [d] Taraph. ubi ſup. ſub an. 1176. [e] See Vol. xvii. p. 327, 328, &c. [f] Liv. epit. lv. Plin. lib. iii. c. 3.

Thoſe, who make Tubal to have been the peopler of Spain, pretend, that he founded this city, to be a kind of ſafeguard for his flocks and ſhepherds, of which he had vaſt numbers; and that both he and this place had the name of Tarraco given them, that is, "the gatherer up of ſhepherds (7). Others will have it to have been built by Hercules, and to have been called Acon; whence the compound word Terra-acon was inſenſibly contracted into Tarracon (8).

(G) The followers of Beroſus affirm this city to have been built by Romus the ſon of Teſta, one of their antient, if not fabulous kings; and to have been called by his own name Roma; and that the Romans, having ſince taken and enlarged it, gave it the name of Valentia inſtead of it (9).

(7) Taraph. ex Beroſ. & al. Lib. de reg. Hiſp. ſub initio. (8) Vid. Gerund. paralip. lib. v. (9) Vid. Vaſ. chron. ſub an. 967. Taraph. reg. Hiſp. ſub an. 1350.

afterwards deſtroyed, with Herennius and his accomplices, by Pompey, and rebuilt by Julius Cæſar. It hath retained its antient dignity and grandeur, was once the metropolis of the kingdom, as it is ſtill of the province of that name, an archiepiſcopal ſee, and one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Spain. The people of this city were formerly as much celebrated for their valour and honeſty, by Tully, as they are now, by their own authors, for their ſuperſtition and bigotry [g]. Before we leave this part of Spain, we muſt not omit the famous city of Complutum, now Alcala de Henarez, ſo called from the river Henarez, on whoſe banks it is ſituate, in a pleaſant plain; and, as that river falls into the great Tagus, the cities here along are eaſily furniſhed with all kinds of proviſions and merchandizes. Complutum has now no biſhoprick, but only a collegiate church, and is a conſiderable univerſity, having been greatly endowed by the celebrated cardinal Ximenes, then archbiſhop of Toledo; under whoſe auſpices, care, and immenſe charges, the firſt polyglot bible was compiled and printed in this city, and is from thence called the Complutenſian polyglot (H). Weſtward of, and between, Complutum, and the antient city of Toletum, now Toledo, and on the ſame river Tagus, was ſituate the Mantua

Complutum.

of

[g] De his vid. Marin. Sicul. de reb. Hiſp. in fin. l. iii.

(H) This glorious work, the firſt of that kind, was performed by men of the greateſt learning, invited thither by that cardinal at a vaſt charge. It was a conſiderable time in compiling, and about four years in printing, that is, from 1514, to 1517, but the whole was not publiſhed till 1520, when it came recommended with a bull of pope Leo X. in ſix volumes, including the lexicon. It was printed in four languages, viz. the Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, and Latin. The Hebrew was as correct as it could poſſibly be done, according to the original; but the Septuagint, Chaldee, and Vulgate Latin, were corrected in ſuch a vaſt number of places, and from ſuch a prodigious number of manuſcripts, as were procured from all parts at no ſmall expence, in order to render thoſe three verſions more conformable to the original, that it, by degrees, dwindled into diſlike; but hath, however, this merit with the learned, that it ſerved for a model to thoſe which were ſince publiſhed in other kingdoms; among which that of London is juſtly eſteemed, in all reſpects, the moſt uſeful and exact, though not enriched with ſuch a variety of coſtly ornaments as that of Mr. Le Jay, printed at Paris (10).

(10) Vid. int. al Mattair. annal. typogr. Palmer. hiſt. of printing. Calmet, diſcourſe of polyglots, & al. mult.

of Ptolemy, near which ſpot is ſuppoſed the town of Madrid, the now metropolis of all Spain, to have been ſince built (I); but of this, and many others, both on the ſea-coaſts, and in the continent, we ſhall forbear ſaying any thing further, they being ſo well known to almoſt every reader. We have already had occaſion to mention ſome of the moſt conſiderable rivers, mountains, and promontories, in the courſe of this article; the reſt, that are of any note, together with ſuch natural rarities that may be worth obſerving, the reader will find in the following note (K), and in the map annexed.

THE

(I) Hence we find it called by ſome Mantua Carpetana, by others Madritum and Madritt; but commonly now Madrid (11).

(K) Beſides the cities above-mentioned, we ſhould take notice of a very famed one, namely, new Carthage; but as we have had occaſion to ſpeak of it in a former volume, we ſhall refer our readers to it (12) Segobriga, alias Segobrica, was, as we are told, the capital of the Celtiberi (13), concerning whoſe ſituation authors, even Spaniſh, differ ſo much, that we can hardly ſay any thing about it. Some think there were two of that name, one in this province of Tarracon, and the other at the foot of the Caſtellan mountains; but the former, which is the moſt conſiderable, the authors above-quoted place in the neighbourhood of antient Numantia mentioned, not only by them, but by the Itinerary, which places it between Uxama and Turiaſo, near the river Durius. This laſt was, it ſeems, ſo excellently fortified by nature, that it neither had nor needed either walls, towers, or other fortifications, being ſeated on the top of a ſteep mountain, and ſheltered by much higher hills on three of its ſides, being only acceſſible on the fourth, which opened to a plain, but by ſuch narrow defiles, as could be eaſily guarded by an handful of men. Great wonders are told of this place by the authors under-quoted (14); for it would ſwell this note too much, were we to deſcend to particulars. It was, however, quite deſtroyed by the two Scipio's; but, ſince we find it mentioned by thoſe antient authors, and by the Itinerary, we need not doubt but it was rebuilt by ſome of their ſucceſſors. We have already given a full account of the Numantine war, and the ſad cataſtrophe of that famed city; and ſhall refer our readers to it (15), to avoid repetitions; and for the ſame reaſon we ſhall forbear mentioning any

(11) Vid. Sicul. Marin. de reb. Hiſp. l. ii. (12) See vol. xvii p. 446, &c. (13) Plin. lib. iii. c. 3. Strab. lib. iii. Ptol. lib. ii. c. 6. (14) Iid. ibid. Flor. bell. Numant. Oroſ. l. v. c. 7. Vid. & Mariana. lib. iii. & auct. Hiſpan. ſubcitat. & Cellar. ubi ſu. ſect. 711. (15) Vid. vol. xii. p. 370, 374.

Islands. Gades.

THE chief islands belonging to the Tarraconian province, are, first, that of Gades, situate on the gulph of that name, between the streights of Gibraltar and the river Bœtis, and famed, not so much for its bigness, as for the concourse of foreign nations thither from the earliest times, and for its celebrated city and temple, of which, as well as of its foundation, name, and other particulars, we have already spoken in this chapter, and in a former volume [h]. Strabo gives it the length of one hundred furlongs, and a much smaller breadth; yet it had, according to him, no less than five hundred horsemen in his time [i]: we shall have occasion to speak of the famed temple of it in the sequel. As for the city, we have, in a former volume, mentioned its being plundered by the Carthaginians, and taken by the Romans [k]. It was since erected into a bishoprick, under the title of Episcopatus Gaditanus [l]. The next is the so much celebrated, and so hard to find, island of Erythia, where Geryon is said to have kept his fine oxen, which Hercules came and stole from him [m]. Some have placed it near that of Gades: others think any more of those antient cities, whose names, and further particulars have been sufficiently taken notice of in the course of the Roman and Carthaginian history; for those of later date belong not to this, but to the modern part of the work.

Erythia.

[h] Vol. xvii. p. 24. [i] Lib. iii. [k] See vol. xvii. p. 472, & seq.
[l] Vas. chronic. c. 21. [m] Hesiod. theogon. ver. 289, & seq.

Mountains of note, besides those already mentioned, are the Pyrenees, which divide Spain from Gaul by a continued ridge of vast height and depth, and reaches from sea to sea. They are supposed to have been so called, from a fire which spread itself over the surface of them, and burnt with such fierceness during several days, that it even melted the metals within their bowels, as we shall see in the sequel. The Idubedan hills were another ridge, which crossed one part of this province, and at the foot of which were the heads of several famed rivers, such as the Tagus and Anas, which flowed westward toward the ocean, on one side; and of the Suero and Thurias, which ran eastward into the Mediterranean on the other. The Orospedan ridge seems to have separated this province in part from Bœtica. They were also called Mariani Montes, and now Sierra Modena. We spoke of them under the last article. A great many more this province abounded with, for a further account of which, we must refer our readers to the antient and modern authors, lately quoted, as likewise for those mines, minerals, mineral waters, and other curiosities, they and the neighhouring valleys produced, the bare mention of which would carry us far beyond our design.

think it was the ſame with it: and others have thought, that it was either ſunk into the ſea, or was to be ſought for among the rocks. We have, however, ventured, in a former chapter of this volume, to offer a conjecture concerning its ſituation; and ſhall refer our readers to it [n]. No leſs difficult has been the ſearch after thoſe ten famed iſlands, called by the Greeks Caſſiterides, from whence the Phœnicians, the firſt diſcoverers of them, did fetch ſuch vaſt quantities of tin. We ſhould not have mentioned them here, the learned Camden having fully ſhewn, that they are our iſlands of Scilly, had not ſome of the antients, as Strabo and Ptolemy [o], placed them on the Spaniſh coaſts, ſomewhat beyond the Promontorium Celticum or Artabrum, or Cape Finiſter; and others ſomewhere on the weſtern ocean, about the upper coaſts of Luſitania [p]. But as there could never be found any ſuch iſlands on thoſe coaſts, they have been ſuppoſed to have undergone the ſame fate with that of Erythia lately mentioned. However, as we ſhall have occaſion to reſume them, when we come to ſpeak of the Britiſh iſlands [q], we ſhall ſay no more of them here, but paſs to thoſe which are more conſiderable, and better known to us; and theſe are the Baleares, or Gymneſiæ, as they are called by the antients. Caſſiterides.

THESE were diſtinguiſhed into Major and Minor, or, as Mela expreſſes it, Majores and Minores. Their bigneſs, ſituation, and other particulars, are ſo well known to every reader, that it were ſuperfluous to dwell upon them. All that we need to ſay of them here, is, in what ſtate they were in thoſe antient times. In the former, now Majorca, Ptolemy and Strabo place the two cities of Palma and Pollentia, the one on the eaſt, the other on the weſt; and theſe are by Strabo, Pliny, and Mela, ſtyled Coloniæ. In the latter, now Minorca, they place likewiſe two cities, viz. Jamno and Mago; which were, however, no more than caſtles or forts, if Mela's judgment, who was of that country, is to be preferred to the others. But as they ſeem to have been both built near the mouths of two convenient harbours, which are in this iſland, it is hardly to be doubted but theſe ſoon grew into conſiderable ſea-ports, eſpecially that of Mago, which became ſince a celebrated one, under the name of Maon. Theſe two iſlands were, on account of their ſituation and harbours, ſtyled Fortunatæ, and ſtand at about thirty miles diſ- Baleares.

tance

[n] Before, p. 13, 14. (E). [o] Strab. l. iv. Ptol. l. iii. [p] Diod. Sicul. l. v. c. 38. Plin. lib. iv. c. 22, & alib. Mela, & al.
[q] See the 3d. page of chap. xiii. ſect. 1.

tance from each other. They were at firſt poſſeſſed by the Phœnicians, who held them till Q. Metellus brought them under the Roman yoke, for which he got the ſurname of Balearicus [r]. As to the etymon of Baleares, moſt authors derive it from the Greek βάλλειν, which ſignifies to throw with a ſling, becauſe the inhabitants of them were particularly famed for their ſkill in it [s]: yet, as the Carthaginians had theſe iſlands before any other, Bochart thinks they did give them that name, which is compounded of two Punic words, Baal and Jarah, which amount to the ſame ſenſe, and ſignify a ſlinging-maſter, or a man expert at throwing, &c. Their other name of Gymneſiæ, or Gymnaſia, is, according to the antient authors above-quoted, of Greek extract, and was given them on account of their inhabitants going naked in ſummer.

FURTHER, towards the ſtreights, over-againſt the cape Dianium, now Denia, are the two iſlands called Pityuſæ by the antients, from the vaſt quantities of pine-trees which they produced [t]; the one of which, by far the larger of the two, tho' ſmaller than that of Minorca, was named Ebuſus, now Ivica; the other, Ophiuſa, now Formentera. They are both mentioned by Strabo, Ptolemy, and Pliny; and Mela adds, that the former was not only very fertile, but that it bred no kind of poiſonous, nor even wild creatures, and that, if any were brought thither, they could not live in it [u], though the iſland abounded with paſture-ground [w], and with great variety of fruits, particularly a kind of figs, for which it was famed: ſome have even added ſugar-canes [x], which, it is ſaid, they boiled into ſugar, and made a traffic of; but this Cellarius has ſhewn to be a miſtake, and that it means no other, than the dried figs above-mentioned [y]. The other, by far the ſmalleſt, is thought by ſome to have been the ſame with that which the Latins called Colubraria; but the author laſt-quoted hath plainy proved, from the teſtimonies of Pliny and Mela, that they were two different iſlands; and the latter was at a much greater diſtance from that of Ebuſus, than the former; and both of them are ſo ſmall and inconſiderable, that we need ſay no more of them. As for Ebuſus, it was the name both of the iſland, and of the city in it, though the latter was more commonly commonly called Ebuſium; for we find, in antient inſcriptions of Gruter, Ordo Ebuſii, and Rp. or Reſpublica Ebuſii; and are further told, that it was a colony of the Phœnicians [z]. The laſt iſland worth mentioning was called Capraria, and now Cabrera, probably from the number of goats it bred, as the Colubraria ſeems to have been from its great quantity of adders. It ſtands on the ſouth of Majorca, and is chiefly noted for being fatal to mariners. All theſe iſlands, and a great number of others mentioned by antient writers, now not to be found, and ſuppoſed to have been ſince ſunk into the ſea, did belong to this province of Tarracon, and underwent the ſame fate of paſſing from the Carthaginian to the Roman yoke. We ſhall conclude this ſection with obſerving from Pliny [a], that this province was divided into ſeven conventus, or provincial aſſemblies, whoſe names the reader will find in the margin (L). It had ſeventy-nine towns, twelve colonies, twelve Roman, and eighteen Latin cities, and an hundred and thirty-five ſtipendiaria or garriſons in the Roman pay, and one confederate.

[r] De his vid. Strab. & Ptolem. ubi ſup. D. Sicul. lib. v. c. 18. Mela, lib ii. ad fin. Flor. l iii. c. 8. [s] Vid. D. Sicul. ubi ſup. Strab. l. xiv. Plin. l. iii. c. v. Euſtat. ad Dionyſ. ver. 457. [t] Plin. l. iii. c. 5. [u] De ſit. in fin. lib. ii. [w] Feſt. Avien. deſcript. orb. vet. 621. [x] Nonn. c. 94. in Stat. ſylv. lib. i. [y] Lib. ii. c. 1. ſect. 4. § 132.

[z] Sil. Ital. l. iii. ver. 362. [a] Plin. l. iii. c. 3. & al. ſup. citat.

(L) theſe were the Carthaginienſis, Tarraconenſis, Cæſar-Auguſtanus, Clunienſis, Aſturus, Lucenſis and Braccarus.

SECT. II.

The religion, laws, government, cuſtoms, learning, &c. of the antient Spaniards.

The religion of the antient Spaniards.

THERE is no doubt to be made, that, where-ever Spain was inhabited by the deſcendents of the Celtes, thither they brought their old religion, government, &c. What theſe were, we have given an account of in a former volume [a]; and ſhall ſpeak ſtill more largely upon, in the next chapter of the antient Gauls, the undoubted and immediate deſcendents of the antient Celtic ſtock; for we muſt neceſſarily ſuppoſe, and ſo, indeed, we find, a great affinity betwen them in all theſe particulars, as they all ſprang from the ſame origin. But, as the Gauls are better known to us than the

[a] Vol. v. p. 404, & ſeq.

the Spaniards, we ſhall refer the greateſt part of what we have to ſay on theſe different heads, till we come to their hiſtory: for, could we even admit what the generality of Spaniſh writers affirm after Beroſus, that Tubal, the fifth ſon of Japhet, came and peopled Spain ſo ſoon as an hundred and forty-three years after the flood, Gomer, his eldeſt brother, and the father of the Celtes muſt have been as ſoon in poſſeſſion of Gaul; and both muſt, of courſe, be ſuppoſed to have brought the ſame religion, laws, government, &c. namely, that which they received from their grandfather Noah: and how tenacious both theſe, and other nations of the ſame Celtic deſcent, were of their own religion and laws, will be eaſily ſeen by the ſequel, eſpecially in the hiſtories of the antient Gauls and Germans. All that we ſhall ſay further of their religion here, is, that it was, in all theſe countries, the ſame as that of the old patriarchs: they worſhipped one ſupreme Being, not in temples, as the Greeks and Romans, but in groves conſecrated to him. They believed a future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments, ſuitable to their behaviour in this. They offered victims to him, and celebrated ſome feſtivals in honour of him; and, in moſt things, obſerved a great ſimplicity in all their religious rites, during a long ſeries of ages, till, by intermingling with other nations, they degenerated into ſeveral of their ſuperſtitions, eſpecially into their various ways of divination, of which we ſhall give a fuller account in the next chapter. One bloody and inhuman cuſtom they gave, indeed, into very early, in common with moſt antient nations, viz. that of human ſacrifices; the origin of which having endeavoured to account for in a former volume, we ſhall refer our readers to it, to avoid prolixity [b].

But, as this country came to be invaded by ſuch variety of other nations, ſuch as the Egyptians, who are ſaid to have introduced all the heatheniſh ſuperſtition of their country, the Tyrians, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, and a multitude of others, who ſettled amongſt them, as we ſhall ſee in a ſubſequent ſection, it is natural to think, that every one brought their own religion and cuſtoms with them; and what theſe were muſt be ſeen in the hiſtory we have given of each of thoſe nations in the courſe of this work; for it were endleſs to repeat it here. It is plain, ſuch a mixture of different nations muſt bring, not only a vaſt variety of religious ous laws and cuſtoms, but produce ſome alterations in each of them, as they mutually borrowed ſuch doctrines and notions, rites and faſhions, from one another, as ſuited their taſte or circumſtances. Superſtition has no bounds, and perſons, either out of wantonneſs, or impatience, will be eaſily induced to hunt after a variety of deities, and ſuperſtitious ceremonies. This, we find, was the caſe of the Iſraelites, though reſtrained from it under ſuch ſevere penalties: how much more will it be ſo, where every one is left at his own liberty? However, after the coming of the lordly Romans, whoſe conſtant policy it was, to introduce every-where their gods, religion, laws, &c. either by fair or foul means, we need not doubt, but thoſe, that fell under their dominion, were obliged to ſubmit to this change. The inundation likewiſe of the northern nations, ſuch as the Suevi, Goths, and Vandals, muſt likewiſe have introduced ſuch changes, as may be better imagined than expreſſed. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of them in their ſeveral hiſtories here enſuing; only thus much may be ſaid here, that, though they had embraced chriſtianity, yet they were all of them infected with the Arian hereſy. This did not, however, ſlacken their zeal againſt the heatheniſh idolatry and ſuperſtition, which had been introduced there by the Egyptians, Carthaginians, Romans, and other nations, whoſe temples, altars, ſtatues, &c. they deſtroyed where-ever they came, obliging all, that came under their power, to embrace their religion; but both Sueves and Goths did at length exchange their Arianiſm for the orthodox faith, the former, under the reign of their king Ariamirus alias Theodimirus, and the latter under Reccaredus, who made open profeſſion of it upon his acceſſion to the crown. Their example was followed by the nobles, biſhops, and clergy; and their confeſſion of faith was preſented to the famed council of Toledo, where ſome further regulations were made, for the preſervation of orthodoxy, and for introducing a general conformity of worſhip. This great change was ſo much the more remarkable, conſidering the tenaciouſneſs of thoſe nations for their old religion, as it was brought about without perſecution, or any other violent means. Upon the whole, it muſt be owned, that the Goths did make many excellent laws and regulations, for the better government in church and ſtate. We ſhall ſpeak of them, in their hiſtory, in a ſubſequent chapter; and ſhall only mention here a famed liturgy peculiar to them, known by ſeveral names, ſuch as, officium Gothicum, Toletanum, and Mozarabicum (A), and ſuppoſed by moſt authors to have been compiled by Iſidore, then biſhop of Hiſpal or Sevil. This liturgy was confirmed by the Toletan council above-mentioned, tho' the pope did not ſuffer them to enjoy it many years, before he obliged them to exchange it for the Roman, not without a long and ſtrenuous oppoſition from the Goths, eſpecially thoſe of Catalonia, who ſent a number of deputies to the council of Mantua, to expoſtulate againſt ſuch a forced innovation. Some extraordinary particulars we are told with relation to this ſucceſsleſs deputation, which, as they diſplay the unfair intrigues, and arbitrary ſway, of the Romiſh court, as well as the ſuperſtitious practices of thoſe times, we ſhall give to our readers in the margin (B).

[b] Vol. i. p. 382, (W). 566, Vol. ii. p. 508, Vol. iii. p. 223, in fin. (V).

It

(A) So called from the name of Mozarabes, which they then gave to thoſe chriſtians, who were under the ſubjection of the Saracens.

(B) The merit of theſe two liturgies, we are told, was to be decided by ſingle combat; in which one champion was to fight for the Gothic and the other for the Roman. They did ſo, and the latter loſt the battle; but, the Roman party raiſing ſome freſh chicane about it, it was again agreed to be tried by fire. Accordingly both books were flung into the flames, from which the Gothic was preſerved, and the other burnt. But ſuch was the prevalence of the pope's party, as it was managed by his then legate, that the ſynod of Leon decided afreſh in favour of the latter. The Gothic, however, was far from being wholly ſet aſide. It was retained by ſeveral congregations, and by ſeven churches of Toledo, during a conſiderable number of years. Neither did it loſe its credit by being diſuſed, ſince even the famed cardinal Ximenes erected a chapel in the city, in which the divine worſhip was to be performed according to the Gothic or Mozarab liturgy; but in the end means were found to get it condemned, and wholly ſet aſide, and with it the old character, in which it was writ (1).

This character was not, however, the old famed Runic, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the German hiſtory, as has been affirmed by ſeveral authors; but the old Gothic, in which moſt, if not all books, eſpecially church ones, were written

(1) De hoc vid. Vaſ. chron. ſub an. 717. Comec. de geſt. fr. Ximenii, lib. ii. & al. Vid. & Capzow German. & Leddiard. vem. vol. ii. p. 284.

Government, laws, &c.

IT is probable, that, though the firſt inhabitants of Spain were under one monarchical government, upon their firſt ſettling in it, as well as thoſe of Gaul, Germany, and other European nations; yet, as they came to encreaſe in number, and enlarge their territories, they ſplit themſelves into a multiplicity of petty kingdoms and commonwealths. This was the caſe of the Gauls and Germans, when Cæſar firſt came amongſt them, as we ſhall ſhew in due time; and much more ſo may we ſuppoſe it to have been ſo here, conſidering the great variety of nations that came and ſettled amongſt them, of which we ſhall give a fuller account in a ſubſequent ſection of this chapter; for it is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that moſt, if not all of them brought and ſettled their own laws and form of government, than that they ſhould ſubmit to that of the antient inhabitants, eſpecially as many of the former came thither rather as conquerors, than colonies; from all which muſt neceſſarily reſult, not only a vaſt variety, but likewiſe a conſtant fluctuation of them, as they paſſed from one dominion to another, eſpecially when they came under that of the Carthaginians, Romans, Goths, and Vandals (C). After the expulſion of the Carthaginians by the Scipio's, written at that time in Spain, and elſewhere; and was near the ſame with the old Roman, but of a coarſer mould; and was particularly uſed in all the Viſigothiſh dominions.

(C) How they were governed under the two former, may be ſeen by their hiſtory in the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth and ſixteenth volumes, and how by the latter, in ſome of the ſubſequent chapters, as well as in the ſequel of this. One thing we muſt, however, obſerve here, with reſpect to the Romans, that it was their conſtant policy, in their conquered dominions, to diſtinguiſh between thoſe, that, through fear, or neceſſity, had either ſought their friendſhip and protection, or willingly ſubmitted to them; and thoſe, who were ſubdued by force of arms. The former of theſe they permitted to preſerve their laws, and form of government; and only obliged them to pay a certain tribute, and to ſend a number of auxiliary forces, and perhaps to quarter a number of their troops; but the others they forced to ſubmit wholly to the Roman laws and government, as we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew in the next chapter; though, by the way, it muſt be obſerved, with reſpect to the former, that if they gave the leaſt umbrage to their pretended protectors, they ſeldom failed of being ſtripped of their privileges, and of being reduced to the ſla-of which we have given an account in a former chapter in the foregoing volume [c], Spain was governed by conſuls, proconſuls, prætors, proprætors, and præſides, from that very time down to the reign of Tiberius, if not lower; for we find L. Piſo prætor of the hither Spain in his time; and a reſcript of Adrian directed to the conſul of Bœtica. The præſides are mentioned likewiſe in ſubſequent reigns; but that title was of a more general ſignification, and applied to the governors of every inferior province. However, it continued under the government of forty-ſix emperors, from Auguſtus, who is ſaid to have finiſhed the conqueſt of it, to Honorius, in whoſe reign the Romans were expelled by the Vandals, Alans, and Suevi. Under theſe emperors, who governed the empire after their own arbitrary will, Spain was divided into two provinces; but ſoon after reduced into one, though under ſeveral governors, or legati and tribuni [d]. About the reign of Dioclefian and Maximinian, it began to be governed by comites, or counts; and, if any of theſe were forced to be abſent from their juriſdiction, they left the care of it to ſubſtitutes, who were called vicarii. And laſtly, in the time of the Goths, thoſe provinces, that were ſubject to the Romans, were ſet under government of duces and præfecti. Under the Goths they were governed by nineteen kings, during the ſpace of two hundred years, that is, from Athanaric, who began his reign in viſh ſtate of the latter. 'This proved the caſe of the Spaniards, who were forced, by degrees, to ſubmit, not only to the Roman yoke, but to their religion, cuſtoms, &c. and even to their language (2).

[c] Vol. xvii. p. 472, & ſeq.

[d] Tacit. an. Vid. & Vaſ. chronol. c. 13.

We find, however, in ſome antient authors, the names of ſeveral petty kings of Spain, both in the times of the Carthaginians and Romans, who governed in their ſeveral little kingdoms, and lived in peace with, and acknowledged them both, or paid ſome tribute, perhaps, to them; ſuch as Mandonius, whom Livy calls king of the Ilergetes, Amuſius king of the Lacetani, Andubal mentioned by Polybius, and ſome others; but to theſe the Romans only give the title of reguli.

(2) Vid. Aldrete. compend. hiſt. de Hiſpania.

in the year of Chriſt 369, to Leovigild, an. 569. The Suevi reigned in Galicia, according to Iſidorus, an hundred and ſeventy-ſeven years, that is, from Hermeric, A. C. 408, to Andeca, who was defeated and dethroned by Leovigild above-mentioned, and brought that kingdom under his ſubjection A. C. 581. In this liſt of Suevian kings there is a chaſm of their names for an hundred years, from Remiſmund, who infected that kingdom with Arianiſm, A. C. 464, to Theodimirus, who embraced the orthodox faith, the hiſtorians not having thought them worthy to be recorded. The others are ten in number, including Reccaredus above-mentioned. Laſtly, the united kingdoms of Goths and Suevi, which began at Reccaredus the ſucceſſor of Leovigild, and firſt orthodox king of the Goths, A. C. 568, laſted an hundred and twenty ſeven years, that is, to A. C. 713, when the Moors put an end to the kingdom, in the third year of Roderic their ſeventeenth and laſt king. Of all theſe, and their different nations, we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel, every one in their order. As for thoſe of Leo, Caſtile, Arragon, Navarre, and Portugal, they will be ſpoken of in the modern hiſtory.

Laws.

WHAT laws the antient Spaniards originally had, or what new ones were impoſed upon them by their conquerors, we are left to gueſs at. We are, indeed, told, that Hercules, upon his coming thither, did give them a body of them, ſuch as he had brought from his own country, whether Egypt, Tyre or Greece; but what they were, we are wholly in the dark about. If we may, however, offer a conjecture from what we read about their neighbours the Gauls, who had a multiplicity of governments, ſome monarchical, ſome ariſtocratic, and ſome even democratic, and, of the former, ſome limited, ſome deſpotic, we may reaſonably conclude, that every one of them had their own laws, and ſuch as beſt ſuited to their genius, intereſt, and the ſafety of the whole; but theſe do not appear to have extended farther, than to the preſervation of each of their particular forms of governments: for, in other caſes, each of them had their grand council, to deliberate, enact, explain, and decide, according to the preſent emergency, as they thought for the good of the community. By theſe all controverſies between man and man, town and town, diſtrict and diſtrict, were adjudged; and their power was ſuch, that even their kings, where they had not made themſelves wholly abſolute, of which we ſcarce meet with any inſtance, were obliged to ſubmit to their deciſion, ſave only, that in all caſes, where the plaintiff was not ſatisfied with it, he had liberty to challenge his adverſary, and to determine the affair by ſingle combat. The ſame was likewiſe done between city and city, diſtrict and diſtrict, who appointed one or more champions to appear for them, and the cauſe was always adjudged to the conquering ſide; for it was a conſtant maxim amongſt all the deſcendents of the Celtes, that providence always interpoſed in ſuch caſes, and that, where-ever the victory fell, there was the ſureſt right.

Valour and diſcipline.

In the art of war, and military diſcipline, we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to ſhew, that the Gauls, Germans, and other nations of Celtic extract, were very deficient, truſting too much to their ſtrength and bravery, and deſpiſing all other arts, and even defenſive weapons, as beneath a man of true courage; but, in this reſpect, the Spaniards, though no leſs brave and ſtout, had much the advantage of them, which muſt be chiefly owing to their being ſo early and ſo frequently viſited, intermixed, and ſubdued, by other warlike nations, from whom they received freſh and conſtant improvements: whereas the Gauls, and other northern nations, being ſcarcely known till after the coming in of the Romans, and having no other wars to wage, except what they did amongſt themſelves, one petty kingdom or commonwealth againſt another, they were quite ignorant of martial diſcipline; and even their weapons were ſo clumſily made, and ſo miſerably tempered, that they often became uſeleſs, before half the action was over. In a word, their way of fighting was ſo artleſs and rude, that, in many inſtances, it gave a double advantage to the enemy, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel. The Spaniards, on the contrary, had, by their continual wars with ſuch a variety of polite nations, made themſelves maſters of, and placed their chief confidence in, their expertneſs in every branch of the martial trade. Diodorus Siculus tells us [e], that the Celtiberians had ſuch an excellent way of tempering the ſteel, with which they made their weapons, that no ſhield or helmet could reſiſt them (D); and that they uſed them with equal [e] Lib. ii. c. 1.

(D) This, our author tells us, was done by burying the ſteel ſome conſiderable time under-ground, that is, till the ruſt had eat up equal dexterity, both on horſeback and foot, and alternately, if occaſion required. He likewiſe commends them much for their extraordinary nimbleneſs in giving or avoiding of blows; and adds, that they uſed likewiſe the ſame defenſive weapons that other nations did, ſuch as the ſhield, &c. And this is the reaſon why the Romans were ſo long ſubduing them, and ſpent more years in the conqueſt of this country, than Cæſar did weeks, if we may believe him, in the reduction of Gaul. In the former they were forced to proceed, as it were, inch by inch, againſt a ſtout and warlike nation, that knew how to take every advantage of ground, ſituation, diſpoſition, &c. in the other, every battle gained by Cæſar, and theſe by his own confeſſion, were eaſily obtained through this want of ſkill, opened to him a way through whole provinces, who were glad to ſubmit to him on any tolerable terms. What encreaſes the wonder, is, that, at the coming in of the Romans, the Spaniards had ſuſtained ſuch long and dreadful wars, eſpecially juſt before, againſt the Carthaginians, that one might have expected them to have been quite exhauſted of their ſtrength; and much more likely would they have been ſo by thoſe, as they were now engaged in a new one, againſt a more potent and numerous enemy; and yet it is plain, they held out againſt them near, if not quite, two hundred years, before they were entirely ſubdued; nor were they then wholly ſo, ſince we find there was a conſtant neceſſity to keep a numerous army, and a watchful eye over them, and even quite to diſarm whole provinces, to keep them under a tyranny, which many thouſands of them thinking ſhameful and inſupportable, preferred a voluntary death to ſuch a ſlaviſh ſtate; ſo dreadfully abject did it appear to that fierce and warlike nation, ſays Livy, to live without arms [f]: and indeed what Valerius Maximus ſays of the Celtiberians, or Spaniards, was common to all the Celtic nation, and their deſcendents, That they eſteemed nothing ſo glorious, as to die with their ſword in hand, and in defence of their liberty. We ſhall ſee many pregnant inſtances of this noble ſpirit in ſome ſubſequent chapters. Even by the confeſſion of ſome of their own authors, the victories, which they gained over them, did often coſt them ſo dear, that they deſerved nothing leſs than ſuch a pompous name [g]; and many a triumph they have celebrated over them, which, had it had its due would have been turned into

The length and difficulty of their conqueſt.

[f] De bell. Mac. lib. iv. [g] L. Flor. l. ii.

up the ſofteſt and coarſeſt part of the metal: the reſt, that had reſiſted it, was what they made their weapons of.

into a doleful mourning for a bloody and ſignal defeat. Thus much we think is incumbent on an impartial author to ſay, in juſtice to any brave conquered people, though it be much more common now-a-days to ſee them treated with the ſame contempt and diſregard by modern writers, as they were wont to be by their lordly conquerors. We ſhall conclude this article with a judicious remark, which has been long ſince made, with reſpect to this conqueſt of Spain, that though the Roman conquerors were always eager of taking the ſurname of thoſe nations they ſubdued, ſuch as Aſiaticus, Africanus, Germanicus, &c. yet none of them, not even Auguſtus Cæſar, who is complimented by Livy with having put the finiſhing ſtroke to it, nor any of his ſucceſſors, though moſt of them ambitious enough of ſuch high titles, ever took that of Hiſpanicus, Ibericus, or any other that this country was called by. Q. Cæcil. Metellus was the only one, who aimed at it, and would fain have obtained that of Celtibericus, but could not. This ſeems to argue the Romans to have been ſo conſcious of the vaſt deal of blood and treaſure, which it had coſt them, more than any other, that they could ſee no reaſon for beſtowing any ſuch honours upon them; and for which there might not have been the leaſt pretence, had the Spaniards been united into one common intereſt, inſtead of being divided into ſo many governments, and under ſo many heads; for this, after all, will be found the main cauſe of their falling under the Roman yoke.

Learning, arts, and ſciences.

How ſoon arts and ſciences began to flouriſh in Spain, can only be gueſſed at. That they have an excellent genius for them, is evident from the great number of excellent men it has produced, of which we ſhall mention only three of the moſt illuſtrious; viz. the famed Stoic philoſopher Seneca, who was a native of Corduba; the learned orator Quintilian, and the great coſmographer Pomponius Mela, often quoted thro' this work: and though we find other European nations very ſlow and late in cultivating them, ſuch as the Gauls, Germans, and others, who affected a ſingular contempt for them, as unſuitable to, and unworthy of, their martial genius; yet, conſidering the vaſt concourſe of foreign nations into this kingdom, their excellent ſituation for trade and commerce, the great quantities and variety of metals which it afforded, it is very reaſonable to ſuppoſe they muſt have began to encourage them much earlier than any of their neighbours; and that whatever natural reluctancy, ſuch as was common to all people of Celtic extract, they may have had againſt them, neceſſity muſt have forced them to overcome it, in their own defence fence and preſervation. We ſhall ſay nothing here of thoſe trades and manufactures, for which they have ſince rendered themſelves famous for ſome ages, till they again relapſed into their antient pride and indolence, out of which they were but lately rouſed up again. But, with reſpect to their antient ones, though we have not much of them upon record, it ſeems almoſt impoſſible they could have ſubſiſted without them, conſidering the continued invaſions they were expoſed to, and the many enemies they were forced to make head againſt. Even learning, and the liberal arts, if we may believe Strabo, began early to flouriſh here [h]; for he tells us, that the Turdetani, a people of Bœtica, were become very famous for them, and were poſſeſſed of a vaſt number of volumes of great antiquity, and bodies of laws writ in verſe, and other pieces of poetry of above ſix thouſand years ſtanding; which laſt, however exaggerated, doth at leaſt ſhow, that there was ſome foundation for their pretence of having been early encouragers of ſeveral kinds of it: and this is further confirmed by ſeveral other antient authors, particularly one of their own nation [i], but more manifeſtly by what Pliny tells us [k] of one Lartius Licinius, a private perſon, who made no difficulty to give an immenſe ſum (E) for a book of Pliny II's commentaries.

Their language, the old Celtic.

We make no difficulty to affirm, that the original language of Spain was the old Celtic, of which we have given ſome account in a former volume [l], and ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak further of in the next chapter; for, whether we ſuppoſe, with the generality of Spaniſh authors, that Tubal came thither by ſea, and peopled that country, or, as we have elſewhere hinted, that the Celtes, or deſcendents of Gomer his eldeſt brother, ſpread themſelves thither by gradual migrations, the caſe will be much the ſame in this particular, becauſe, on the ſuppoſition of the former hypotheſis, Tubal and Gomer parting ſo ſoon after the flood, their language muſt have been the ſame; that is, the Tubalians, or, as they are called by others, Cetubales, and the Gomerians, muſt have carried the ſame language into thoſe countries where they ſettled, whether we call it by the name of the one, or of the other; with this

[h] Lib. iii. [i] Pomp. Mela. Sil Ital. Columel. Martial. Lucan. & al. plur. [k] Epiſt. lib. iii. [l] Vol. v. p. 410.

(E) This ſum is by our author ſaid to have been forty thouſand nummi; which, according to the computation of his learned commentator, was equivalent to ten thouſand golden crowns.

this difference only, that it muſt have been much purer, and nearer that of the antediluvian patriarchs, whether that was the Hebrew, or any other; concerning which we ſhall not here repeat what we ſaid on the ſubject at the entrance of this work [m]. But as that Beroſian account is now, by moſt learned men, (except the Spaniards, who are fond of their own antiquity, beyond other nations) rejected as fabulous, we have ventured here, and elſewhere, to aſcribe the firſt peopling of Spain to the Celtes, or deſcendents of Gomer. And what confirms this hypotheſis, is, that their antient language, as it is ſtill preſerved in ſome parts of Spain, appears to be the ſame with that which is ſpoken by our Welſh, who are deſcended from Gomer, and retain ſtill their paternal name of Gomerai, and call their own language Gomraeg, as we have ſhewed in their hiſtory, quoted a little higher. We likewiſe there took notice of the vaſt affinity there is between it and the antient Hebrew, inſomuch that to thoſe, who are maſters of both, they plainly appear to be only dialects of the ſame tongue; or, to ſpeak, perhaps, more properly, the Celtic, or language of the deſcendents of Gomer, is a dialect of the Hebrew, or language of Noah. And hence the modern Spaniſh, as it is now ſpoken throughout that country, will afford us a new proof of what we have advanced on this head. Many learned men have obſerved, that it retains a great number of names, words, and, we might add, idioms too, which to them plainly appeared to be of Hebrew extract, but have been at a loſs how to account for it. It is abſurd to ſuppoſe, that they were brought thither by the Jews, who fled from their country, whilſt Nabuchadnezzar was laying it waſte; and came and ſettled there, as ſome have imagined; for that nation is rather famed for loſing their tongue, than preſerving it, much leſs for propagating it in any country they come to. This made Aldrete to think thoſe words to be of Arabic, and not of Hebrew extract, and to be of no longer date, than the coming in of the Moors [n]. Had that learned author had recourſe to the old language, which is ſtill kept in ſome parts of Biſcay, Navarre, and Catalonia, he would have found ſuch a vaſt number of them, as would have convinced him, that they muſt be a great many centuries older than the coming in of the Moors: and, had he known any thing of the affinity there is between the Hebrew and the Celtic, he would have eaſily concluded, that all thoſe words and idioms in the modern dern Spaniſh, muſt have come from the latter, and not from the former; which would have removed all the difficulty, without having recourſe to the Arabic. What ſeems to have miſled him into this notion, is, that there is likewiſe a great conformity between this laſt language and the Celtic: hence that ſurpriſing number of words and idioms common to the High Dutch and Arabic, which has puzzled ſo many critics, and cannot be otherwiſe accounted for, than by ſuppoſing them to be of Celtic original, which, like the old Arabic, was, as we hinted a little higher, a dialect, or, as ſome chuſe rather to ſuppoſe it, both the Hebrew, and they, were dialects of the original tongue. If we allow then the Celtes to have been either the firſt, or even ſome of the firſt inhabitants of Spain, there will be the leſs wonder there ſhould be ſtill found, in the modern language of that country, ſuch primitive words, notwithſtanding the length of time, and various changes, it may have undergone, ſince it is no more than what may be obſerved, not only in the High and Low Dutch, and other northern languages, but even in the French, the fartheſt removed, and ſtrangeſieſt altered, from the old Gauliſh, or Celtic. We may add, that the modern Spaniſh preſerves more of the maſculine grandeur, beauty, and energy, of the old Celtic, than any other in Europe. The ſame may be ſaid of the Spaniſh nation, with reſpect to the antient Celtic grandeur and majeſty; and we may ſafely add of their pride, and ſingular contempt for, not only trade, commerce, manufactures, and the like, but even for agriculture, which they looked upon as below their dignity, and martial genius; and therefore turned them over, as much as they could, to their ſlaves, as we ſhall ſhew, when we come to ſpeak of the Gauls in the next chapter.

[m] Vol. i. p. 431, &c. & vol. iii. p. 440, &c. [n] Antiqued. de Hiſpan. l. ii. c. 8.

The Latin introduced by the Romans.

BUT whatever the original language of Spain may have been at firſt, it muſt have ſuffered great changes under thoſe different nations, by whom this country was ſubdued, and of whom we ſhall give a further account in the ſequel: but the greateſt of all was under the Romans; for theſe made it their conſtant buſineſs to introduce theirs into every country that fell under their hands; at firſt, by founding ſchools, and even univerſities, where youth might, with the Latin tongue and character, be taught the arts and ſciences, which was no ſmall inducement to inſpire them with a fondneſs for it; and, where that failed, then more forcible means were uſed, ſo that in time almoſt the whole kingdom came to ſpeak it as their mother-tongue, only thoſe few tribes of the antient inhabitants who, perhaps, like our Welſh here, fled into ſuch mountainous tainous countries, where they could not be conquered, and retained their original one. The Latin continued no longer there, than to the coming in of the Goths and Vandals, under whom it began by degrees to dwindle from its purity, as it did in Gaul, Italy, and other parts, where thoſe barbarous nations, as they were called, got any dominion, and to adopt their barbariſms, and to decline into the ſtate, in which we ſee it now. And here it muſt be obſerved, with reſpect to the Spaniſh, that it has ſuffered the leaſt corruption, and retains more of the antient Latin, of any in Europe. This makes us think, that it did not receive any conſiderable alteration under the Moors; otherwiſe it muſt have deviated much more from it, than it actually doth: beſides, it is not likely, whatever Aldrete might infer from his fanſied words and idioms of Arabic extract, and of which we have given a more probable origin, that Spaniards, fond as they ever were of their old ways, would have adopted any thing from a nation, which could not but be hateful to them, as invaders and conquerors; and much more ſo, on account of their religion.

Their writing.

FROM what we lately quoted out of Strabo, it is plain, the antient Spaniards muſt have admitted writing amongſt them many ages before either the Gauls, Germans, or any others of Celtic extract; ſince theſe, as ſhall be ſhewn in due place, made it a religious maxim to commit nothing to writing, either of their hiſtory, learning, or religion, but contented themſelves with preſerving them in proper poems, which their druids and bards learned by heart, and tranſmitted in the ſame way to their diſciples. But it is more than probable, that the former were, in ſome meaſure, forced to it by ſome of thoſe many nations, under whoſe dominion they paſſed from time to time, ſuch eſpecially as the Phœnicians, Carthaginians, the Greeks, and the Romans: but, which of thoſe different characters was firſt adopted, or became moſt in vogue, we cannot pretend to ſay; only that, from the coming of the Romans, their letters, as well as language, drove out all the reſt, and was in uſe till their expulſion, when the old Gothic, of which we gave an account at the beginning of this ſection, took place. This laſt, though far inferior to the Roman in beauty, and more tiring to the eyes, continued in ſuch vogue throughout Europe, from the coming of the Goths, downwards, that all church divinity, and law-books, were written, and (even long after the invention of printing, and reviving of the old Roman) were printed in it.

it. We have ſeen there why, and how, it was at length condemned and ſet aſide.

An odd way of computing time in Spain.

It will not be amiſs here to take notice of an odd way, which the Spaniards of old had of computing of time, and which was peculiar to that nation. It took its riſe in the reign of Cæſar Auguſtus, prevailed all over Spain, and was not aboliſhed till after the middle of the thirteenth century; that is, firſt, in Arragon, by Peter IV. A.D. 1358, in Caſtile, by king John, an. 1383, and, in Portugal, by John I. an. 1415. This way was, to reckon the years by æras, or rather from the æra, as they called it, without any other explanation, inſtead of computing from the creation, flood, birth of Chriſt, or any other remarkable epoch; and this was uſed, not only in their profane, but, what is ſtill more ſurpriſing, in their eccleſiaſtic records. So that it has puzzled the learned not a little, at firſt, to fix the point of time of this æra, and to find out a tolerable etymon for that word thus uſed. It is not worth troubling our readers with their various conjectures upon it; for nothing but conjecture has as yet been offered, and ſome of them, too, forced and far fetched. It ſhall ſuffice to ſay here, that they are all agreed on one point, viz. that the æra did commence in Auguſtus's time, ſome add, that it was inſtituted in honour of him; but they differ about the number of years which it preceded the birth of Chriſt. Some reckon it but barely twenty-ſix years, and think thoſe highly miſtaken, who give it any more[a]. Others think it began on the year, in which that prince ordered the world to be taxed, as the evangeliſt words it; and that it was called æra from the æs, or copper coin which was exacted by that decree[b]. Some carry it higher, to fifty-two years before Chriſt, which was, according to them, the year in which Julius Cæſar was killed, and Auguſtus ſucceeded him[c]: the righteſt of them, in our opinion, are thoſe, who deduct the firſt four years out of that emperors reign, becauſe, as he was then but one of the triumvirs, it is not likely the Spaniards ſhould have begun ſo ſoon to compliment him with this new computation; and conſequently think, that it did not take place till the fifth year of this triumvirſhip, when that country, together with Gaul, and ſome other provinces, fell to his lot; and that was forty-eight years before the birth of Chriſt. As for the original of the word, thoſe that do not like like that we mentioned above, which is that of Isidore bishop of Seville [d], will be less pleased with some others, which Spanish critics have fetched still farther. That of Vaseus, who thinks that æra was a mark stamped on the coin, to shew the value of it; and that of Resendius, who affirms that æra was nothing else but a term to signify a computation, or computed number; would appear most probable to us, if they were backed with any good authority [e].

[a] Gerund. paralipom. Hiſpan. l. x. in fin. [b] Id. ibid. ex Iſidor. [c] Vid. Vaſei chronic. c. 22.

Education. THE education of their children in antient days chiefly consisted in training them up to martial deeds, using them to such food and exercises, as tended to make them strong and robust, active and nimble; in inspiring them with a love of liberty, and a contempt of death. These principles were so strongly inculcated into them from their infancy, and so carefully riveted in them both by precept and example, as they grew up, as well as by the hopes of a glorious future life to the bold and brave, and of misery and ignominy to the base and cowardly, that the whole nation seemed unanimously to prefer death before slavery, and looked upon it as the most glorious of all blessings to die fighting in defence of their country. Even their women, by being obliged to train up their children in this martial way, contracted such a habit of bravery, that they seldom or never failed of shewing some signal examples of it to them, as often as an opportunity offered itself. But we shall defer speaking more particularly on this head, till the next chapter, where we shall single out several instances of this native valour, in these and other Celtic nations, even in those of the softer sex, and tender years.

Commerce. WE have already observed, that this country was not only excellently situate for trade and commerce, but abounded with such commodities, especially silver, as invited all the trading nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa, to come thither for them, to settle among them, and even to subdue them; insomuch that scarce any kingdom under heaven ever passed through so many different dominions as this. Egyptians, Phœnicians, Tyrians, Carthaginians, Greeks, Romans, Gauls, Germans, Goths, Vandals, Moors, and many others, have had their particular settlements in it; and the greatest part of them, if not all, have held it, or at least some considerable share of it, under their subjection, promoted the trade and navigation of it, and founded great and opulent cities, and contributed towards the enriching of it. What condition the country was in, in, before thoſe ſtrange nations came into it, we dare not ſay, though, if we were to believe one half of what the Spaniſh hiſtorians have written on this head, it muſt have been in a more flouriſhing condition than any other; ſince we are told by them, that, even before the coming of Hercules, it had a great number of rich and ſtately towns and cities, and theſe of great antiquity too [f], and this ſeems, in ſome meaſure, confirmed by antient writers, ſuch as Strabo, Juſtin, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela, and others; and indeed, if they really had ſuch a ſucceſſion, as we are going to give in the next ſection, of long-lived and opulent monarchs, from Tubal the grandſon of Noah to Geryon, whom that hero overcame, there would be no room to doubt of the truth of ſuch antient cities having been built before his time. But the misfortune is, that there is no other authority for thoſe reigns, than that of Beroſus, who, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel, is juſtly looked upon now as a fabulous author, and that what the Greek and Roman authors mentioned above have ſaid of the pretended antiquity of thoſe cities, and their founders, was in all likelihood taken upon truſt from the Spaniards themſelves, who appear plainly enough to have been as fond of indulging this paſſion for antiquity, as ever the Greeks, or any other of their neighbours; but of this we muſt leave every reader to judge for himſelf.

[d] Epist. ad Vas. ap, eund. ibid. [e] Iid. ibid.

To cloſe up the character of the antient Spaniards, they poſſeſſed all the virtues of the old Celtic nation, and inherited fewer of their vices, than any others of their deſcendents; they were brave, noble, and magnanimous, and hoſpitable to a high degree, and ſo famed for their faithfulneſs, that, even after their being conquered by the Romans, ſeveral of their emperors made no difficulty of preferring them to other people, to be their life-guard. They were ſober, frugal, patient under hardſhips, jealous of their honour, and, till a few centuries paſt, rather deſirous, as much as they could, to preſerve their own territories, than to go in ſearch of new ones abroad. As for the vices they had in common with all others of Celtic extract, and of which we ſhall ſpeak more fully in the ſubſequent chapters, thoſe of pride, cruelty, ſuperſtition, and lazineſs, are juſtly laid to their charge, as well as to that of the Gauls, Germans, [f] Vid. int. al. Gerund. ubi ſup. l. i. Garſi de academ. Hiſp. Nomenclat. urb. Hiſpan. Taraph. de orig. &c. reg. Hiſp. Vaſ. chronic. & al. plur.

Germans, and others [g]; but it doth not appear, that they imitated them in their ſumptuous banquets, much leſs in their exceſſive fondneſs for ſtrong liquors; on the contrary they are famed for their averſion to them, by which they preſerved themſelves from ſuch bloody quarrels, as were the natural conſequence of thoſe drunken revels, which we find to have been ſo indulged among their neighbours, and were commonly attended with the worſt effects.

[g] See hereafter in this vol. the latter part of ſect. 4. in the hiſtory of the Gauls.

SECT. III.

The origin, antiquity, and chronology, of the antient Spaniards.

Spain, its firſt inhabitants.

WE have, in ſeveral parts of this work [a], proceeded on the moſt probable hypotheſis, founded on the teſtimony of the beſt and moſt antient authors, that the Celtes, the deſcendents of Gomer, the eldeſt ſon of Japhet [b], were the firſt that peopled Europe, at leaſt as far as the Danube and Rhine, and even beyond. Whether this was done by gradual migrations from the place of their diſperſion after the flood, or by colonies brought thither by ſea, will, we think, be more properly enquired into in the next chapter, where we ſhall ſpeak of the Gauls the immediate deſcendents of thoſe Celtes, and where we ſhall ſhew, from the beſt antient teſtimonies, that theſe were, from the earlieſt times, found ſettled in every part of it, and even in this of Spain, notwithſtanding its being ſurrounded on three ſides by the ſea, and on the other by the Pyrenees, before any nation that intermingled afterwards among them, of whom we have given an account in the firſt ſection of this chapter, and ſhall have further occaſion to ſpeak it the entrance of the next [c]. According to this hypotheſis, it will be impoſſible to gueſs, about what time either this or any other country of Europe were peopled by them, or which of them claims the preference in point of antientneſs before the reſt, or even to aſſert any thing of this country before the coming of Hercules into it.

BUT the Spaniards, ever fond of their own antiquity, beyond any other nation, having once adopted fabulous Beroſus, have have fetched their origin from another ſpring, namely, from Tubal, the fifth ſon of Japhet [d], whom that author affirms to have come into, and reigned in Spain from the year of the flood 143, to 258, and from whom they pretend to derive a regular ſeries of long-winded monarchs, down to the three Geryons, who were killed by the Egyptian Hercules, to ſay nothing of a much longer one, which they likewiſe draw from this laſt hero, and ſome other new-comers from Libya, down to the time in which they allow the Celtes to have made their firſt entrance into Spain, viz. in the year of the flood 1350; ſo that, according to theſe authors, Spain had been a monarchy, and had laſted, one thouſand two hundred and twenty-ſix years before the coming of the Celtes into it [e]. This account, how fabulous ſoever, not only with regard to Tubal's reign, and of his pretended ſucceſſor, but likewiſe, in ſome meaſure, with regard to thoſe of Hercules, as it is not only adopted by all the Spaniſh authors in general, but likewiſe by all the followers of Beroſus, we ſhall be obliged before we go further, to give our readers a compendious ſketch of it, eſpecially as we have all along in this work given an account of the fabulous, as well as the more certain, part of the hiſtory of each nation; and ſhall do the ſame in thoſe that follow, eſpecially in that of our own. Beroſian liſt of their kings.

[a] See before, vol. 1. p. 346. & vol. v. p. 383, & ſeq.
[b] Geneſ. x. 2. [c] See hereafter, ſect. 3 and 4 of chap. xi.

1. TUBAL having received his grandfather's bleſſing, came, according to theſe hiſtorians, and ſettled in ſome part of Spain (A), in the 134th year of the flood, and reigned there to the year 258; Tubal, or Thubal.

[d] Geneſ. ubi ſup. [e] Vid. int. al. Garibay. compend. hiſt. Hiſpan. l. iv. c. 4, & ſeq. Vaſ. chron. Hiſpan. c. 10. ſub an. diluv. 1350. Gerund. paralip. Hiſp. Sant. Marianna. & al. mult.

(A) This Beroſian fable they think ſufficiently backed by what we read in Joſephus (1), who makes Jubal, or Thubal, as he is called, to have peopled Spain; and by St. Jerom's comment on the prophets Iſaiah and Ezekiel, where he underſtands by Tubal either Italy or Spain; but this, at moſt, will only prove, that ſome of that patriarch's poſterity came and peopled this country, or perhaps came and ſettled in ſome part of it; but not, that he came thither himſelf, and founded a monarchy in it; which has been ſufficiently exploded in ſome former part of this work (2), and by the generality of authors, who have confuted the fabulous founder of that notion (3). However

(1) Antiq. l. i. c. 3. (2) See before, vol. v. p. 389 & ſeq. (3) Vid. int. al. Bochart. phaleg. Sir Walter Rawley, hiſt. Perizon. Pezron. Calmet. comm. in Geneſ. x. 2, & al.

258; during which interval Noah, called, by prophane authors, Janus, came thither, and built two cities, the one of which he called, from his one name, Noela in Galicia, and the other Noega in Aſturia, and which, to this day, retains ſtill that of Navia.

Iberus. 2. IBERUS, the ſon of Tubal, who began his reign in the year of the flood 258, reigned thirty-ſeven years, that is, to the year 295. From him our authors pretend, that the river Iberus, from which Spain was called Iberia, had its name. We have elſewhere given a much more probable etymon of theſe two names [f]. He was ſucceeded by his ſon, Idubeda. 3. IDUBEDA, by ſome called Juballa, and Jubalda, who reigned ſixty-four years, gave name to the famed Idubedean mountains, peopled the province of Briga, now Riola, and called it by that name from,

Brigo. 4. BRIGO, his ſon and ſucceſſor (B), who reigned fifty-two years, and left the kingdom to his ſon,

TAGUS,

[f] See before, vol. v. p. 383, 389. (E). & vol. xvii. p. 323.

However, theſe partial ones, who have adopted it, have built many other conjectural ſchemes upon it; ſuch as the place where he landed, ſettled, &c. the ſyſtem of religion, laws, &c. he left with them, and the like; inſomuch that they affirm, that his deſcendents did ſtrictly adhere to the precepts given to Noah by God, and preſerved themſelves free from idolatry, polytheiſm, and all heathenith ſuperſtition, till Hercules brought thoſe plagues from Egypt, and infected Spain with them. But of this weſhal l have a fairer occaſion to ſpeak in the next chapter, where we ſhall enter into a more exact detail of the religion of the Celtes and Gauls.

(B) From him the Briones, or Brigones, ſituate along the long ridge of Idubedean mountains, are affirmed, by the Navarrean hiſtorians, to have been named, as well as the city of Cantabria, antiently, according to them, Cantabriga; whilſt the Caſtellani derive both from the Galli Bracati, who came and ſettled there.

The word Briga, which had the ſame ſignification in Spain, and in the cities Cantabriga and Meidobriga, which the antient Gallic Dun or Dunum, in the names Lugdunum, Noviodunum, and the German Burgh, in Friburg, Auſburgh, &c. is likewiſe affirmed to have had its origin from him. But the word Brig or Bric, from which Briga and Brica differ only in termination, is certainly of Celtic extraction, as we ſhall ſee in the next chapter. Several other things are ſaid likewiſe of this king, without any foundation, which the reader may ſee in the Spaniſh authors lately quoted.

5. TAGUS, who reigned thirty years, gave name to the river Tagus, and was ſucceeded by his ſon, Tagus.

6. BOETUS, from whom the river Bœtis, and the province of Bœtia, Bœtica, formerly Turdetania, and ſince Andaluſia, had their names. He is ſaid to have been ſurnamed Turdetanus, on account of his introducing, as well as encouraging, learning. Bœtus, the laſt of Tubal's line.

7. GERYON, an African, or Libyan, of a gigantic ſtature, and a bloody tyrant, who began his reign in the year of the flood 514, and reigned, according to ſome, twenty-five, and thirty-four years, according to others [g]. Againſt him came Oſiris, or, as he is called by others, Dionyſius king of Egypt, with a powerful army, defeated and killed the tyrant (C), and divided his kingdom between his three ſons, commonly called the three Geryons, after having firſt exacted a ſtrict Geryon.

[g] Conf. Garibay, compend. Vaſ. chron. Hiſp. ſub an. diluvii 514.

(C) This Geryon was alſo called Deabus, and is ſurnamed, by the Greeks, Chryſco, on account of the vaſt wealth which he had gotten by his plunders and robberies. He is ſaid to have brought over a number of wild or Scenite Arabs, and to have been the founder of the city of Girona (4). Diodorus Siculus makes him the ſon of Chryſaor, or the golden ſword, the ſon of Meduſa. From his defeat is ſuppoſed to have ſprung the fable of Hercules's overcoming him, and carrying his oxen away, ſpoken of in a former volume (5). Juſtin, indeed, makes mention of him, and of his vaſt herds of cattle (6); but Strabo and Pliny look upon the whole as a mere fable (7); and Arrian further affirms (8), that there never was ſuch a king as Geryon in Spain. Ariſtotle ſays, that Hercules (whom even ſome Spaniſh authors affirm to have been, not the Egyptian, but the Greek one, and ſon of Jupiter by (9) Alcmena) had been enticed over into Spain by the richneſs of its inhabitants: whence a law is pretended to have been enacted amongſt them, forbidding the uſe or poſſeſſion of ſilver, which was ſtill in force ſome time after the coming thither of the Carthaginians (10). Something like this law was likewiſe among ſome of the antient Gauls, of which we ſhall ſpeak in the next chapter.

(4) Lib. iv. c. 4. Vid. & Aldrete, var. antiguedad. lib. iv. c. 18. (5) See before, vol. v. p. 629. ſub not. (6) Hiſt. l. xliv. (7) Strab. l. iii. Plin. l. iv. c. 22. (8) De geſt. Alex. Mag. l. ii. (9) Vid. Gerundenſ. paralipom. l. ii. Ant. Nebrigenſ. & al. (10) Vaſæi chronic. ſub an. diluv. 539.

promiſe from them, that they would reign amicably, and abſtain from thoſe plunders, ravages, and cruelties, for which he had ſo juſtly puniſhed their father.

Geryons. 8. THREE Geryons, ſaid to have been all of one birth, and the laſt of the Geryonic race, reigned with ſuch ſurpriſing concord, that they are thought to have given birth to the fable that repreſents them with a threefold body. Theſe being ſuppoſed to have had a hand in the death of Oſiris, in revenge of that of their father, Hercules, his ſon, brought a great army from Egypt, firſt gave them a total overthrow, and then overcame and ſlew them, one after another, in ſingle combat. It is ſaid, that the columns between the Carpean and Abylean mountains were ſet up in memory of this exploit. They had reigned, according to our authors, near forty years, when they received this overthrow, and were buried in the iſle of Caliz [h]. Hercules, who did not come ſo much to conquer that kingdom, as to deliver the world from tyrants and robbers, had no ſooner overcome the three Geryons, than he made ready to paſs into Italy, and left the government of Spain to his ſon, Hiſpal. 9. HISPAL (D), who built the city of that name, now called Seville, which was afterwards rebuilt and beautified by Cæſar: and from Hiſpal began a new ſucceſſion of Spaniſh kings. He is ſaid to have reigned ſeventeen years, and to have left his kingdom to his ſon, Hiſpan. 10. HISPAN, or Hiſpanus, from whom the country took its name, which it hath preſerved ever ſince. He began his reign

[h] Garibay, ubi ſup. lib. iv. c. 12. ad fin.

(D) In this expedition it is pretended that our Egyptian hero introduced the idolatry and ſuperſtition of his country; to which another author adds the bloody rite of offering up human victims (11).

He had likewiſe two favourite companions with him, the one named Zacynthus, and the other Baleon; the former of whom gave his name to the famed city of Zacynthum, ſince Saguntum (12); and the other to the Balearic iſlands, now Majorca and Minorca (13).

Another antient author, who was a Spaniard by birth, adds, that the Tyrians built a ſtately temple to this Hercules, which became famous, both for its antiquity and vaſt treaſures (14).

(11) Lactant. l. i. c. 21. (12) Vid. Hieron. proœm. in epiſt. ad Galat. (13) Luc. Flor. l. lx. (14) P. Mela, de ſit. orb. l. iii. c. 6.

reign in the year of the flood 607, and reigned thirty-one years, and is affirmed to have been a noble and magnificent prince (E), and to have made the city of Caliz his chief reſidence [i].

HERCULES, hearing of his ſon Hiſpan's death, returned into Spain, and reigned there from the year of the flood 639, to 658. Being grown very old, he bequeathed the Spaniſh kingdom to Heſperus, one of his captains and companions; and died, and was buried at Gades, Caliz, where that ſtately monument was erected to him, which we mentioned in a late note, and which became in high veneration, not only among the Spaniards, but was reſorted to by moſt nations of Europe, Aſia, and Afric (F). Hercules.

11. HESPERUS, from whom both Spain and Italy were called Heſperia, but the former, by way of diſtinction, Heſperia Magna, and his brother Atlas, ſurnamed Italus, had accompanied Hercules in all his excurſions and conqueſts. Upon the death of that hero, Heſperus cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed his ſucceſſor, as by his will and appointment. Atlas, who is ſuppoſed to have been left in Italy, upon the return of the other two in Spain, came thither alſo himſelf, and drove him out of his kingdom, in the year of the flood 669, after he had reigned there eleven years. Heſperus.

12. ATLAS, after he had reigned ten years in Spain, is ſaid to have returned into Italy, in order to drive his brother thence alſo; for it ſeems that fugitive prince was fled thither, Atlas.

[i] Id. ibid. in fin. c. 14.

(E) To him ſome antient authors have falſly aſcribed, among other ſumptuous works, the aqueduct of Segovia, which was done by the emperor Trajan, and the Pharus or famed tower of Corumna, a maritime city in Galicia, which was erected in Auguſtus's time (15).

(F) It is hardly worth the while to trouble our readers with the various ſentiments of the learned concerning this famed hero; whether he was the Egyptian, Phœnician, or Grecian Hercules: eſpecially as we have had occaſion to ſpeak of him in ſome former parts of this work, to which we muſt here refer our readers (16), as well as to what we ſhall have further occaſion to ſpeak of him in the next chapter.

(15) Vid. Flor. Vaſ. chronic. Garib. & al. ub. ſup. (16) See before, vol. xi. p. 257. 268. vol. xvi. p. 629, (W). vol. xvii. book 4. chap. 1. vol. xviii. p. 33, & ſeq. Beuter. Vaſ. Garibai, & al.

and was ſo well received there, as to give him new cauſe of jealouſy. Upon his departure he left the kingdom to his ſon, Orus. 13. ORUS, or Sicorus (G), who reigned forty-five years. He gave his name to the river Sicoris, now Segre, which falls into the Iberus, or Ebro; and was ſucceeded by his ſon, Sicanus. 14. SICANUS, who had followed him from Italy into Spain; a prince ſaid to have been liberal and magnanimous. He gave name to the river Anas, now Ana; reigned thirty-two years, during which he is ſaid to have carried his ſucceſsful arms into Italy, and Sicily, which was from him called Sicania, as it had been before, Trinacria, and ſince, Sicily, from his ſucceſſor, Siceleus. 15. SICELEUS ſucceeded his father, and reigned forty-four years, during which he is ſaid to have paſſed over into Italy, and performed very great feats, and to have aſſiſted Iaſius, the grandſon of Atlas, by Electra his daughter, who was then at high wars with Dardanus, about the ſucceſſion to certain ſtates in that country. In this prince's reign the Deucalian flood is ſaid to have happened, and that Moſes was then likewiſe performing his wonders before the hardened king of Egypt.

Luſus. 16. SICELEUS was ſucceeded by his ſon Luſus, who had accompanied him in his wars in Italy. He is ſaid to have been a brave prince, but vaſtly addicted to the heatheniſh ſuperſtitions that then prevailed. Some attribute the peopling of Luſitania, now Portugal, to him, from whom it was called by that name; others, to another Luſus, a chieftain and companion of Bacchus. We can affirm nothing certain about either. Luſus reigned thirty years, and was ſucceeded by,

Ulus. 17. ULUS, or Sic-Ulus, whom ſome make the ſon of Luſus, others of Atlas. He was ſo warlike a prince, kept ſuch vaſt armies and fleets, that he was called the ſon of Neptune. He paſſed over into Italy, to aſſiſt thoſe Spaniſh colonies

(G) From this, and the two following princes names, Sicanus and Siceleus, it is ſuppoſed, that their proper names were Orus, Anus, and Eleus; and that the Sic was a titular prænomen: and this is further proved by Anus giving his name to the river Ana, and Eleus to that of Eleo (17).

(17) Id. ibid. c. 24. Vid. Ant. Nebrig. hiſt. reg. cathol. Vaſ. chronic. ſuban. diluv. 967. & al.

colonies, that had been ſettled there by Atlas, repreſſed their enemies there, peopled ſome countries in the neighbourhood of Rome, built ſome cities, and particularly the famed caſtle of Alſino; thence he paſſed into Sicily, to aſſiſt thoſe Spaniſh colonies, which his predeceſſors had fixed there, and, who, it ſeems, were ſadly haraſſed by the other inhabitants of that iſland, which, from his great feats there, he called by his own name. He reigned about ſixty years, and was ſucceeded, by what means can ſcarcely be gueſſed [k], by,

18. Testa, an African, or Libyan, to whom, however, the Spaniſh hiſtorians give the character of a good and wiſe prince. Some of them affirm, that it was in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, that a colony of Greeks, from the iſland of Zacynthus, now Jaſanto, came into Spain by ſea; and, with his permiſſion, ſettled in that part of it, which they called by the name of their native place, though they became afterwards better known by thoſe of Saguntini and Saguntines. Here then is a new and different account of the foundation of that famed city and people, of whoſe valour and ſad cataſtrophe we have ſpoken at large in the foregoing volume [l]; and this, if right, deſtroys what we mentioned a little higher concerning the origin, which is given them by other authors. Nothing can be advanced on either ſide but conjecture. As for Teſta, after a long reign of ſeventy-four years, he was ſucceeded by his ſon, Testa.

19. Romus, who reigned thirty-three years, and is ſuppoſed to have founded the city of Rome, in the province of Tarragona, ſince called Valentia, from the Romans calling that city afterwards by this name, and enlarging and beautifying it, and making it the metropolis of it (H). In this prince's reign the Phœnicians are ſaid to have made their firſt entrance into Spain; and about the ſame time alſo the famed Romus.

[k] Id. c. 23. Vaſ. ſub an. diluv. 893, & al. [l] See vol. xvii. p. 323---334.

(H) Others will have it, the people of that province built this famed city, and called it by that name, in honour of Romus; and that the Greeks called it Rome, and the Latins Valentia, as names of the ſame import in each language (18).

(18) Garib. ub. ſup. c. 24. Id. ibid. c. 26.

Bacchus comes into Spain.

famed Greek chieftain Iacchus, or Bacchus, ſurnamed Liber Pater, with a conſiderable army, not ſo much with a deſign to conquer that country, as to ſpread his fame and colonies on this, as he had done on the other, ſide of the world, where he is ſaid to have carried his conqueſts as far as the Indies. As he travelled through Andaluſia, he built the famed city Nebriſa, in the province of Bœtica, ſince called Veneria, and now Lebrixa, the native place of the learned Antony Nebriſſenſis, often quoted in this chapter; who ſays, on this head, that Luſus the ſon of Bacchus gave name to Luſitania, and that this expedition happened two hundred years before the deſtruction of Troy. Romus was ſucceeded by,

Palatuus. 20. PALATUUS, the ſuppoſed founder of the city of Palentia, or Palantia. This prince had reigned about eighteen or nineteen years in great tranquility, when a famous warrior, named Licinius Cacus, raiſed a war againſt him, and deprived him, according to ſome, of part, and, according to others, of this whole kingdom, and forced him to wander about from country to country, whilſt he reigned uncontrouled, and encouraged all kinds of arts and handicraft trades, which, till then, had been much neglected in that country (I). At length Palatuus found means to recover his kingdom from him, after he had poſſeſſed it thirty-ſix years; and gave him a total overthrow near mount Cacus, now Montcajo, ſo called from him, after this overthrow. Some pretend, that he was ſlain upon it; others, that he retired into Italy: however that be, Palatuus reigned ſeventy years, and was ſucceeded by,

Cacus defeated.

Erythræus. 21. ERYTHRÆUS, in whoſe reign is placed the founding of the famed city of Carthage, of which we ſhall ſay no more here, having given an ample account of it in a former volume [m]. He is ſaid to have given name to the

[m] Vid. vol. xvi. p. 556---562.

(I) Some authors are ſo fond of raiſing the fame of this uſurper, that they make him the firſt, who ſet about diſcovering the iron mines in Spain, and ſet up the fabrication of that metal. He might, perhaps, have given greater encouragement to this manufacture than any of his predeceſſors; but that they ſhould have been ſuch ſtrangers in Spain to the working of ſo neceſſary a metal, is altogether improbable.

the famed iſland of Erythræa, or Erythia, as it is called by Mela [n] and Pliny [o], an iſland, which has been ſought far and near [p]. We have endeavoured, at the beginning of this volume, to give the beſt account of its ſituation, to which we ſhall refer our readers [q]. Erythræus was the laſt of the line of Teſta, in which the monarchy had laſted two hundred and forty-five years, according to ſome; or an hundred and twenty-three, according to others [r], including the forty-ſix years of Licinius's uſurpation. He was ſucceeded by,

22. GARGORAS, ſurnamed Mellicola, becauſe, as Juſtin hath it [s], he found out the uſe of honey, and cultivating of bees. He was a Spaniard by birth, a wiſe prince, and a great promoter of induſtry. In his reign the famed city of Troy having been deſtroyed by the Greeks, of which, as well as its long ſiege, an account has been given in a former volume [t], many of thoſe warriors, who either did not care, or were hindered, by contrary winds, from returning into their own country, came and ſettled in Spain, and built cities in ſeveral parts of it, and, amongſt them, thoſe which the reader will find in the margin (K). To Gargoras ſucceeded, if we may believe Juſtin [u], Gargoras.

23. HABIS

[n] De ſitu, l. iii. c. 6. [o] Plin. lib. iv. c. 22. [p] Conf. auct. ſup. citat. & Arrian. cum mult. al. [q] Before, vol. xviii. p. 14. [r] Conf. Ant. Nebricens. Garibay, & Vaſæum, ubi ſup. [s] Hiſt. l. xliv. [t] Vol. v. p. 549---560. [u] Lib. xliv.

(K) Teucer, the ſon of Telamon, one of the firſt that came into Spain, ſettled in that part where the new Carthage was built, ſince called Carthagena, if he was not the founder of it. From thence he paſſed into Galicia, and gave name to that canton (19). He is likewiſe ſaid to have built the city of Salmantica, now Salamanca, in memory of his own native country; though Stephen of Byzantium, who calls it Elmantica, ſays nothing of his founding it. Amphilochus, a companion of Teucer, is ſaid to have built that of Amphiloque, ſince called Aguas Caldas, or hot waters, and now Orenſe in Galicia. Diomedes built Tydo on the banks of the Minius, now Minno, in memory of his father Tydeus. It retains ſtill the name of Tuy, Tuya.

(19) Juſtin. ex Trog. l. xliv.

Habis, his excellent reign.

23. HABIS, his grandſon, by a daughter, and a baſtard, but in all other reſpects an extraordinary prince, whether we conſider the many and ſurpriſing dangers he was obliged to go through, and from which he was delivered, as it were, by as many miracles, or the beauty and talneſs of his perſon, or the many and ſignal benefits which the Spaniſh nation received from him during his reign, to which he was, ſuch was his apparent merit, nominated by his grandfather in his life. The Spaniards at that time were ſtill ſo very rude and uncivilized, that they knew nothing of the uſe of bread, or of cultivating the earth. It was he, it ſeems, that firſt taught them to plough their land with oxen, to ſow and reap corn, to grind, knead, and bake it into bread. He likewiſe gave them many excellent laws, obliged them to live in towns, and appointed them ſeven courts of judicature in ſeven cities of his kingdom. Our author adds, that, after his death, his kingdom continued in his poſterity during ſeveral centuries; but we muſt not thence ſuppoſe, that either he or they, or indeed any of his predeceſſors, were maſters of the whole country, but only of ſome conſiderable part, as we hinted a little higher, in ſpeaking of their government. How long this laſt king reigned, who ſucceeded him, &c. what other kings reigned in other parts of Spain, and many other things relating to the antient hiſtory of it, we are wholly left in the dark about, down to the coming of the Carthaginians, no antient hiſtorian having left us any thing about it. Only this chaſm is filled up, by ſome fabulous authors of theirs, with ſuch ſtuff, as ſmells as rank of the fable, as what we have here in England from our own monkiſh books; we ſhall mention one or two of them, by way of ſample:

IN

Tuya, and Tude. Some other places and colonies theſe, and a few more, gave name to; as Aſtur to Aſturias, Ulyſſes to Ulyſipone, now Liſbon, where he built alſo a temple to Pallas. Strabo (20) calls this city Ulixipolis, or city of Ulyſſes. Mneſtheus built and peopled the port, that bore his name, on the coaſts of Andaluſia, near the city of Gades, or Caliz; in which laſt, the Andaluſians ſay, was a ſtately temple, built by the ſame warrior, which became in time famous, and much reſorted to, for its oracle, from all the three parts of the world.

(20) Strab. l. iii.

In the year after the flood 1250, that is, thirty-four years after the beginning of Habis's reign, began, according to theſe authors, ſuch an extraordinary drought, that it did not rain in all Spain during the ſpace of twenty-ſix years, inſomuch that all the rivers of it, except the Bœtis and the Iberus, were dried up, and the country become almoſt a deſert, for want of inhabitants. If ſuch a long and univerſal drought had really happened, it would rather be a wonder, that there were either man or beaſt alive in moſt parts of that vaſt country. They tell us, indeed, that about the ſame time a certain people, whom they call Almonides, came and ſettled in it; but, if ſo, is it not very ſtrange, that no antient author ſhould have taken the leaſt notice of it [w]? for which reaſon the learned author, often quoted in this chapter, juſtly rejects both as fabulous [x]. Fifty-ſeven years after, Homer, or, as his right name was, Meleſigenes, travelled through Spain and Italy. This was before he loſt his ſight; and he, according to Herodotus, flouriſhed an hundred and ſixty-eight years after the Trojan war [y]. A long and great drought.

About forty-two years after, the Celtes, or Gauls, are ſaid to have come firſt into Spain, and, about twenty-years after the Rhodians. Of the firſt it is affirmed, that they fought for ſome time with the Spaniards, or Iberians, as they were then called, about their ſettlements; but agreed at length upon a peace, and mutual friendſhip; ſo that they, from that time, became ſo blended with each other, by intermarrying, and living together, that they became as one people, under the name of Celtiberians [z]. From which account we would obſerve by-the-by, that this could only be one of thoſe colonies, which the Celts in Gaul ſent into the country, for more than one or two they ſent from thence hither, as well as into other parts of Europe, as often as they were ſtreightened for want of room, as we ſhall ſee in the next chapter. It is therefore, very probable, that theſe colonies, coming into Spain, after a few battles or ſkirmiſhes, being found, by the inhabitants, to be originally of the ſame ſtock, having the ſame, or near the ſame language, religion, and cuſtoms, were readily admitted and blended with them. The Rhodians, who came thither by ſea, Year of the Flood 1350. Before Chriſt 1649. The Gauls and the Rhodians ſettle in Spain.

[w] Vaſ. ſub an. Strab. l. iii. [x] A. Nebricens. ubi ſup. [y] Vid. [z] Diod. Sicul. bibl. lib. vi. Lucan. Hieron & al.

sea, landed at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains, and built there a city, to which they gave their name. It was a bishop's see till the time of the Goths, but is now reduced to an heap of ruins. About ten years after happened that great fire, which spread itself all over that vast ridge of mountains called the Pyrenees, and from thence, Incendium Pyrenæum, or, as others will have it, more properly, that those mountains were thence called Pyrenean. This fire, we are told, was at first kindled by some shepherds [a], and burnt with such fierceness for many days, that it spread itself almost over that whole ridge. As for what they add, that the intenseness of the heat melted the silver in the mines, and made it boil up, and run down in rivulets along those hills, it is justly looked upon as fabulous by Posidonius, and by Strabo after him [b].

Year of the Flood 1300. Before Christ 2699.

The Phœnicians carry off immense quantities of silver hence.

It must be owned, however, that Spain must have yielded extraordinary quantities of that metal, if what we read in Aristotle be not greatly exaggerated, that the Phœnicians, who are supposed to have come thither about the 1500th year of the flood, exchanged their naval commodities for such an immense weight of it, that their ships could neither contain, nor sustain its load, though they used it for ballast, and made their anchors, and other iron implements, of silver [c] (L). These are supposed to have likewise settled in Spain, and to have built several other cities, especially in Bœtica, and to have had the mastery of the sea the space of forty-one years, after which they went and settled in the Balearic islands.

Other nations that governed in Spain.

Besides the Tyrians, Egyptians, and Phœnicians, already mentioned, who obtained footing and dominion in this country,

[a] Diod. Sicul. l. vi. Vid & Aristot. de mirab. auscult.
[b] Lib. iii. [c] Aristot. & Diod. Sic. ubi sup.

(L) In this expedition some of their authors affirm the Phœnicians, who landed at Tartessus, to have built the city of Gades, or Caliz, tho' Strabo affirms it to have been done on their third landing (21). Other authors ascribe the building of it to the Tyrians (22); but we shall refer our readers to what has been said of the foundation of that famed place, in a former volume (23). As for the cities of Melaca and Abdera, Strabo plainly says, that they were built by the Phœnicians (24).

(21) Garib. antiq. Hisp. Vas. Gerund. & al. ubi sup. (22) Plutarch. in Scipion. & al. (23) Vid. sup. vol. xvii. p. 24. (24) Lib. iii.

country, Euſebius mentions [d] ſeveral other nations, who did the ſame before the coming in of the Carthaginians, ſuch as the Egyptians a ſecond time, who held the dominion of the ſea thirty-five years, and built ſome cities, eſpecially Tarracona, which they ſo called from Tarraco their leader. The Mileſians are likewiſe affirmed, by the ſame author, to have held ſome government there the ſpace of twenty-nine years. Next, the Carians, forty-eight years, from whom Ptolemy affirms the Cariſti in Spain to be deſcended. The Leſbians ſucceeded them, who built ſeveral cities, and governed, according to the ſame Euſebius, ſixty-eight years. Than the Phocians, in the ſixteenth year of Tarquinius Priſcus, and held the government forty-eight years; and from thence went and ſettled on the ſouth part of Gaul, and built the city of Marſeilles of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the next chapter. Laſtly, Nebuchadnezzar, after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and conqueſt of Judæa, is affirmed by Joſephus and Strabo to have reigned nine years in Spain [e], at the end of which it is ſaid that he abandoned it to the Carthaginians; though it is likely, that, as the Spaniſh writers affirm, a great part of that vaſt hoſt, which he had brought with him, ſettled there, and built cities and caſtles, which they called by their own, or ſome Chaldee names, by which they may be ſtill traced up to their original [f]; but upon the whole it ſeems probable, that moſt, if not all, of theſe nations, contented themſelves with maritime parts, for the ſake of commerce, and the command of the ſea, and penetrated but a little way into the inlands, whilſt theſe might enjoy their own laws and government, and be glad to trade and barter with them, and ſo be leſs ſolicitous who were maſters of the ſea-coaſts, and parts adjacent, ſo they could but enjoy the benefit of their commerce, and the produce of their own lands, in peace and quietneſs. If any of theſe ſtrangers were enticed, by the pleaſantneſs and fruitfulneſs of the country, to ſettle amongſt the antient inhabitants, whether this was done by permiſſion and conſent, or by force of arms, yet it could not be long before they became ſo blended with each other, that nothing remained of their origin, but the names they gave to thoſe places, which they either built, or Nebuchadnezzar.

[d] Euſeb. chron. Vid. & Taraph. reg. Hiſp. ſub. A. ant. C. 840. [e] Antiquit. l. x. c. 9. Geogr. lib. iv. [f] Vid. Liv. decad. iv. Tarapha reg. Hiſp. ſub an. 571. Garibai, lib. v. c. 4. Vaſ. ſub an. U. C. 13. & 204.

or lived in. As for the Celtiberi, mentioned a little higher, they encreaſed ſo faſt in that pleaſant and healthy country, that they were forced to have recourſe to their old method of ſending colonies abroad. Some of them ſettled in Luſitania, where they founded ſeveral cities, and called them by Celtic names (M); and from theſe colonies the Luſitanians had that of Celtiberi given to them: hence Diodorus Siculus ſays, that of all the Celtiberians the Luſitanian were the ſtouteſt [g]. Another colony of them went into Bœtica, where they likewiſe left ſeveral cities, and other monuments of their ſettlement. The goodneſs of the climate, however, joined to their laborious exerciſes, and plain way of living, which made them ſo ſtout and long-lived, may be juſtly eſteemed one of the main cauſes of their multiplying ſo faſt, and being obliged to ſend abroad ſuch frequent colonies, a further proof of which we have in the long reigns of ſome of their monarchs formerly mentioned; and we ſhall cloſe this ſection with one more, in the perſon of the famed Arganthonius king of the Tarteſſii, who is ſaid to have reigned at Gades, now Cadiz, full fourſcore years [h], and to have died in the hundred and thirtieth, according to one [i], or hundred and fortieth, according to another antient author [k], and is mentioned with admiration by others, for his long reign and life [l] (N).

Celtiberians in Luſitania.

Arganthonius, his long-life and reign.

SECT.

[g] Lib. vi. ap. eund. [h] Valer. Max. l. viii. c. 14. [i] Aſin. Poll. [k] Val. Max. ibid. [l] Herod. Anacr. Cicer. de ſenect. Baſil. epiſt. ad Nepot. Vid. & Vaſ. ſub. an. U. C. 129. Gerund. Taraph. & al.

(M) Amongſt theſe was the antient city of Segovia, or Segobia, famous for its celebrated aqueduct, and afterwards for its woollen manufacture; and another of the ſame name, and built by another colony of Celtiberians, near Corduba in Bœtica, and mentioned by Cæſar in his commentaries; though the other was the more famed of the two.

(N) Herodotus ſays, that he reigned in Carteia, al. Tarteia; Anacreon, that he lived an hundred and fifty years; Pliny gives him but an hundred and twenty; but Silius Italicus three hundred; and, as for the time in which he lived, it is impoſſible to aſcertain it, ſome making him cotemporary with king Siculus, the ſeventeenth king in our liſt, in the year of the flood 1514 (25). Others bring him down as low as the 130th year of Rome, or of the flood 1692 (26).

(25) Lib. iii. Taraf. ſub an. 1485. (26) Vaſ. ſub an. A.U. 129.

SECT. IV.

Of the conqueſt of Spain by the Carthaginians and Romans, to the coming in of the Goths, and other northern nations.

THIS remainder of the Spaniſh hiſtory we give here in a ſeparate ſection, not as deſigning to treat of it in that ample manner that it would deſerve, were it detached from the body of this work, for that were a deviation from our original plan, and on the one hand draw us into ſuperfluous repetitions, their conqueſt by the Carthaginians and Romans having been fully treated of in the hiſtory of thoſe two nations; and, on the other, oblige us to anticipate thoſe of the Gauls, Goths, Vandals, &c. who conquered, or ſettled in, any part of this country, and which will, therefore, more properly belong to their ſeveral hiſtories in the ſubſequent chapters. Our motives, therefore, for ſeparating this part from that which we gave in the laſt ſection, are, firſt, to diſtinguiſh the true from the fabulous, or the certain from the uncertain: of this latter kind, at leaſt, we look upon to be all that has been ſaid in the laſt ſection, though, for the reaſons mentioned at the beginning of it, we are forced to inſert it in ſuch a work as this; and, ſecondly, becauſe in the remaining part of this work, ſtill to be ſpoken of, we ſhall proceed in a more ſuccinct method, to avoid all ſuch needleſs repetitions, or anticipations, and content ourſelves with giving our readers a kind of chronological ſummary of thoſe conqueſts, and refer our readers for thoſe, which have already been ſpoken of in this work, to the volumes and pages, where they are to be ſeen at full length; and, for the reſt, to the remaining chapters of this and the next volume, where they will be more amply related.

THEIR conqueſt by the Carthaginians was, if we may believe Juſtin and Oroſius, occaſioned by the Tyrians. Theſe, having founded the city of Gades, and built a temple to Hercules, were ſo infeſted by the jealous Spaniards, that they were forced to ſend to Carthage for help; which being readily granted, Meſeus was ſent with a fleet to their aſſiſtance, who ſuppreſſed their enemies, and enlarged their territories, by the reduction of ſeveral conſiderable places along that coaſt [m]. The richneſs of the country ſoon invited them to purſue their conqueſts, and the vaſt treaſures, both in gold and ſilver, with which that country then abounded, could not but be a ſtrong temptation to them [n], as they were engaged in ſuch a bloody and expenſive war with the Romans. This was accordingly performed with great ſucceſs, at firſt, by their great general Hamilcar Barcas, and afterwards by his ſons Aſdrubal and Hannibal, the latter of whom he took with him thither, when but nine years old, that he might inſpire him with greater hatred againſt the Romans, and with a more eager deſire to complete the reduction of this opulent country, to the ſubjection of Carthage. The ſucceſs which theſe generals met with, both againſt the Spaniards, and againſt the Romans, whom they had courted to their aſſiſtance [o], has been ſo fully ſpoken of both in the Roman hiſtory [p], and in that of the Carthaginians [q], that we ſhall need only to refer our readers to thoſe places here cited in the margin. Aſdrubal likewiſe, another of their generals, who was left there to command during Hamilcar's return to Carthage, was no leſs ſucceſsful there, and obliged the Romans to come to a treaty with him, of which the reader will find an account in a former volume [r], and which he inviolately kept with them whilſt he lived; but his death, which happened ſoon after [s], and his being ſucceeded by young Hannibal, put an end to it: and that enterpriſing hero, tho' then but twenty-ſix years of age, began the war afreſh, and laid ſiege to the famed city of Saguntum. We have given already a full account of that ſiege, and the ſad cataſtrophe of its brave inhabitants, and ſhall refer our readers to it [t]. But Hannibal having undertaken his fatal expedition into Italy [u], the Carthaginian affairs began to decline apace, and their forces to receive many conſecutive overthrows here, both by ſea and land [w], eſpecially under Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſco, who, being defeated by Scipio, was forced to retire to Gades [x]; where, being again defeated at ſea, and, to complete his misfortunes, betrayed by Maſiniſſa, he was reduced to ſuch

Year of the flood 2770. Before Chriſt 229.

a

[m] Juſtin. ex Trog. l. ult. [n] Diod. Sic. lib. vi. [o] See before, vol. xvii. p. 312---318. [p] See vol. xii. 147, 167, & 179, & ſeq. [q] Vol. xvii. p. 312---320. [r] Vol. xii. p. 170, &c. Vol. xvii. p. 312. [s] Vol. xii. p. 178, & ſeq. [t] Vol. xii. p. 181, & ſeq. [u] See vol. xii. p. 176, & ſeq. [w] See vol. xvii. paſſim. [x] Ibid.

a deſperate ſtate, that, in revenge, he committed ſuch horrid cruelties, as rendered him and his nation odious to the Spaniards and Romans [y]. All this while the two Scipios not only gained ground againſt them by theſe frequent defeats, but by ſome ſignal inſtances of their politeneſs rendered themſelves amiable to the Spaniards, as his enemies were become hateful to them [z]. At length two deciſive battles, which he won over them, were attended with the retaking of Saguntum, which had been rebuilt by Hannibal. Here he cauſed the Turdetani, who were found there, to be all ſold for ſlaves, for having joined Hannibal againſt that faithful city [a]. We ſhall not repeat here the circumſtances of the death of thoſe two generals; which was like to have quite altered the poſture of affairs, had not the brave Marcius recovered that great loſs by a bold and deſperate act, and with the few troops, which he could gather up, after the loſs of thoſe two battles, ſurpriſed and burnt the Carthaginian camp, which occaſioned, in the confuſion that then reigned, the deaths of thirty-ſeven thouſand of them, beſides near two thouſand more, who were taken priſoners by him [b]. He was ſucceeded by young Scipio, who, though at that time but twenty-four years of age, had been unanimouſly choſen proconſul of Spain, and came thither with a reinforcement of ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe. His wonderful ſucceſs there, the immenſe ſpoil he got at the taking of New Carthage, his ſingular behaviour and continence towards a beautiful female captive, and his generous refuſal of the vaſt ranſom, which her parents offered to him, gained him the affections of the Spaniards to ſuch a degree, that they looked upon him as a demigod, and began every-where to revolt from the Carthaginians [c]. Their generals made ſeveral vain efforts to ſtop the progreſs of this young hero, and were as often defeated by him [d]; as were alſo Mandonius and Indibilis, who had revolted from him [e]: at length, having thus far reduced the Carthaginians, he reſolved on a deſcent into Afric, to oblige them to abandon Spain. The ſucceſs of this expedition being foreign to this Spaniſh hiſtory, except that he actually forced them out of this country, and brought it under the Roman yoke, we ſhall refer our readers to those places, where a full account is given of both [f].

Year of the flood 2793. Before Chriſt 206.

[y] Vol. xvii. paſſim. [z] Ibid. [a] See vol. xii. 214, 246.
[b] Ibid. p. 250, & ſeq. [c] Ibid. p. 259---264. [d] Ibid. p. 272, &c. [e] Ibid.

Stript of its mines and treasures.

THE Romans being thus become masters of this rich and noble country, or at least of a considerable part of it, by the expulsion of the Carthaginians, one of their first cares was, to seize on all its valuable mines, especially those of silver and gold [g], and to strip it of its immense wealth; and how considerable this was, may be guessed by the sketch we shall give in the next note (A), of the prodigious quantities which their prætors, even by the confession of their own authors, carried out of it, and brought into the public, as well as into their own, treasury: but as it would be impossible to enter into a detail of all those transactions that happened during their Roman bondage, without repeating all that has been said in their history, in the foregoing volumes, we must in this, as well as in the subsequent chapters, refer our readers to what has been already said there; and only add here one or two remarkable events, which have not yet been taken notice of, or but lightly touched upon. One of them is the grand embassy, which the Celtes and Spaniards sent out of this country to Alexander the great, to congratulate him upon his Embassy to Alexander.

[f] Vol. xvii. p. 420. See also our chronology of Carthage, from the year 661, to 684. [g] See 1 Maccab. viii. 3, & seq. Liv. Oros. &c.

(A) Thus we are told (1), that Scipio above-named, upon his return to Rome, carried with him fourteen thousand three hundred and forty-two pounds of silver, besides an immense quantity of coin, cloaths, corn, arms, and other valuable things. L. Lentulus is said to have brought away a still much larger treasure, viz. forty-four thousand pounds of silver, and two thousand five hundred and fifty of gold, besides the money which he divided among his soldiery. L. Manlius brought with him twelve hundred pounds of silver, and about thirty of gold. Corn. Lentulus, after having governed the hither Spain two years, brought away one thousand five hundred and fifteen pounds of gold; and of silver two thousand, besides thirty-four thousand five hundred and fifty denarii in ready coin; whilst his collegue brought from further Spain fifty thousand pounds of silver.

What is still more surprizing, is, that these immense sums, amounting in all to one hundred and eleven thousand five hundred and forty-two pounds weight of silver, four thousand and ninety-five his vaſt ſucceſſes, to beg his amity, and that he would ſend proper perſons to adjuſt ſome differences that were amongſt them, that is, in all likelihood, between ſome of their petty kings. This embaſſy, it ſeems, was highly pleaſing to that conqueror, who heard of thoſe nations for the firſt time, and having granted their requeſt, ſent them very honourably home [h]. Oroſius tells us, that the head of this embaſſy was called Maurinus [i].

(1) Livy, decad. 4. lib. i, ii, & iii.

THE next is that noble puſh which was made by the Celtiberians in Luſitania, to ſuppreſs the Roman tyranny, and, if poſſible, to drive them further, if not not quite out of Spain. What their ſucceſs might have been, had not their leader Viriatus, whom Florus calls a ſhepherd, and Oroſius a banditto, been diſpatched by the treachery of Servilius Cæpio, who hired that general's guards to aſſaſſinate him, may be eaſily gueſſed by the diſpatch he had made in croſſing the Durius, Iberus, and Tagus, ſeizing on Gallicia, and ſome other provinces, and putting

[h] Arrian. geſt. Alex. M. lib. vii. [i] Lib. iii. c. 20.

five of gold, beſides coin, and other things of value, were brought away within the ſhort ſpace of nine years; for juſt ſo much time elapſed between the firſt and the laſt of theſe Roman prætors (2); and juſt after they had been as ſeverely fleeced, in all likelihood, by their other friends the Carthaginians. Theſe few inſtances ſhall ſuffice to ſhew, how rich this country muſt then have been, and what an immenſe treaſure it yielded to their conquerors; for though theſe laſt never ſlacked their hands, but kept ſtill on bringing freſh ſupplies from thence, yet we do not find, that it was at all exhauſted. On the contrary, it was this prodigious richneſs of the country that invited the northern nations many centuries after to come and ſeize upon, and drive the Romans out of, it, as we ſhall ſee in ſome ſubſequent chapters.

We are, indeed, told by Strabo, that when the Carthaginians firſt came thither, they found ſilver in ſuch amazing plenty, that their utenſils, and even mangers, were made of it (3); inſomuch that Poſidonius ſaid of this country, that Pluto, the god of riches, had his reſidence in the bowels of it (4). And Pliny mentions ſeveral rich mines of ſilver dug there by the Carthaginians, one of which, called Bebel, from the finder of it, yielded Hannibal three hundred pounds of ſilver per day (5). In a word, moſt antient authors have celebrated this country for its richneſs to ſuch a degree, that it hath only expoſed it the more to the invaſion of foreigners far and near.

(2) Vid. Vaſ. chronic. ab an. urb. 549. ad an. 558. (3) Lib. iii. (4) Ap. eund. ibid. (5). Lib. xxxiii. c. 6.

ting all the Roman colonies to fire and ſword; but his untimely death put an end to all farther oppoſition, it being found then ſo dangerous to head an army againſt ſo powerful and treacherous a nation as the Romans ſhewed themſelves on this occaſion [k]. How thoſe two brave brothers, Mandonius and Indibilis, fared, for daring to oppoſe them ſome time after, need not be here repeated [l], any more than the dreadful cataſtrophe of Numantia [m], Saguntum [n], and ſome other cities and people, for daring to defend their country againſt them. By theſe cruel and treacherous means theſe Roman invaders ſo far ſuppreſſed that noble love of liberty, for which this nation was juſtly famed, that very few attempts were afterwards made for regaining it; and thoſe did prove ſo unſucceſsful, or, to ſpeak more properly, were ſo ſeverely puniſhed, that it quite deterred them from even betraying the leaſt hope or deſire after their antient freedom, till at length they were quite forced to ſubmit to all their laws, cuſtoms, and religion; and, in a word, to be wholly romanized after their own arbitrary will. However, it is plain, that further Spain was not quite ſubdued till the fourth conſulate of Marius, A. U. 652, nor the Celtiberians till five years after, two years after Dolabella had triumphed over the Luſitanians [o]. The reſt is ſaid to be conquered by Auguſtus, as we have formerly hinted.

We ſhall conclude this chapter with a liſt of the Spaniſh prætors, as far as Livy has gone with them, and afterwards of the emperors, under whoſe government Spain continued from Auguſtus to Honorius, in the beginning of whoſe reign the Romans were driven out of it by the northern nations, whoſe hiſtory will follow in due time; by which means the reader will eaſily come at the remainder of the Spaniſh bondage under both, without our being forced to repeat what has been already ſaid in the Roman hiſtory, or anticipating upon what more properly belongs to thoſe of the Goths, Vandals, &c. hereafter; but as we ſhall but barely mention thoſe Spaniſh prætors and emperors, without entering into any further particulars of their reigns, we ſhall give the liſt of them in the following note (B), and ſo paſs over to the Gauls. But, before we [k] Sil. Ital. Oroſ. lib. v. c. 8, & ſeq. Id. ibid. Flor. l. liv.

[l] See before, vol. xvii. p. 428. [m] Vol xii. p. 382,
[n] Vol xvii. p. 326. [o] Oroſ. ubi ſup. Plut. in Mar.

(B) After Scipio above-mentioned had expelled the Carthaginians, Spain was governed by the following prætors, viz.

Hither

we leave Spain, we beg leave to add, that tho' the Romans carried off ſuch immenſe quantities of gold and ſilver out of it, as was hinted in the laſt note, they ſtill left enough behind in it to maintain their numerous armies and colonies, to build great cities, caſtles, forts, and particularly ſchools, and academies, for

Hither Spain by	Further Spain by
L. Lentulus	L. M. Acidinus
Q. Fabius Butæus	Q. M. Thermus
Cato the cenſor	Ap. Cl. Nero
P. Cor. Scipio	Sext. Digitius
C. Flaminius	M. Fulv. Nobilior
M. Bæbius Pamphilus	A. Attil. Serranus
L. Æmil. Paulus	C. Flaminius
M. Fulv. Nobilior	Cn. Man. Vulſo
L. Manlius	C. Catinius
Quint. Criſpinus	C. Calpurn. Piſo
A. Terent. Varro	P. Sempronius
Q. Fulv. Flaccus	P. Manlius
T. Sempronius	L. Poſthumius
M. Titinius	T. Fonteius Capito
P. Licin. Craſſus	M. Cornel. Scipio
Ap. Claud. Cento	Not mentioned by Livy
P. Fur. Philo	Cn. Servil. Cæpio
Cn. Fab. Buteo	M Mantienus
M. Jun. Pænus	Sp. Lucretius.

After them the ſenate reduced the country under one prætor, in the conſulſhips of P. Licin. Craſſus, C. Caſſ. Longinus, an. urb. 583. which continued ſo only under the two following ones: viz.

C. Marcellus
Publ. Fonteius.

After whom it was again divided, and governed by

Cn. Fulvius	C. Licinius Nerva

Thus far Livy; and from this time, viz. A. U. 701, Spain became a conſular province, under the conſulſhip of Q. Fulvius and T. Annius; and was governed by them, and their proconſuls and proprætors, as we learn from Florus and Oroſius.

The emperors are as follow:

1. Julius Cæſar	9. Vitellius
2. Auguſtus	10. Veſpaſian
3. Tiberius	11. Titus
4. Caligula	12. Domitian
5. Claudius	13. Nerva
6. Nero	14. Trajan
7. Galba	15. Adrian
8. Otho	16. Antoninus Pius

all kind of learning and exerciſes; to which we may add many other ſtately edifices, which were there reared by prætors, conſuls, and eſpecially by their emperors; all which ſerved either to allure the Spaniards to the Roman yoke, or to deter them from ſhaking it off.

17. M. Aurelius
18. Commodus
19. Pertinax
20. Julian
21. Severus
22. Caracalla
23. Macrinus
24. Heliogabalus
25. Alexander
26. Maximinus
27. Balbinus
28. Gordianus
29. Philip
30. Decius
31. Gallus
32. Æmilianus
33. Valerianus
34. Gallienus
25. Claudius II.
36. Quintilius
37. Aurelianus
38. Tacitus
39. Florianus
40. Probus
41. Carus
42. Numerianus
43. Carinus
44. Dioclefian
45. Galerius
46. Conſtantine
47. His three ſons
48. Julian II.
49. Jovian
50. Valentinian
51. Valens
52. Gratian
53. Theodoſius
54. Arcadius
55. Honorius

CHAP. XI.

The antient ſtate of the Gauls, to their conqueſt by Julius Cæſar, and from thence to the irruption of the Franks.

SECT. I.

The origin of the Gauls, and extent of their country.

Their origin, names, &c.

THE Gauls were certainly deſcended from the Celtes or Gomerians, as has been fully ſhewn in ſome former volumes [a], or, to ſpeak more properly, were the ſame people,

[a] See vol. i. p. 467, & vol. v. p. 476.

PART of IRELAND
PART OF GREAT BRITAIN
GERMAN OCEAN
BRITISH OCEAN
Streights of Britain
AQUITAN
OCEAN ANCIENT GAUL
PT. OF SPAIN
PART OF GREAT GERMANY
PART OF GERMANY
HELVETIA
GALLIA CISALPINA
LIGUSTIC SEA
GULF OF GAUL
MEDITERRANEAN SEA
ADRIATICK SEA
HETRURIA
TUSCIA
CORSICA
Pyreenes M.
Jura M.
Mount Adula
Vogesus M.
Cevenna M.
Gebenna M.
Alpes Maritimæ
Alpes Tridentinæ
Alpes Penninæ
Alpes Graiæ
Rhine R.
Rhone R.
Thames R.
Loire R.
Garonne R.
Seine R.
Meuse R.
Moselle R.
Po R.
Tiber R.
Arno R.
Adige R.
Tesin R.
Oglio R.
Mincio R.
Lake Acronius
Lake Lemanus
Lake Benacus
Lake Verbanus
Lake Larius
Lake Sebinus
Lake Gardanus
London
Venta
Villa Faustini
Antona fl.
Dubris
Novus Portus
Portus Iccius
Gesoriacum
Morini
Toxandri
Menapii
Advatici
Nervii
Atrebates
Nemetacum als Nemetodunna
Namon
Advatica
Fanis Tungrorum
Ambiani
Silva Arduenna
Augusta Trevirorum
Treviri
Augusta Vero
Menduorum
Velocasses
Bellovaci
Suessones
Rotomagus
Suessio
Durocortorum
Lexovii
Noviomagus als Lexium
Biducasse
Unelli
Biducassium
Sequana
Jamorbrina
Piduna
Jarnia
Alaunium
Cosedia
Sociatonum
Ingena
Abrincatui
Medu ana Eburovices
Parisii
Bibrax
Catalaunum
Matrona R.
Lutetia
Metiosedum
Melodunum
Diablindi
Aulerci
Medio lanium
Tullum Leuci
Tricasses
Augustomana Tricassium
Agendicum
Senones
Cenomani
Vellaunodunum
Galabrum als Aureliam
Carnutes
Mandubii
Cæsarodunum Turones
Antisiodorum
Alesia
Andes
Condivientum
Nannetes
Dariorigum
Vindana Porto
Veneticæ Insulæ
Ligeris R.
Curiosolitæ Carjosuelites
Veneti
Osismii
Brivates
Uxantos I.
Gobæum Promont
Aletum
Portus Aliticanus
Organium
Rhedones
Condate
Aquitani
Pictones
Pictavium
Portus Santonum
Santones
Ratiastum
Mediolanum
Lemovices
Lemovicum
Arverni
Arvernæ Forum
Segusianorum
Augustomenetum
Vellauni et Petrocorii
Petroco rii
Gergovia
Bituriges
Avaricum
Argantomagus
Noviomagus
Antros I
Burdegala
Duranius R.
Vienna R.
Cosio
Oldus R.
Deveona als Divona
Vasates
Cadurci
Aginnum
Uxellodunum
Tarbelli
Lacoratum
Elusates
Elusa
Aquæ Tarbellæ
Atturus R.
Tolosa
Tolosates
Auscii
Tarbe
Aquæ Onesiæ
Benehamus
Convenæ
Lugdunum Convenarum
Carcaso
Narbo Martius
Volcæ Tectosages
Volcæ Arecomci
Nemausus
Luteverum
Ataxe R.
Agatha
Arelate
Illiberis
Veneris Fanum
Helvii
Cubi
Noviodunum
Bilbracte
Augustodunum
Aedui
Boii
Matisco
Segusiani
Allobroges
Vienna
Lugdunum
Segalauni
Valentia
Vocontii
Cavares
Arausio
Avenio
Druentia R.
Aquæ Sextiæ
Salyi
Massilia
Tela Martius
Olbia
Antipolis
Glanateva
Vintium
Forum Julii
Vicea
Ligauria
Isara R.
Rhone R.
Tricorii
Segusiani
Taurinum
Turin
Novara
Milan
Cremona
Placentia
Modena
Bologna
Faventia
Forum Julii
Aquileia
Aquileia R.
Tagliamento R.
Piave R.
Adige R.
Mincio R.
Oglio R.
Tesin R.
Adda R.
Mantua R.
Padua
Vicenza
Brescia
Como
Bergamo
Insubres
Cenomani
Veneti
City of the Gauls
Langrois
Lingones
Rauraci
Rauracorum
Virodunum
Argenniaria
Sequani
Vesontio
Dubis R.
Arar R.
Saone R.
Leuci
Tribocci
Nemetes
Vangiones
Mediomatrici
Divodurum
Borbetomagus
Noviomagus
Argentoratum
Magunnacu Manus R.
Lonus R.
Bonna
Colonia Agrippina
Ubii Ubiorum agri
Novesium
Geldubæ
Sicambri
Vetera
Luppia
Luppia R.
Alisa R.
Fulda R.
Luppia R.
Lata R.
Batavorum I.
Batavodurum
Arenacum
Cannefates
Frisii majores
Chauci ats
Chauci minores
Amisia R.
Chamavi
Agrivari
Bructeri
Ocean Germanicus
Renus
Inferior Germania
Superior Germania
Ocean Germanicus
Ocean Britannicus
Streights of Britain
Ocean Gallicus
Ocean Aquitanicus
Ocean Cantabricus
Ocean Hispanicus
Ocean Lusitanicus
Ocean Atlanticus
Ocean Britannicus
Ocean Germanicus
Ocean Gallicus
Ocean Aquitanicus
Ocean Cantabricus
Ocean Hispanicus
Ocean Lusitanicus
Ocean Atlanticus

J. Wheatley Sculpt.

people, under a different and more modern name, given them, in all probability, by ſome of their neighbours, whilſt they ſtill retained their primitive one of Gomerai, or deſendents of Gomer, as thoſe ſtill do, who retain their antient language in its purity, eſpecially the northern Welſh. Other names they were known by, ſuch as they either ſeem to have aſſumed upon ſome particular occaſions, or ſuch as other nations thought fit to give them; of all which the reader may ſee a ſpecimen in the following note (A). The name therefore of Gaul, Galli, and Gallia, is not only a foreign one, but of a recenter date, as are likewiſe thoſe other appellatives, by which Julius Cæſar [b], and other antient authors, diſtinguiſh one part of their country from another. Such are thoſe, for inſtance, of Ciſalpina or Citerior, Tranſalpina or Ulterior, and Subalpina, which was ſituate

[b] Comment. l. i. c. 1, &c.

(A) Of the firſt kind we may reaſonably reckon all thoſe, which are of Celtic extraction; ſuch as thoſe of Celte and Gaul, which ſignify brave and warlike, Armoric, maritim, and the like. Even that of Belga, which ſignifies fierce and quarrelſome, might have been given to that canton by their brethren and neighbours, on account of their retaining their original fierceneſs, from which the reſt had poliſhed themſelves by their commerce and intercourſe with other nations; thoſe of Cis, Trans, and Subalpine, from their ſituation on either ſide of the Alps; that of Celto-Scythians from their being neighbours to, and intermixed with, that nation; that of Celtiberians to thoſe that were ſeated on the other ſide the Pyrenees.

As they ſpread themſelves, by degrees, farther and wider from each other, and their original tongue ſplit itſelf into a great number of dialects, their appellatives became ſo numerous, and ſo vaſtly different from it, that it is with great difficulty they can be traced to their fountain-head. We ſhall therefore venture no farther, than upon ſuch ones as carry a kind of certainty of their extract, and refer ſuch of our readers, who are curious of ſuch etymons, to the authors quoted in the margin (1). He may likewiſe read that vaſt variety of names in Strabo, Ptolemy, Mela, Cæſar's commentaries, Diodorus Siculus, and other antient authors.

(1) Bochart. phaleg. Scalig. theſ. temp. Cluver. introd. Pezron. antiq. des Celtes. Rowland. Mona antiq. Pelloutier hiſt. des Celtes. Hortoman. Franco-Gall. & al. mult.

ſituate at the foot of the Alps [c]. The inhabitants however were formerly better known by the name of Celtes [d], and the country, in the whole, by that of Celto-Gallia [e], of which name we have given, in a former volume [f], the beſt etymon we could find. Cæſar afterwards diſtinguiſhed the whole country under the three following names, viz. Belgia, Aquitania, and Gallia Propria, or that which, according to him, was chiefly inhabited by the Celtes or Gauls (B). This laſt was further diſtinguiſhed into Comata, whoſe inhabitants

[c] Plut. in Cæſ. & Marcel. Plin. hiſt. l. xvi. c. 11. Strab. Mela, Cluver. & al. [d] See Pauſan. in Attic. c. 3. [e] Ptol. l. ii. c. 7. Diod. Sic. l. xxxix. & alib. [f] Vol. v. p. 476.

(B) His words are theſe (2): "The whole country of Gaul "is divided into three parts, the firſt of which is inhabited by "the Belgæ, the ſecond by the Aquitani, and the third by thoſe "whom we call Gauls, but, in their own tongue, are called "Celtes. All theſe have their language, manners, and cuſtoms "different." The meaning of which words is generally taken to be, that he ſpeaks here of thoſe parts, which remained as yet unconquered by the Romans, and which retained ſtill their antient language and cuſtoms; whereas thoſe which were already ſubdued, had altered both by that time, to ſuch a degree, as to appear to him different from the reſt; ſuch was, for inſtance, that part, which was called Togata, from their having taken up the Roman dreſs, and, in all likelihood, ſeveral other of their cuſtoms, and, by their intercourſe with them, might have very much altered their dialect from the reſt.

One thing is very remarkable, that Cæſar makes this province, which he likewiſe calls Ciſalpina, to begin at the foot of the Alps, and to have extended itſelf along the Po, as far as the Adriatic ſea, and the Rubicon (3); whereas Strabo, who quotes his commentaries (4), and Diodorus Siculus (5), plainly intimate, that the Gauls or Celtes inhabited all thoſe parts from the Alps to the Pyrenees; and we ſhall ſhew by-and-by, that they extended even beyond the latter, and poſſeſſed the greateſt part of Spain and Portugal.

However, the moſt that can be inferred from the paſſage quoted out of Cæſar, is, that he found Gaul ſo divided at his coming habitants wore long hair; Brachata, from their wearing breeches; and Togata, from the Roman toga being worn there. We ſhall endeavour to ſettle the limits of each of theſe in the following paragraph, and refer our readers, for the other names by which it was occaſionally diſtinguiſhed; ſuch as that of Armorica, from its lying along the ſea-coaſts; of Aquitania, from its abundance of water; Cis and Tranſpadana, and ſome others; to the account given of them at the entrance of the Roman hiſtory above quoted [g]. All that needs be added here is, that the words Celte and Gaul, ſignifying, in the antient language, brave and warlike, that of Belga, fierce or quarrelſome, that of Armoric, maritim; theſe names were, in all probability, given them by other nations. As for thoſe of Cimmerians, Cimbrians, Cumbrians, and the like, they are plainly a corruption of their original one of Gomerians or Gomerai, as thoſe of Galatians and Celto-Galatians were of Celto-Gaul.

(2) Cæſ. bell. Gall. l. i. c. 1. (3) Bell. Gall. l. iv. Mel. l. iii. c. 2. (4) Strab. l. v. (5) Diod. Sic. l. v.

As for the Galatia or Celto-Græcia of Aſia Minor, in which theſe European Gauls were ſettled by Nicomedes, who had called them thither to his aſſiſtance, we ſhall, as much as we can, refer our readers to what has been ſaid of them in ſome preceding volumes [h], to avoid unneceſſary repetitions. All that need be added here is, that this province had Cappadocia on the eaſt; Bithynia on the weſt; Pamphylia on the ſouth; and the Euxine on the north. Here St. Paul founded a church, to which he directed that epiſtle, which is ſtill known by the name of the epiſtle to the Galatians, and was written to reduce them from thoſe Jewiſh obſervances, to which ſome falſe teachers of the circumciſion had debauched them, and to confirm them in the true goſpel liberty, which had been preached to them. We know little elſe of theſe Galatians, beſides what has been ſaid in the two volumes laſt quoted, except that we read in the ſecond book of the Maccabees of a ſignal overthrow, which the Jews gave them in the province of Babylon, coming thither; and that, by this time, their language, manners, &c. were grown very different, though originally one and the ſame, as they were originally one and the ſame people.

[g] Vol. xi. p. 252.

[h] See vol. ix. ad initium.

bylon, where theſe, with a ſmall army of eight thouſand men, defeated and killed an hundred and twenty thouſand of the former. The text ſays nothing further concerning this ſignal victory, nor about the time in which it happened; ſo that we are left in the dark, whether it ſpeaks there of the Galatians ſettled in the province we are ſpeaking of, or, which is more probable, of the Gauls themſelves, who had by this time, if not long before, ſpread themſelves all over Aſia; for it muſt be obſerved here, that the name of Galatai was indifferently given, eſpecially by Greek authors, to the one and to the other. But to return to the antient Gaul:

The extent of Gaul.

WE have already ſhewn in the hiſtory of the antient Celtes [i], that they were poſſeſſed of the greateſt part of Europe. There is ſcarce a province, or even a corner of it, in which they have not left ſome evident monument of themſelves, either in the names of cities and towns, cantons and provinces, or of their rivers, lakes, mountains, promontories, and ſuch-like. In every part of it, where either the Phœnicians, Carthaginians, or Romans, ſent their invading bands, there they are affirmed by antient writers to have found the Celtes or Gauls already ſettled [k]: not that they do expreſly mention them by thoſe two names, for we have juſt obſerved on what account they had ſeveral other appellatives given them, but yet ſuch as plainly appear, from the conformity of their language, religion, cuſtoms, &c. to have meant one and the ſame nation. However, we will not venture to ſay, that they were all of the ſame Celtic extract, that inhabited thoſe parts of Europe, either towards the ſea-ſide, ſuch as Spain, Portugal, and the French coaſts, along the Mediterranean, or towards the north-eaſt, where they ſeem to have been ſo blended with the Scythians and Sarmatians, that it is next to impoſſible to aſſert their boundaries on that ſide. All that we pretend to conclude from thoſe antient writers, who have written moſt clearly and knowingly on this head, is, that the Celtes or Gauls plainly appear to have been the firſt, that peopled and poſſeſſed themſelves of, or claimed a dominion over, them. After the general diſperſion, that followed the flood, other nations might probably come afterwards, ſome by ſea, others by land, and have been permitted to ſettle amongſt

[i] Vol. v. p. 476.

[k] Vid. Diod. Sic. l. v. Lucian. l. vi. Sil. Ital. l. iii. Appian. Ptol. & al.

amongſt them, there being more want of inhabitants than of room in thoſe early days, and in regions ſo remote from the place of their firſt migrations, as we have formerly hinted at the beginning of this univerſal hiſtory, and elſewhere [l].

Gauls in Spain and Portugal.

THE greateſt difficulty, as we hinted in the laſt chapter, is to prove the Gauls, or Celtes rather, to have been ſettled in Spain and Portugal before any other nation; firſt, becauſe they were here called by the name of Iberians, or, at moſt, Celtiberians, from which ſome are apt to conclude the former to have been the name of the firſt inhabitants of that part, and the latter to have been given to the Celtes, who came over the Pyrenees, and ſettled amongſt them. And, ſecondly, becauſe Varro [m] mentions no leſs than five different nations, that were found there, when the Romans firſt invaded that country. Theſe were, according to him, the Iberians, Perſians (C), Phœnicians, Celtes, and Carthaginians (D). As to the firſt, we have formerly ſhewn, [l] Vol. i. p. 490, & vol. v. p. 476. [m] Plin. nat. hiſt. l. iii. c. 1. Vide & Lucian. Appian. Diodor. &c. ubi ſup.

(C) As it doth not appear from any antient author, that the Perſians ſent any colonies into this country, it is ſomewhat difficult to gueſs, who theſe were, whom our author mentions with the other four. If we may be permitted to offer our conjecture, the name being of Celtic extract, and ſignifying ſevered or divided, it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that it was given to ſome tribe or canton of this nation, on account of their rupture or difference from the reſt, either in their cuſtoms, laws, and ſuch-like, or for retaining their old ones, whilſt theſe had altered theirs, in complaiſance to the other nations they were intermixed with.

(D) We are not without ſome collateral proofs of this. The Phœnicians, as diſtinct from the Carthaginians, were the antient Tyrians (6); and theſe are known to have ſent a colony, and to have built a famous temple to Hercules, in the iſle of Gades, and to have founded ſeveral conſiderable cities in Spain (7). And as to the Carthaginians, who were neareſt neighbours to it, we have

(6) Strab. l. i. ſub. init. Mel. l. iii. c. 6. See alſo vol. ii. p. 386. 393. paſſ. & (I), (K) P. 730.

(7) See vol. xvi. p. 558, 628.

ſhewn, that the word Iberian ſignified, in the antient Celtic, any people, country, or place, that was ſituate over, or on the other ſide of, a ſea, river, ridge of mountains, and the like [n]; ſo that theſe might be naturally called Iberians, on account of their ſituation over the Pyrenees, by thoſe that lived on this ſide; and Celtiberians, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe nations they were blended and intermixed with there. As to what is objected out of Varro, we have had occaſion to hint, in the hiſtory of antient Spain, that neither the Tyrian or Phœnician colonies, nor thoſe of the Carthaginians, came thither till a long time after the Celtes or Gauls had been ſettled there, and peopled a great part of that country. All this ſeems ſelf-evident, firſt, from the conſentient teſtimony of antient authors, the greateſt part of whom expreſly affirm it [o], and make theſe inhabitants to be of the ſame extract with thoſe, that filled the hither parts of Europe, to all whom they give the ſame common name of Celtes and Gauls, and ſometimes the more antient one of Cymmerians and Cymbrians [p]. And, ſecondly, from thoſe traces and monuments they have left in almoſt every canton and province of that country; ſuch as the names of ſeas, rivers, mountains, cities, and the like, all which are manifeſtly of Celtic extraction.

In Italy. ITALY cannot be ſuppoſed to have been long unpoſſeſſed by them, if they were not the firſt peoplers of it, concerning which we ſhall refer our readers to what has been ſaid on that head in ſome former volumes [q]. It was indeed too fair a ſpot not to invite ſuch a warlike and populous nation thither, had it been ever ſo well peopled beforehand; but, we think, we have made it at leaſt very probable, that they came thither ſooner than any other; for if the Humbri or Umbri really were, as they are affirmed by many authors to have been [r], the aborigines or antienteſt people of Italy, and they were deſcended have ſeen likewiſe, in a former volume, how early they invaded and ſettled in it (8).

[n] Vol. v. p. 469, & ſeq. [o] Herodot, l. ii. c. 33. l. iv. c. 49, & alib. Ephor. apud Strab. l. iv. Vide & Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. l. i. c. 4. [p] Strab. ubi ſup. Sicul. l. v. & al. [q] See vol. v. p. 476, & vol. xi. p. 256. [r] Flor. l. i. c. 17. Plin. Dio Halicar. & al.

(8) Vol. xvii. p. 22, & alib.

deſcended from the Celtes (E), as their name, and other concurring circumſtances, ſeem plainly to intimate [s], then it will ſcarcely be doubted, that they muſt have entered and peopled that country very early, when we recollect what dreadful devaſtations the Hetrurians made among them, and how many hundreds of their towns and cities they deſtroyed in that invaſion, which they made upon them, and for the further particulars of which, we refer our readers to a former volume [t].

We ſhall ſhortly come to ſpeak of the Germans, and other northern nations, as well as of the iſles of Great Britain, Ireland, Iceland, and others leſs conſiderable, all which do plainly appear to have been firſt diſcovered and peopled by the Gauls or Celtes. As for the Germans, they were ſo like the Celtes in their language, religion, and cuſtoms, except, as Strabo obſerves [u], their retaining ſome of their original fierceneſs, which was doubtleſs owing to their vicinity and intermixture with the Scythians and Sarmatians, that they ſeem to have been one and the ſame nation; and this our author thinks to be the occaſion of their being called Germans (F). We ſhall find a much properer etymon for that name in the ſequel. What made us mention it here, was as a proof, that Germany was part of the Celtic or Gauliſh territories, at leaſt as

[s] Compare vol. ii. p. 246, and vol. iv. p. 416, v. p. 476. and vol. xi. p. 266. [t] Vol. [u] Lib. iv. & vii.

(E) Pliny derives their name from the Greek ὄμβρος, which ſignifies a ſhower; becauſe they had been diſlodged from their country by a flood, occaſioned by violent ſhowers (9). But this etymon is far-fetched and forced, unleſs we will admit, that it carried the memory of their eſcaping the univerſal deluge with it; in which caſe it muſt be ſuppoſed, that they came early into thoſe parts, and ſet up ſome monuments of their deliverance there. But as to the name of Umbrians or Humbrians, it ſeems rather a ſoftening of the original one of Gomerians or Cymbrians.

(F) The word Germanus was that by which the Romans diſtinguiſhed brothers by the ſame father and mother from thoſe which were only by the one or the other, whom they termed uterini or conſanguinei. And though the etymon itſelf be uncertainly falſe with reſpect to the Germans, yet it ſhews the great affinity, which that author obſerved between them and the Gauls.

(9) Nat. hiſt. l. iii. c. 4.

as far as the Rhine [w], if not as far as the Danube [x], though, as we have already obſerved, all that inhabited the countries between theſe two great rivers, were very much intermixed with the Scythians, Sarmatians, and other northern (G) nations. All that needs be added here is, that the Helveti, Rhætii, Norici, and Pannonians, of whom we have given an accountin ſome former volumes [y], are ſometimes called Celtes, and ſometimes Gauls, indifferently; and that their troops were ſtill diſtinguiſhed by the name of Celtic and Gauliſh legions in Aurelian's time [z], as were alſo thoſe that lived along the foot of, or upon, the Alps themſelves.

UPON the whole then it appears evidently, that the antient Gauls or Celtes were poſſeſſed of the far greateſt part of Europe; that the Mediterranean on the ſouth, the Atlantic ocean on the weſt, the Britiſh and northern on the north-weſt, were the boundaries of their country; and that they extended towards the north as far as Scandinavia, Polonia, and Muſcovy; though theſe three nations, as well as thoſe that lived betwixt the Rhine and Danube, were intermixed with a multitude of other people, of the greateſt part of whom we know but little, except their names. And thus much may ſuffice for the extent and limits of antient Gaul. How they came afterwards to be reduced within that narrow compaſs, in which we find them when the Romans firſt invaded them, may be eaſily gathered from what has been already ſaid in the Roman hiſtory, and will further appear in the ſequel of this.

How they came firſt into Europe.

IN the mean time it will not be improper, before we come to fix them according to that epocha, to enquire, how this antient nation came at firſt to ſpread itſelf, as we have ſhewn they did, all over Europe; that is, whether they advanced by gradual ſteps from the place of their firſt diſperſion, which we formerly fixed in Phrygia [a]; or whether they came thither

[w] Diodor. l. xxxviii & ſeq. Ptol. l. ii. c. 9. [x] Tacit. German. c. 1. Ptol. l. viii. Plin. nat. hiſt. l. iv. c. 12. [y] See vol. xi, & xii. [z] Zoſ. l. li. c. 2. Liv. l. xxi. c. 30, & ſeq. Polyb. l. iii. Plin. nat. hiſt. l. iii. c. 20, & alib. [a] Vol. i. p. 467, thither by ſea, and, landing at firſt on ſome of the Italic or Mediterranean ſhores, dilated themſelves from thence as far and wide as we find they did. Either hypotheſis has its difficulties. If that of Beroſus and his followers could be credited, that Gomer's ſons ſettled themſelves in ſeveral parts of Spain and Italy ſo early as an hundred and forty-years after the flood, the gradual migrations will hardly be thought quick enough to have extended themſelves to ſuch vaſt tracts of ground in ſo ſhort a time; and it will be more natural to ſuppoſe, that they ſailed thither from Leſſer Aſia. But then it will be equally difficult to imagine, how they could, in the ſhort ſpace of an hundred and forty-two years, become ſuch expert mariners, as this ſuppoſes them to have been; and, if we allow them a longer ſpace for making themſelves ſo far maſters of navigation, they may be as reaſonably thought to have expanded themſelves thus far by ſuch gradual migrations, as either want of room, curioſity, or deſire of change, may be ſuppoſed to have led them to. That they began betimes to navigate, or to coaſt at leaſt, not only the Mediterranean, Atlantic, and other ſeas, but even on the main ocean, we ſhall preſently have occaſion to ſhew, when we come to ſpeak of their arts, commerce, &c. But it is ſcarcely to be believed, all things conſidered, that their rude ſkill in this art could bring them thither ſo ſoon as the others could get thither by land. However, ſince ſome antient authors have affirmed, that the firſt inhabitants of Spain came thither by ſea, ſome ſay from Aſia, and others from Afric, the moſt reaſonable opinion ſeems to be that, which allows theſe to have indeed come thither from thoſe parts, and to have ſettled in thoſe countries, though not till ſome conſiderable time after they had been diſcovered and peopled by thoſe, who came thither by land, and by gradual migrations. And this will further account, both for that great variety of names, dialects and cuſtoms, which ſuch an intermixture muſt, of neceſſity, be ſuppoſed to produce, and for the loſs of that whole country in proceſs of time, when the Gauls were partly driven out of it, and the reſt ſubdued by their conquerors, as we have ſeen in the laſt chapter.

(G) Such were the Saxons, Franks, Sicambri, Burgundi, Quadi, Goths, Hunns, Baſtarnæ, the Rhœtii, Norici, Pannonians, Mœſians, Thracians, aud many more, whoſe names and ſituation the reader will find in the ſeveral maps at the head of this hiſtory; and for the deſcription and particulars of which we refer him to the general index at the end of this work.

THE ſame fate having attended them, not only in Italy, but likewiſe on this ſide of the Alps, where the provinces of Noricum, Helvetia, Rhœtia, and the whole tract, which lies between thoſe mountains and the lake of Geneva, were taken taken from them, as we have ſeen in the Roman hiſtory [b], the whole Gauliſh extent came then to reach no farther than from that lake to the Pyrenees, having ſtill the Mediterranean on the ſouth, the Rhine on the north, and the Britiſh chanel on the weſt; for, by this time, the Britiſh and other iſlands were detached from the inlands, and lived under princes of their own, though, in matters of religion, they ſtill kept a kind of conformity with, if not rather a kind of juriſdiction over them, as we ſhall ſee under the next article. This was the ſtate of Gaul, and theſe its limits, when Julius Cæſar firſt came into it, as we have ſeen in a former volume, where we likewiſe took notice of ſeveral other changes, which were made in their boundaries, and new diviſions of their provinces and diſtricts by the conquering Romans, particularly by Auguſtus, and to which we beg leave to refer our readers, to avoid repetitions and prolixity [c].

The boundaries of Gaul ſtreightened.

For the ſame reaſon we think it ſuperfluous to ſay any thing here of its natural or artificial rarities, or to ſpend any longer time in deſcribing a country ſo near, and ſo well known to us. We have deſcribed its antient ſtate in a former volume [d], and there given an account of its moſt conſiderable rivers, lakes, mountains, &c. We have there likewiſe taken notice of the fertility of the country, and how early it had begun to be cultivated and improved, even as far back as the times of Mercury, who is affirmed by a learned modern, and not without ſome ſubſtantial proofs, to have reigned in Gaul, when it was in its full extent, and, by his wholeſome laws, and indefatigable pains to promote its trade and commerce into foreign countries, to have raiſed the Gauliſh nation to a ſurpriſing height of power and glory [e]. This reign hath indeed been very much ſuſpected by ſome other authors, who have written ſince [f], as fabulous and imaginary; but we do not think it as yet confuted by any thing that has been offered either againſt it, or in favour of the Cteſian hiſtory, which, we hope, we have, notwithſtanding all its many and learned advocates, ſufficiently confuted in our Aſſyrian hiſtory [g]. But, waving that intricate and controverted point, it

Its fertility, &c.

[b] Vol. xiii. p. 407, & ſeq. [c] Vol. xi. p. 258, & ſeq. 575, & ſeq. & alib. paſſ. & vol. xiii. p. 33, & ſeq. p. 374, & ſeq & alib.
[d] vol. v. p. 397, & ſeq. [e] vol. v. p. 403, & ſeq.
[f] Fourmont. Vide & Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. ſub indic. auctor. Bedford. chronol. & al. [g] vol. iv. p. 214, & ſeq.

is generally allowed, that this country was in a flouriſhing condition, when the Romans firſt invaded it, as any in Europe, and their lands, commerce arts, &c. cultivated and improved by its induſtrious inhabitants, in a manner altogether anſwerable to its excellent ſituation and climate (H), as we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew in the ſequel.

(H) The antient Celts indeed, and thoſe Gauls, who were intermixed with the Scythians, did ſtill obſerve their old cuſtom of living in tents and waggons, or at moſt in huts, built juſt to laſt them one year, after which they removed into freſh quarters; and as they lived chiefly on the fruits of the earth, and the milk of their cattle, they either wholly neglected agriculture, and all property in lands, or, at moſt, built themſelves a little houſe or cottage big enough for their family, in the midſt of as much ground as they thought fit to cultivate for that year. The Germans and Suevi are obſerved by Julius Cæſar to have followed the ſame cuſtom in his days; who adds, that it was one of the chief taſks of their yearly magiſtrates to aſſign them ſuch lands, according to the exigence of their families; and, as ſoon as the year was over, they removed into ſome other country (10).

Hence came the name and uſe of cantons: every tribe had a canton aſſigned to it, which was governed by its own magiſtrates, who were choſen from among them. This cuſtom, being derived from the antient Celtes, had, it plainly appears, ſpread itſelf all over Europe, and beyond (11). The Romans called thoſe cantons pagi, which took up more or leſs ground, according to the largeneſs of the tribe; and as ſoon as it was parcelled out among their families, each of them built a cot in the centre of his own ground; ſo that there were not any two to be ſeen contiguous to one another (12).

Even when they came to live in cities, as the Gauls did as ſoon as any others in Europe, if we except perhaps Italy and Spain, they neither walled nor fortified them, alledging, that ſuch ſtrong places ſerved only to abate the courage and fierceneſs of its inhabitants, and often proved the occaſion of their being brought into ſlavery (13). Whenever therefore they found themſelves invaded, they all marched out under their leaders, and engaged the enemy in open field, or, if they found themſelves unequal to the fight, they retired into either woods, marſhes, or other places of difficult acceſs, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

(10) l. i. c. 14. l. iv. c. 1. l. vi. c. 22. (11) Idem, l. i. c. 12, 37. Ammian. Marcellin. l. xxxi. c. 3. Strab. l. iv. Polyb. l. ii (12) Iidem ibid. Vide & Diod Halicarn. l. i. Sil. Ital. l. xv. & ſeq. Appian. Diodor. & al. (13) Tacit. l. iv. Bell. Gall. l. iii. c. 29, l. 4. c. 19, & ſeq. & alib.

HOWEVER, it muſt be obſerved here, that theſe improvements were of much later date than their firſt ſettlements; and that, if we except Spain, Italy, and the ſouthern parts of France, the reſt of their territories were too cold and diſcouraging to a nation that chiefly delighted in war, hunting, and ſuch-like exerciſes, and at a time when agriculture was, as it were, in its infancy; and it is moſt probable, that the fruitfulneſs of the warmer climates firſt put the northern inhabitants upon endeavouring to ſupply by art the defects of their ſoil and climate; for even in the times of the Roman emperors, we do not find, that they had either vines, olives, or any other fruit or grain, except corn [h]; and moſt authors, who have written on this ſubject, ſeem to attribute it wholly to the extreme cold to which they were expoſed. It is indeed very likely that thoſe authors, being uſed to warmer climates, have ſomewhat exaggerated the coldneſs of theſe, which experience ſhews are nothing ſo ſevere as they have repreſented them [i]; but it is, at the ſame time, far from improbable, that they are become much warmer than they were in thoſe antient times, partly by deſtroying a vaſt number of foreſts, which ſtagnated the air, and intercepted the warmth of the ſun; by the draining many ſtanding waters, and marſhy grounds; by cheriſhing it with warm manure, and other ſuch improvements, which are obvious to every naturaliſt. The Romans themſelves ſeem to have been ſenſible of this change, though they attributed it to ſome favourable alteration in the poſition of the earth, pretended to have been even foretold by that famous Greek aſtronomer Hipparchus [k]. But however that be, it is plain, that theſe countries are ſo far from being ſo conſtantly covered with ice and ſnow, and their great rivers from being always ſo hard frozen, as to ſerve them, inſtead of bridges, for croſſing whole armies over them in their winter excurſions, that we look upon it now as a kind of wonder, whenever any of them chance to be frozen at any ſuch rate.

Climate grown warmer.

SECT

[h] Excerpt. ex Appian. de Celt. Var. de re ruſtic. l. i. Diod. Sic. l. v. Strab. l. iv. Cic. de conſuet. prov. Petron. ſat & al.

[i] Vide auct. ſup. citat. & Herod. l. v. Plin. jun. panegyr. cxii. Amm. Marcel. l. xix. c. 2. l xxxi. c. 9. Ovid. de triſt. eleg. x. ver. 8, & al.

[k] Vide int. al. Columell. de re ruſtic. l. i. c. i.

SECT. II.

The religion of the Gauls.

Their religion derived from the antient Celts.

WE have already given an account of the religion of the antient Celtes in a former volume [a]; and as the Gauls were deſcended from them, as we have ſhewn under the laſt article, it is not to be doubted but it was continued and propagated amongſt them, in the ſame manner and form as they received it from them, till their intercourſe with other nations, or perhaps rather their ſubjection to them, gave birth to thoſe changes and intermixtures, which it afterwards underwent. To come therefore at a tolerable notion of true Gauliſh religion, we ſhould ſeek it among thoſe Gauls, who were leaſt converſant with other people, and had leaſt occaſion or neceſſity of receiving or adopting any thing from them; inſtead of having recourſe to that of the Greeks and Romans, from whom whatever they might, in proceſs of time, borrow, that might cauſe a kind of reſemblance between them, yet originally they differed as much, not only in this, but in almoſt all other reſpects, as black from white. Much worſe have they ſucceeded in this point, who have transformed the Gauliſh deities into Greek and Roman ones, and ſpent a deal of time and pains to no purpoſe, to prove them to have been ſuch [b]; whereas we hope, in the ſequel, to give our readers indubitable arguments of their being of Celtic extraction. For the ſame reaſon we muſt be very wary how we depend too much on thoſe few antient authors, whether Greeks or Romans, who have occaſionally ſpoken of them (A). Theſe few ſcraps they have left us of Gauliſh

[a] Vol. v. p. 405, & ſeq. [b] Sched. bibliot. hiſt. Franc. p. 29. Vide relig. des Gaul, pref. p. 4.

(A) The moſt conſiderable of theſe are, Julius Cæſar, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela, Strabo, and Pliny, and they have written of it in ſuch a looſe, and yet conciſe a manner, that all their fragments put together would hardly amount to three or four pages; and, if theſe pages were to be reduced to their juſt value, would loſe one half of their bulk (1); whether it be, that religion, sufficiently shew, that they knew little of it; and that, even in those points in which they do not clash against one another (B), they have betrayed such a fondness and partiality for their own, as if they had looked upon it as the mother, and the other as the offspring of it. Upon which account Josephus makes no scruple to affirm [c], that all that the best of these had written of the Gauls, was without any foundation, and owing to an itch of saying such things of them, as no man had ever said before, or indeed could say. And, that these authors, have but just copied one another, or only designed to say the same things.

(1) Relig. des Gaul. pref. p. 2.

[c] Cont. Apion. l. i.

(B) According to those quoted in the last note, both the religion and customs of the Gauls are drawn in such colours, as would incline one to suspect them of innate partiality, or rather hatred, to that brave nation. Diodorus, among the rest, makes no scruple to tell us, that their ferocity was in nothing more remarkable than in their religious rites, in which, says he (2), nothing could be more impious, than the victims, which they offered, nor more inhuman, than the manner in which they offered them. And, if we may believe Procopius (3), it seems as if this barbarous custom had been still in vogue some centuries after their embracing christianity.

A modern writer however has been at the pains to quote other authors, to disculpate them from a great deal of this pretended inhumanity (4), and to prove, that they were famed for their virtue and morality. It is well, if both sides have not exaggerated in their turns. But, at the worst, the Gauls do not appear to have much outdone those other nations, who cry out so bitterly against them, in these execrable customs of offering human victims to their gods, of murdering some captives in their auguries, and such-like. On the contrary, we have shewed in some former parts of this work (5), that not only the antient Egyptians, Canaanites, &c. but even the Romans, Carthaginians, and others, made a common practice of them; and thus far their religions bore a resemblance, whichsoever of them were the inventors of these bloody ceremonies, concerning which we have nothing to add to what we have said in the volumes above-quoted.

(2) Histor. l. v. (3) Gother. l. ii. c. 25. (4) Vide Lewis, histor Britan. c. 2. & auctor. ab eo citat. (5) See vol. i. p. 382, (W), p. 566, & alib. pass.

And, in fact, it could hardly be otherwiſe, conſidering that the Gauls made it a conſtant rule never to commit any thing to writing, according to a ſettled maxim amongſt them, that it was more glorious to perform noble deeds, than to ſpeak and write well [d]. Beſides, had they laid more open to their neighbours than they really did (C), yet could theſe have received no great intelligence concerning their religion, ſince their druids or bards made it a main part of their policy to conceal it, at leaſt the moſt conſiderable points of it, even from their own laity, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel.

It will appear ſtill more unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the Gauls received any part of their religion from either the Greeks or Romans, if we conſider, beſides what has been hinted at the end of the laſt note, that their gods and goddeſſes, and their very names, plainly appear to be of Celtic extract, and exactly anſwering ſome eminent part of [d] See Cæſ. comment. l. vi. Salluſt. bell. Catilin.

(C) Joſephus (6) tells us accordingly, that their country was in ſome meaſures, inacceſſible, becauſe nature had fortified them on all ſides with a kind of impenetrable ramparts, ſuch as were the Alps, the Pyrenees, the ocean, and Mediterranean, the Rhine, &c. and with ſtrength and courage to defend their frontiers.

It is no leſs improbable, that their religion was brought in amongſt them, either over any of theſe then inacceſſible mountains, ſeas, or rivers; becauſe, on the one hand, the nations that antiently inhabited over the Pyrenees, Alps, and on the other ſide the Rhine, Danube, &c. were, as we have ſhewn, of the ſame Celtic extract with the Gauls, and had received the ſame religion, laws and cuſtoms, with them from their anceſtors; ſo that we muſt, of courſe, ſuppoſe, that it was ſettled and practiſed amongſt them ſome ages before they either thought of making excurſions out of their own territories, or others, among whom they had, by their conqueſts, colonies, and warlike exploits, injected an univerſal dread, took it into their heads to invade them. On the contrary, it appears from ſome authors, that even the Romans did not make any attempt on them till about four hundred years after they were known to be ſufficiently fixed in their religion, government, and diſcipline (7).

(6) Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 16. Vide relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 3.

(7) Pauſan. in Phocic.

their character (D), not as gods and goddeſſes, but as heroes and heroines, famed for ſome peculiar excellency, and as ſuch deified, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, by the courteſy of their deſcendents; whereas the Greeks and Romans did not adopt, much leſs challenge them for their own, till many ages after, that is, as a learned author ſeems rightly to ſuppoſe [c], not till the former had been ordered by the oracle of Dodona to adopt the deities of the barbarians [f]; and the latter made it a ſtanding law not to invade any nations, till they had previouſly implored the favour of their gods, and promiſed to build them temples, and eſtabliſh their worſhip amongſt them.

WHETHER the Gauls, or antient Celtes rather, were the firſt introducers of theſe hypotheſes, or whether they adopted them in imitation of other antient nations, is a knot too hard for us to untie. However, it is plain they antiently adored a ſupreme Being under the name of Eſus, which ſeems only a corruption of the old Celtic word Dhew, from which the Greeks probably borrowed their Θεὸς and Ζεὺς, and the Romans their Deus. This notion was religiouſly preſerved by their druids; and if they, for worldly ends, or perhaps to pleaſe the people, whoſe impetuous deſire after this novelty they could not reſiſt, ſuffered the worſhip and images of theſe gods to be introduced amongſt them, yet they never looked upon them as any other than inferior deities, whatever the laity might be indulged to do in proceſs of time; but the worſhip of the true God was ſtill carefully kept up, and the oak eſteemed the ſymbol of the Deity, as fire was among the Perſes, of whom we have given an account in a former volume [g]. To frame therefore a right notion of the religion of this, or any other nation, we muſt not judge of it by the corruptions introduced into it by a mad populace, and winked at by the prieſts and philoſophers, but as it was believed and profeſſed by thoſe, who had the care of it. And in this caſe we ſhall perhaps find the moſt material difference between that of the Gauls, and that of the Greeks and Romans, even in thoſe points in

[c] Relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 3. [f] Plin. l. xxviii. c. 3.
[g] See vol. v. p. 31,

(D) This our reader will be beſt able to judge of, by turning to the fourth ſection, under the note (L), to which we refer, to avoid needleſs repetitions.

in which they ſeem moſt to agree, we mean, the worſhip of the ſame gods, with reſpect to the different characters which they gave, and ideas they entertained of them, the latter ſeeming calculated to ſooth the moſt inordinate paſſions, and authorize the worſt of crimes, and the former rather quite oppoſite to it; and this is what the modern author laſt quoted has taken no ſmall pains to ſhew in two main inſtances, viz. from the contrary notions which theſe entertained of their gods, and from the moral doctrines of their druids. It is indeed no hard matter to imagine how the religion and precepts of Noah (and theſe were free enough from all idolatry, and the ſuperſtitious traſh, which crept in afterwards among his deſcendents) ſhould be preſerved for a conſiderable time in the family of Japheth, upon which that patriarch had pronounced and intailed a peculiar bleſſing [h]; but we cannot be ſo ſanguine in favour of thoſe druids, as to believe with that author, that they preſerved them ſo pure among themſelves during ſuch a ſeries of ages, as he ſeems to ſuppoſe. If they did, they were guilty of a very ſhameful remiſſneſs and condeſcenſion to the laity, in ſuffering them to run themſelves into ſuch vile idolatries, horrid ſuperſtitions deteſtable rites, and corruption of principles and morals, as they muſt be owned to have done, in ſpite of all falſe gloſſes, that have been uſed to palliate their degeneracy, or the ſuppoſition of their having been too much miſrepreſented by Greek and Latin authors. We have, on the contrary, ſhewn in a former volume [i], that the antient Celtes, even in the times of their primitive ſimplicity of life, and when they were as yet freeſt from luxury and other corruptions, had yet adopted many inhuman ceremonies into their worſhip, auguries, &c. Even the Scythians, a younger branch of Japheth's family, who lived ſtill in a much greater ſimplicity, and were more unmixed, and had leſs intercourſe, with other nations, did yet even exceed the Celtes in the barbarity of their religion and cuſtoms [k]; and it will evidently appear from what follows, that the Gauls, Germans, and other northern people, did not only copy after, but even outdo them in it; ſo that tho' they muſt be allowed, for reaſons hinted more than once, to have been little known to, and, in great meaſure, deſignedly ſignedly miſrepreſented by, thoſe authors who have written of them, yet they cannot, without manifeſt partiality, be diſculpated from the charge of having had many bloody and inhuman rites, many abſurd and unſocial principles, as well as corruption of morals, in common with other nations, tho' not in the ſame degree with them. Let therefore the private doctrines of their druids have been what they would, and they be ſuppoſed ever ſo averſe and oppoſite to the general practice of the people, nothing can be ſaid for their countenancing, if not encouraging, thoſe abominable ceremonies, ſuch as their offering up of human victims to their gods by way of expiation, their auguries from the reeking blood and entrails of their captives, and others of the ſame nature, of which we ſhall ſpeak in due time.

[h] Geneſ. xix. 27. See Mona antiqua. p. 43, & ſeq. p. 98, & ſeq. p. 105, & ſeq. [i] Vol. v. p. 405, & ſeq. [k] Ibid. p. 383, & p. 446.

The Gauliſh religion the mother of all the northern ones.

WE think ourſelves obliged to be the more particular in our enquiry into the religion of the Gauls, as it is the ſource and foundation, not only of that of the antient Germans, and other more northern nations, but likewiſe of that of the antient Britains, who, as we ſhall ſee in a ſubſequent chapter, were deſcended from, and had received their religion, laws, cuſtoms, &c. originally from them; ſo that what is ſaid on that ſubject in this chapter, will ſerve as a clue to that of thoſe other nations we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of in the following ones; by which means we ſhall avoid many needleſs repetitions, and be able to confine our account of them chiefly to thoſe points, in which they either differed from this their common mother, or in ſuch caſes, where there appears a neceſſity to ſhew the affinity they bear to each other. As for thoſe of the antient inhabitants of Italy, Spain, &c. who became intermingled with the Gauls, the reader will find the former already done in a former volume [1], and the reſt will come in their turn in ſome of the ſubſequent chapters. And here we ſhall, for order-ſake, begin with an account of the different deities worſhipped by the antient Gauls, and the particular ceremonies and ſacrifices uſed to each of them, not as they were tranſmitted to them from their Celtic anceſtors, concerning which we refer our readers to what has been ſaid in their hiſtory, but as they were found in the times of the Romans invading of, and becoming firſt acquainted with them.

Eſus the ſupreme Deity.

WE have already hinted, that they antiently worſhipped the ſupreme Deity, under the name of Eſus or Heſus (E), [1] Vol. xi. p. 315, & ſeq. & alib. paſſ.

(E), and the ſymbol of the oak; and it will not be thought ſtrange, that this notion of a ſupreme Being ſhould have been preſerved

(E) There have been various conjectures concerning the etymon of this word, beſides that which we offered a little higher, and which to us ſeems the moſt natural, becauſe the Celtic Dh being pronounced with a kind of preceding aſpiration, and not unlike our ſofter th in ſuch pronouns as thee, thou, &c. foreigners, who were unuſed to it, could not well expreſs the ſound of the word Dhew, but by the letters Eſu. As for the final s, it might be ſuperadded by the Greeks and Romans, according to their way of terminating the maſculine gender in us, and os, as they did likewiſe in the plural Eſi, Aiſoi, as they may be ſeen in Heſychius.

The antient Etruſcans, according to Suetonius (8), called the Deity Æſar; for he obſerves there, that, among the other prodigies which preceded Auguſtus's death, a flaſh of lightning having eraſed the C from the word Cæſar, as it ſtood engraved on a pedeſtal that ſupported his ſtatue, the diviners told him, that the C being a numerical letter ſignifying an hundred, the omen portended, that he had but ſo many days to live, after which he would be deified, becauſe Æſar, or the remainder of the word Cæſar, ſignified God in the Etruſcan language. If we might therefore be allowed a far-off conjecture concerning theſe two names, Eſus among the Gauls, and Æſar among the Etruſcans, it would be, that they might be both of Hebrew extract; and we have elſewhere ſhewn, that the old Celtic, with which the Etruſcan has a vaſt affinity, appears viſibly to have been a dialect of the Hebrew (9). The word עזוז hezus ſignifies ſtrong and mighty, and is given to God in many places, particularly by the pſalmiſt (10); and עזר ezer ſignifies help or helper (11), and is likewiſe given to Him, as he is emphatically ſo, when all other helps fail. The patriarch Abraham, and his deſcendents, knew him by the name of אל שדי el-ſaddai, the mighty or ſelf-ſufficient God, till he made his peculiar name Jehovah known unto them (12); and it is remarkable, that the Thracians, a branch of the Celtes, did, according to Macrobius, call the god, to whom they had erected a temple on mount Zilmiſſus, Sabazius, which is a plain corruption of the Hebrew word Tzabaoth, eſpecially conſidering, that, in their religious rites to Bacchus, they were wont to cry out, Evohe Sabbai, which is

(8) In vit. Auguſt.
(9) Vol. v. p. 410, (B).
(10) Vide int. al. Pſal. xxiv. 8.
(11) Gen. ii. 18.
(12) Conf. Gen. xvii. 1. & Exod. vi. 3.

ſerved among the deſcendents of Japheth, when we find ſuch lively traces of it even among the idolatrous Syrians, Midianites, and even the Canaanites, as in the family of Laban [m], of Jethro [n], and of the two Abimelechs kings of Gerar in the times of Abraham and Iſaac [o], and ſome others we could name, particularly the Gibeonites in Joſhua's time [p], Adonibezek in the time of the judges [q], and Hiram king of Tyre in the reigns of David and Solomon [r]; who all not only retained the notion of the Deity, notwithſtanding their idolatry, but had likewiſe a peculiar name for it, is the Elohe, or, if you pleaſe, the Jehovah Tzabbaoth of the Hebrews, as God is emphatically called by the pſalmiſt in the pſalm above-quoted, and ſignifies "Lord of hoſts," a title that well ſuited the martial Thracians. As theſe therefore were rather attributes, than the names of the Godhead, each nation may be ſuppoſed to have choſen that which ſuited their genius beſt; and the Gauls that of Heſus, as ſuiting moſt with their warlike ſpirit.

[m] Geneſ. xxxi. 48, & ſeq. [n] Compare Exod. ii. 21, & ſeq. and xviii. 9, & ſeq. [o] Geneſ. xx. 3, & ſeq. xxvi. 8, & ſeq. [p] Joſh. ix. 9, & ſeq. [q] Judg. i. 7. [r] 1 Kings v. 7, & ſeq.

That not only the names of the Deity, but this way of worſhipping Him under oaks, and in oaky groves, was common to all the deſcendents of Noah, we have undoubted proof out of the old teſtament, as we ſhall preſently ſhew; and we only mention it here to confute the notion of thoſe, who ſuppoſe the Eſus of the Gauls to have been the god Mars; for neither he, nor any other inferior deities, were worſhipped under theſe oaks, or with the ſame rites with Eſus; and therefore Pliny, in his deſcription of the ceremony which they uſed in gathering the miſleto of thoſe ſacred oaks, has theſe words, which plainly ſhew, that theſe trees were dedicated to the Deity itſelf: "The druids, ſays he, (13) believe, that the miſleto is a ſign, "that God hath choſen that tree to himſelf;" and a little lower, after having particularly deſcribed their manner of gathering it, he adds, "that they offered up victims and prayers to "God, that he would bleſs and proſper his own gift to them "that receive it." It is plain from it, that he neither ſpeaks here of Mars, Jupiter, or any other of their gods, but of the Deity itſelf.

(13) Hiſt. nat. l. xvi. c. 44.

it, diſtinct from thoſe of their other gods. To this let us add, with reſpect to the Gauls we are now ſpeaking of, that the natural fondneſs, which they had for the religion and cuſtoms of their forefathers, the contempt they entertained of other nations, the recluſe and ſolitary life of their druids, who were the keepers and teachers of their theology, and their ſtrict and conſtant practice, founded upon it, of ſacrificing, and performing their other religious rites under the oak only, as conſecrated to that ſupreme Being, were moſt effectual means to preſerve that fundamental notion ſtill uppermoſt among them; whatever other ſuperſtitions might be, in proceſs of time, introduced among them; for we muſt here obſerve, that they kept conſtant to this cuſtom, or, rather, as ſeems, law, of performing their religious worſhip under that tree, or, more properly, in groves of it, even after they had adopted that long regiment of deities, of which we are about to give an account. To this we muſt add, that, in the midſt of thoſe heatheniſh ſuperſtitions, which crept by degrees into their religion, they never erected any either temples or idols unto this Eſus or ſupreme Deity; ſo that he ſeems to have been acknowledged by them much in the ſame manner, that the Athenians did the unknown God mentioned by St. Paul [s]; which notion was far enough from being peculiar to them: others had their unknown God as well as they, and owned themſelves his offspring, though their notion and worſhip of Him were very imperfect, and, in many caſes, too unworthy of Him, as even the Gauls did, when they came to intermingle the Roman theology with their own. However, antiently they ſeem to have entertained ſome ſublime notions of Him, to confirm which we need but add what Tacitus ſays of the Senones, who were a branch of the Celtes, and had the ſame religion: They, ſays that author [t], have no other temples but a wood or grove, where they perform all their religious rites. None is admitted to enter it, unleſs he carries a chain, in token of his dependence on, and owning the ſupreme dominion, which God has over him; and, if he chance to fall down, none muſt dare to help him up; but he muſt either roll himſelf, or crawl upon his belly, out of the place. He adds, that their whole religion conſiſts in an acknowledgment, that the deity, which makes its abode there, governs all things; that all things depend on him, and

[s] Acts xvii. 23. [t] De mor. Germ.

and ought to obey him. Strabo ſays much the ſame of the Celtiberians, another branch of the Celtes; and adds, that they worſhipped the God without name, and danced every full moon, before their houſes, all the night in honour of him [u]. And might it not be upon this account, as an ingenious author obſerves [w], that Lucan rallies the Maſſilian druids, when he tells them [x], that they were the only ones of all men, to whom it was given to know, or not to know, the gods they adored? And then, ſpeaking of their groves, ſays, that their ignorance of the deities they worſhipped under them, was the cauſe of that veneration they paid to thoſe ſturdy and ſhapeleſs trees. He ſpeaks there indeed of deities in the plural, Roman and poet like; but that he did not intend thereby, that any more than one was worſhipped in thoſe groves, is plain from what he ſays at the end of his deſcription of the Maſſilian grove (F); viz. that the prieſt or druid, who officiated there, was afraid [u] Geogr. l. iii. [w] Relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c. 2. [x] Luc. Pharſal. l. iii.

(F) This deſcription, though diſfigured with ſatire and ridicule, being curious, and pertinent to our preſent ſubject, we ſhall give the ſubſtance of it to our Engliſh readers. It is as follows: There is without the walls of Marſeilles a ſacred grove or wood, which had never been touched by ax from the creation. The trees of it grew ſo thick and interwoven, that they ſuffered not the rays of the ſun to come through their branches, but a perfect damp and darkneſs reigned through the place. Neither nymphs nor ſylvan gods could make their abode in it, it being deſtined for the moſt inhuman myſteries. There was nothing to be ſeen there but a multitude of altars, upon which they ſacrificed human victims, whoſe blood turned the very trees of a horrid crimſon colour If antient tradition may be credited, no bird ever perched upon their branches, no beaſt ever walked under them, no wind ever blew through them, nor thunder-bolt did ever touch them. Theſe ſtately oaks, as well as the black water that winds about through the place in different chanels, fill one with horror and dread. The figures of the god of the grove are a kind of ſtanding, rude, and ſhapeleſs trunks, covered over with a diſmal yellow moſs. It is the genius of the Gauls (continues he) to feel no veneration for the gods, unleſs they be thus repreſented, in a manner quite oppoſite to the taſte of other nations; for which reaſon their fear and regard for them increaſes, in proportion to their fraid of meeting dominum luci, by which he could mean nothing elſe but the deity worſhipped there, a notion probably common to them and the Jews, as we have ſhewn in the laſt note.

Their veneration for the oak.

ANOTHER remarkable thing in their religion was their great veneration for the oak. This ſeems likewiſe to have been common to them and the old patriarchs and Jews, among whom that tree was in high eſteem, though not in the ſame ſuperſtitious degree. Abraham is recorded to have pitched his tents under ſome famed oaks, ſuch as thoſe of Mamre, of More [y]; which, though our verſion, and ſome others, have transformed into plains, yet, in the original, do plainly ſignify an oak or oaky grove, as we have obſerved in a former volume [z]. He is ſaid moreover to have planted groves of them; and where-ever he pitched his tent, he is recorded to have built an altar unto the LORD, and to have given ſome ſignificant name to the place, ſuch as that of Beer-their ignorance of thoſe gods which they worſhip. There is a report, that this grove is often ſhaken, and ſtrangely moved, and that dreadful ſounds are heard from its caverns; that the yews, if thrown or cut down, grow up again of themſelves; that the grove is ſometimes in a blaze, without being conſumed; and that the oaks are twined about with monſtrous dragons. The Gauls dare not live in it, out of reſpect to the deity that inhabits it, and to which they entirely abandon it. Only at noon and midnight a prieſt goes trembling into it, to celebrate its dreadful myſteries; and is in continual fear, leſt the deity, to which it is conſecrated, ſhould appear unto him. Thus far our poet.

[y] Geneſ. xii. 6. xiii. ult. & alib. paſſ. [z] Vol. ii. p. 399, (G).

We have already obſerved, that tho' he expreſſes himſelf in the plural in ſpeaking of the Gauliſh gods, rather as a poet and a Roman, yet his laſt words plainly ſhew, that he intended to ſpeak of one deity here. All that we would further obſerve of the prieſt's dread of ſeeing that deity, ſeems plainly a relic of that notion, which even the patriarchs and antient Jews had, that no man could ſee God, and live (14). As for the dreadful deſcription of the grove, and its horrid apparatus, if it is not, in a great meaſure, the fiction of the poet, to ridicule the Gauliſh worſhip, might it not be that of the druids themſelves, to prevent their laity, as well as ſtrangers, from entering, and prying too curiouſly into it?

(14) Vide int. al. Geneſ. xxviii. 16, & ſeq. Judic. vi. 22. xiii. 22, & ſeq.

Beerſheba [a], Bethel, and the like (G). The Gauls in particular ſeem to have improved upon this patriarchal cuſtom, the origin of which ſeems rather owing to what we hinted in the laſt note, than to any ſanctity, or extraordinary virtue, which either Abraham, or any of his anceſtors or ſucceſſors, could imagine to be in thoſe trees; whereas, among both Celtes and Gauls, the oak was looked upon and reverenced as an emblem, or as the peculiar reſidence, of the Deity.

And miſſeto. The fruit of it, eſpecially the miſſoldine, was thought to have a kind of divine virtue, was uſed as a kind of panacea for man and beaſt, and applied to both, as well inwardly as outwardly, in wounds, contuſions, and cuticular ailments, as well

[a] Vide int. al. Gen. xxi. 33.

(G) It muſt be obſerved, that the original word alon ſignifies both an oak, and a grove or thicket of oaks. Theſe were, at firſt, choſen in thoſe hot countries for the ſake of coolneſs and ſhade; and where the plains were well watered, and fit for paſture, but wanted ſuch woods or groves, they planted them, as Abraham is recorded to have done at Beerſheba. Theſe, in time, came to be in great eſteem by his deſcendents, not only on account of their extreme uſefulneſs, and long duration, but out of regard to thoſe patriarchs, who had dwelt and ſacrificed under them. Jacob, we read, buried his beloved Rachel's nurſe under an oak, which he called the "The oak of mourning." He buried all the idolatrous traſh, which he found in his houſhold, under another (15). This laſt became famous among the Shechemites (16), probably becauſe Joſhua reared a ſtone or pillar under it, in memory of the covenant which he renewed juſt before his death between God and the Iſraelites (17).

This regard, by degrees, dwindled into downright ſuperſtition, not only among the Jews, but even among chriſtians, Mohammedans, and other nations As to the former, they became infamous for their ſacrificing and burning incenſe in their high places and groves, and at length, as they are juſtly upbraided by the prophets, under every oak and green tree (18), notwithſtanding God's prohibitions, and ſevere threatenings. As for the latter, we have ſhewn in a former volume, in ſpeaking of the oaks under which Abraham dwelt, that they were ſtill ſhewn in Conſtantine's time, and reſorted to with great devotion by chriſtians, Turks, and even heathens (19).

(15) Geneſ. xxxv. 4, 8. (16) Judic. ix. 6. (17) Joſh. xxiv. 26. (18) See 2 Kings xvi. 4. Iſai. lvi. 5, & ſeq. Jerem. ii. 20. Hoſea iv. 13. Judith iii. 8. (19) Vol. ii. p. 399, (G), & alib.

well as for inward diſeaſes, or even barrenneſs and abortion in men, women, and cattle (H). The leaves, or ſome ſmall boughs of it, were worn by the druids and laity in all their religious ceremonies, which were conſtantly performed, as we hinted above, under thoſe trees, or in oaky groves. Theſe, if we may gueſs from the few fragments we have left of

(H) Pliny, who has given us this account more accurately than any other author, tells us (20), that they called the miſleto, as well as the particular day or feſtival on which they gathered it, by a name which ſignified cures all. We ſhall quote the whole paſſage, as it is both ſuccinct and curious:

" The druids, ſays he, who are among the Gauls what the " magi are elſewhere, hold nothing ſo ſacred as the miſſoldine, " and the tree that bears it. This is conſtantly the oak, for " which they have ſuch a high eſteem, that they do not perform " the leaſt religious ceremony without being adorned with gar- " lands of its leaves. It is, in all likelihood, from the Greek " name of the oak, that the Gauliſh prieſts are called druids. " Theſe philoſophers believe, that every thing that grows upon " that tree doth come from heaven; and that it is an evident " proof, that God hath choſen it above all others.

" The miſſoldine of the oak being ſcarce, and rarely found, " when any of it has been diſcovered, they go, with great cere- " mony and reſpect, to gather it. This is always done on the " ſixth day of the moon, a day ſo eſteemed among them, that " they have made their months and years, and even ages, which " conſiſt but of thirty years, to take their beginning from it. The " reaſon of their chuſing that day is, becauſe the moon is, by that " time, grown ſtrong enough, though not come to the half of its " fulneſs; and this day they call by a name, which, in their tongue, " ſignifies curer of all ills.

" When the druids have got ready under the oak all the appara- " tus for the ſacrifice, and the banquet which they uſually make, " they tie, for the firſt time, two white bulls to it by the horns. " Then one of the prieſts, cloathed in white, gets up the tree, " and, with a gold ſcythe, cuts off the miſſoldine, which is received " in a white ſagum; which done, they begin to offer their ſacri- " ces, and pray to God to give a bleſſing to his own gift unto " them that are honoured with it. He adds, that the water of " the miſſoldine gives fertility to man and beaſt, is a ſpecific " againſt all kind of poiſon; an eminent inſtance, ſays he, that " human religion has often no other object than frivolous things."

(20) Nat. hiſt. l. xvi. c. 44.

Their groves for worship.

of them in history, and from some carneads or heaps of stones still standing in some of our isles, especially that of Anglesey [b], and which may be supposed to have been cinctures or fences round the grove, to prevent their entrance between the trees, except where it was left open to the comers, and, not unlikely, guarded by some inferior druids, to stop all strangers from intruding into their mysteries: we say, if we may guess at them by these few antient helps, these groves were of different forms, some quite circular, some oblong, and more or less capacious, according to the number of votaries, or the largeness of the district or canton, to which they belonged. The area, which was in the centre of the grove, was open at the top, and encompassed with several rows of these oaks, set very thick and close. Within the large circle were several smaller ones, surrounded, as is supposed, with large stones, which served for the sacrifices, and other most solemn parts of their worship. In the centre, or near it, of these small circles, were placed solid stones of a large size, and convenient height, on which the victims were killed, dissected, and offered up. Each of these being, as we imagine, a kind of altar, was surrounded with another row of stones, the use of which cannot be easily guessed at, unless it was to keep the people at a due distance from the priests that officiated. Some of these interior circles are likewise thought to have served, one or more for their courts of judicature, another for their grand council or assembly, or for such other purposes as can only be guessed at [c]; though we very much doubt, considering the vast reverence that was paid to those groves, as they were consecrated to religious rites, whether their druids would suffer any secular matters to be transacted in them. We are rather inclined to think, that these cinctures might all serve for the same religious ends, one for human victims, another for those of beasts, a third for auguries, and such-like; not but they may be reasonably enough supposed to have had other groves, designed for such secular purposes as we just now mentioned; and these might probably enough be of oaks, as the others were, that the sacredness of those trees might strike these courts and councils with due awe, and prevent such quarrels and indecencies as might otherwise happen. And this conjecture (and the contrary one is no more than guess-work) seems more agreeable to what we have

[b] See Mona antiqua, p. 91, & seq. Keyzler. antiq. septentrion. p. 77. & in addend. [c] Idem ibid.

have lately quoted of their worſhip out of Tacitus, Pliny, and Lucan.

How the Eſus, or ſupreme deity of the Gauls came afterwards to be transformed into, or give place to, Jupiter, which, if we may believe Lactantius, did not happen till about the fourth century at ſooneſt, we ſhall endeavour to account in the ſequel. But, by what we have ſaid of him and his worſhip, and of the oaks and groves conſecrated to him, &c. the reader cannot but have obſerved a great deal of conformity between the Gauliſh and the patriarchal and Jewiſh religion, though, if this had been all, we ſhould hardly have inſerted this remark; neither could Celſus have had ſo much reaſon to oppoſe the antiquity and wiſdom of the druidiſh religion, and its conformity to that of the antient Jews, againſt the novelty of the goſpel [d]. We ſhall therefore beg leave, in ſpeaking of the other branches of the Gauliſh religion and ceremonies, to obſerve to him the ſame conformity running through very many other particulars, as they have been collected in one view by a very diligent author often quoted under this head [e]; and from which we may be able to ſatisfy ourſelves, that they could never be owing to mere chance, but that both plainly appear to have flowed from the ſame ſource.

Affinity between the Celtic religion and that of the patriarchs and Jews.

1. The Gauls had a ſovereign pontiff or head of the druidiſh order, to whom both theſe, and the whole nation, paid the higheſt regard. The ſame we find among the Jews, to ſay nothing of Melchiſedech, to whom Abraham paid tythes of the ſpoil he had lately gained. 2. The druids, under this their head, had ſuch an uncontroulable power and ſway, that whoever refuſed to ſubmit to their deciſions, not only in religious but civil matters, (even to the putting an immediate ſtop to an engagement, when both armies were ready for the onſet, if the druids did not like the prognoſtics) was interdicted from aſſiſting at their ſolemnities, which was looked upon by the Gauls as the moſt grievous puniſhment [f]. The Jewiſh high-prieſt, at the head of the ſanhedrin, was looked upon as the dernier appeal in all cauſes; and excommunication, the greateſt puniſhment among the Jews, was to be the lot of thoſe, who refuſed to abide by their deciſion [g]. 3. The druids were obliged to aſſemble themſelves in the territories of Chartrain once a year. The Jews had their three grand feſtivals, on which their males were obliged to repair to Jeruſalem. 4. The druids wore white garments. The ſame did the Jewiſh prieſts. 5. The druids lived in woods and groves. The ſame did generally the patriarchs, the ſons of the prophets, and the Eſſenians, a kind of monks among the Jews. The Gauls had their female druids, propheteſſes, and aruſpices. The Jews had Miriam Aaron's ſiſter, Deborah, Huldah, and other propheteſſes, to ſay nothing of other women, who kept familiar ſpirits. Some of thoſe females were in high repute among the Gauls, and bore a great ſway in the government. And Deborah was a famed judge in Iſrael. 6. The Gauls vowed to Mars ſome parts of the ſpoil they took in war, and it was death for any one to infringe upon it. The ſame was among the Iſraelites with reſpect to thoſe cities and kingdoms, which were ſubject to anathema, as in the caſe of Jericho. The reſt they divided among themſelves, according to certain laws and cuſtoms ſettled amongſt them. Moſes, Joſhua, and David, made alſo laws on the ſame head, what portion ſhould be offered to God, what given to the prieſts, and how the reſt ſhould be divided between the combatants and thoſe who guarded the camp and baggage. 7. The Gauls worſhipped a braſen bull. And the Iſraelites golden calves. 8. In public calamities they offered a human victim, on whom they threw all the curſes that threatened them. The Jews did the ſame by their ſcape-goat [h]. 9. The Gauls had power of life and death over their ſervants. The ſame had the patriarchs and Jews, and the former even over their families, as one may conclude from the inſtance of Judah and his daughter-in-law Tamar [i]. They began their days from the evening, as the patriarchs and Jews, and, like them, diſtinguiſhed the year only into three ſeaſons, viz. ſpring, ſummer or harveſt, and winter. The autumn was ſo unknown to both, that they had no name for it. The ſame is affirmed likewiſe of the Egyptians by Diodorus Siculus. 10. They gave ſignificant names to their children, to places, &c. as theſe did. 11. The Gauls believed the immortality of the ſoul; ſo that no people under heaven could ſhew a greater contempt of death. The patriarchs and Jews, if we except the upſtart ſect of the Sadducees, were famed for looking on this life only as a mere paſſage into a better. 12. When their life or liberty was in danger, they endeavoured to redeem it by one or more of their own ſer-

[d] Vide Origen. cont. Celſum. [e] Relig. des Gaul. l. i. p. 53, & ſeq. [f] Diod. Sic. l. v. Cæſ. comment. l. vi [g] See vol. iii. p. 252, &c.

[h] Ibid. p. 222, (V). & Cæſ. comment, l. vi. [i] Geneſ. xxxviii. 24.

ſervants [k]. We have an inſtance of this in Jephtha, one of the Iſraelitiſh judges, and his raſh vow [e], though it was more common among the Phœnicians, and other antient nations. 13. The Jews had the waters of jealouſy to aſſure them of the fidelity or infidelity of their wives. The Gauls had ſome kinds of ordeals or trials to the ſame ſenſe; and Julian the emperor tells us, that the waters of the Rhine had ſome ſecret virtue to puniſh thoſe wives, who had gone aſtray (I). The druids made it a conſtant maxim not to commit any thing of their laws, philoſophy, or hiſtory, to writing, but to couch them in ſet poems and canticles, to be learned by heart, and ſung at proper places and ſeaſons. Theſe ſongs were, it ſeems, ſo multiplied in Cæſar's time, that it took up ſome druids (for they were all obliged to it) near twenty years in learning them [m]. We do not find but that this was the antient cuſtom of the patriarchs and other nations in Canaan before Moſes, who quotes ſome of thoſe canticles, and compoſed ſome of them himſelf, as did other prophets after him, in memory of ſome ſignal victories, deliverances, and the like. Some Gauliſh nations carried their gods along with them to the war, as did the Iſraelites their ark, and their apoſtates the tabernacles of Moloch, Chiun, and Rempham. The Gauls did perſonify and deify their rivers, lakes, woods, &c. and might not this be a corruption of that laudable elegance of the ſacred poets, who called upon thoſe, and all other creatures, to praiſe god? as, in all probability, their offering human victims, common likewiſe to other nations, and even to the apoſtate Iſraelites, in imitation

[k] Comment. ubi ſupra. [l] Judg. xi. 30, & ſeq. [m] Comment. ubi ſup.

(I) This is not a proper plale to ſpeak of thoſe ordeals and other trials, as paſſed, in all probality, from Gaul into Great Britain, and which might, in all likelihood, have their riſe from the Jewiſh waters of jealouſy. But that, which the apoſtate Julian mentions concerning the Rhine, can ſcarcely be owing to any thing elſe.

He tells us (21), that, when a Gaul ſuſpected his wife of infidelity, he obliged her to throw, with her own hands, the children that were born of her body into that rapid river. If they ſunk, the woman was deemed guilty, and put to death. If they ſwam, and moved towards the place where ſhe ſtood trembling at a convenient diſtance, and ready to receive them, ſhe was cleared, and reſtored to her huſband's favour.

(21) Orat. xvi.

of them, ſeems to have had its riſe from the example of Abraham's readineſs to ſacrifice his ſon Iſaac, concerning which we ſhall refer our readers to what we have ſaid in a former volume [n]. We ſhall now give our readers a ſhort account of this inhuman rite, as it was practiſed among the Gauls, and leave our readers the pleaſure of diſcovering, in the ſequel of this hiſtory, many more inſtances of that conformity we have been ſpeaking of, which we are forced to omit, to avoid being tedious.

Human victims how offered.

As to this bloody cuſtom of ſacrificing human victims, which began ſo early with the Gauls, and which, if we may believe Procopius [o], did not end till ſome centuries after their embracing chriſtianity, we can only ſpeak of it as it was tranſacted out of their groves or places of worſhip; for as to what was done within them, no ſtranger being made acquainted with, much leſs admitted to ſee it, we muſt be wholly in the dark about it, as their druids committed nothing of it to writing. Concerning thoſe unhappy ones, that were offered abroad, Cæſar and Plutarch give us the following account: When a man's life is in danger, either through ſickneſs or other accident, they immediately ſacrifice, or at leaſt make a vow ſo to do, ſome human victims; for, beſides that they think them the moſt perfect and pleaſing to the gods, they believe, that one man's life cannot be redeemed but by that of another, without which no ſatisfaction could be made to them for their goodneſs to men. And theſe are the ceremonies eſtabliſhed amongſt them upon all ſuch occaſions [p]: They erect a huge, hollow pile of oſier, which they fill with theſe unhappy wretches, who are quickly ſuffocated by the ſmoak, and reduced to aſhes ſoon after. They imagine however, that criminals of any kind are much more acceptable victims; but, where they are not to be had, the innocent muſt go in their ſtead. In their funerals, which are very magnificent, they throw into the burning pile every thing that the deceaſed delighted in, even to living creatures; and it is not long ſince they threw likewiſe into it all his favourite ſervants and ſlaves. Some of his near relations, continues Cæſar, did likewiſe fling themſelves into the flames, in hopes of living happy with him in the next world. This cuſtom was exactly like that of burying the Jewiſh kings, except the burning of living and human creatures, as the reader may ſee in a former volume, where we have given an account of that ceremony. [q].

At funerals.

We

[n] See vol. ii. p. 415, 417, paſſ. [o] See vol. ii. p. 508. Goth. l. ii. c. 25. [p] Comment. l. vi. Plut. de ſuperſtit. [q] Vol. iii. p. 393, & not.

In their auguries and other ſuperſtitions.

WE lately hinted at their imitating, in ſome meaſure, the Jewiſh ſcape-goat, by devoting ſome vicarious victims to death, and praying, that all the curſes due to them might fall upon it. The Maſſilians, among the reſt, are reported to have, in times of peſtilence, made choice of ſome indigent perſon, that offered himſelf, voluntarily, whom they took care to fatten with the daintieſt fare during a whole year; after which they dreſſed him with garlands, and other rich ornaments, and led him through the ſtreets, loaded with the bittereſt imprecations, to his death [r]. We have formerly had occaſion to account for this cuſtom, which was likewiſe common to other nations, as well as the Gauls, and had its riſe from the ſame ſource [s]. However, if the Gauls, in ſuch calamitious times, could procure any of the handſomer and nobler ſort to offer themſelves to ſuch a voluntary death, they not only preferred them, but encouraged them by large rewards and encomiums. Theſe were led, like the poorer ſort, out of the city, and ſtoned, and the former thrown down from ſome high precipice. The common notion among them was, that ſuch a ſpontaneous death for the good of the commonwealth entitled them to a rank among the gods. In other caſes they either tied or nailed them to ſome tree or poſt, and ſhot them to death with arrows. Others they burnt, with a number of beaſts, on a pile of hay [t]. It was alſo cuſtomary among them to reſerve their criminals to the fifth year, and to burn them in ſacrifice with the firſt-fruits of their ground [u]. The ſame author adds, that they threw into the fire an incredible quantity of gold, and other rich things, which it was death for any one to meddle with afterwards [w]. As for their brute victims, they were left, in ſome meaſure, to the choice of the offerer, or perhaps rather of the druids, who were the butchers of them, and always officiated in white garments (K), both in this, and all other parts of their worſhip. Only the horſes, which they took in battle, or at leaſt part of them, they burnt with the bodies of the ſlain [x]. All theſe ſacrifices were occaſional, and unlimited, except [r] Petron. ſatir. ad fin. Vide & Serv. comm. in Æn. iii. ver. 58. [s] See the note (Y), in vol. iii. p. 226. [t] Strab. l. iv. [u] Diodor. Sic. l. vi. c. 9. [w] Ibid. l. v. [x] Tacit. German.

(K) Some add, that they were ſtriped with purple, which dwindled, either at one or both ends, into a point like a ſpindle, to thoſe which Lucan calls national, and which were conſtantly performed at noon, and at midnight, as we have hinted above. As the Gauls were addicted to all kind of ſuperſtition (L), they uſed to be exceeding watchful of the ſinging and flight of birds, and other ſuch kind of ominous traſh. They never undertook any thing of conſequence, without the advice of their aruſpices, who were, for that reaſon, in high requeſt among them. Theſe carefully examined the entrails, blood, &c. of their victims; and when they offered any human one, to diſtinguiſh them from the laity. But there ſeems to be no need of ſuppoſing ſuch a diſtinction, ſeeing the white robe was peculiar to the druids, and no one dared to wear it but they and the druideſſes, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in due time (22).

(L) According to the Greek and Roman writers, the Gauls exceeded all other nations in cruelty and ſuperſtition; and yet, if we compare them together, even according to their own writings, we ſhall ſcarce perceive any difference between them, but what is on the oppoſite ſide. It muſt be owned however, that ſome of the Gallic nations were very famed for their ſuperſtition, ſince Alexander Severus is upbraided with having even outdone ſome of them, viz. the Vaſcones or Gaſcons, in it (23).

Our deſign is not to extenuate thoſe inhuman and abominable practices of the Gauls, but to obſerve how little reaſon other authors, eſpecially the Romans, had to blacken them above all other nations, when they themſelves outdid almoſt all that ever went before or ſince. We have given a ſufficient number of inſtances of it in their hiſtory under ſeveral of their emperors, eſpecially Severus above-mentioned, Nero, and Julian; and we ſhall cloſe this note with another, which happened juſt upon the breaking out of the war between the Gauls under Viridomarus and them, when, as Plutarch tells us (24), they found themſelves obliged to obey certain oracles, which they found in the Sibylline books, and to bury alive in the beef-market two Gauls, and two Greeks, a man and a woman of each nation, to whom, ſays he, they ſtill offer ſome private ſacrifices in the month of November, which the people are not allowed to be preſent at; which very ſacrifices, we are told by two of their own authors (25), were ſince repeated at the ſame place on ſeveral occaſions, eſpecially at the firſt opening of the Punic war, which immediately ſucceeded that of the Gauls above-mentioned.

(22) Comment. ubi ſupra. Vide Keyzler. antiq. ſeptent. p. 305, 459. Pelloutier. hiſt. def. Celt. Relig. def. Gaul. & al.
(23) Lamprid. in Alex. Sever. (24) In vit. Marcel.
(25) Tit. Liv. l. xxii. c. 57. Plin. l. xxviii. c. 3.

one, as they did conſtantly before they held a council, whether of the nation or diſtrict, they ſtabbed him behind with a cutlaſs, a little above the diaphragma, watched the manner of his falling, whether on his right or left ſide, or on his face, how the blood flowed at the wound, and from thence gave their judgment, which was exactly followed, let the caſe be what it would, or the appearances be ever ſo much againſt it; inſomuch that they have come to the head of an army, and ſtopped the fight, which was juſt going to begin, their kings and generals not daring to contravene them upon any account [y].

Their altars.

We have already hinted, that their religious groves had ſome large ſtones, which were ſuppoſed to be the altars on which they offered up their victims. Some of them are ſtill extant in ſeveral parts of France, Germany, England, Wales, Ireland, and the iſle of Angleſey, and are of ſuch a monſtrous ſize, that the bringing and rearing of them was thought, by the ſuperſtitious inhabitants, to have been the work of thoſe demons, that were ſuppoſed to attend on that kind of worſhip, eſpecially conſidering that, as it is pretended, there were no quarries of ſuch ſtones within any reaſonable diſtance from the place where theſe altars ſtood. Of theſe one, that is to be ſeen in the confines of Alſace, meaſures about thirty-ſix foot in circumference, twelve foot and a half in breadth, and four foot and a quarter in thickneſs. It is reared on a parcel of other ſtones about three foot and a half from the ground [z]. Some of theſe altar ſtones were round, others oval, ſome ſquare, others oblong, and ſome triangular. Some appear to have been adorned with a kind of ornament either of bas-relief or inſcriptions, others to have been quite plain; but whether originally ſo, or by time and weather, is not certain. Others there were, which had a kind of hollow or baſon on the ſurface, ſuppoſed to have been deſigned to receive the blood or entrails of the victims [a]. One of theſe is recorded to have had a hollow kind of naſty paſſage under it, through which they made thoſe ſtrangers, whom they deſigned for ſacrifice, to paſs, pelting them all the way with filth and dung; from which that paſſage is, it ſeems, called to this day cunnus dæmonis, duvels-ſkut, or devil's hole [b].

The antiquaries of each nation have been very curious and diligent

[y] Strab. l. iv. Juſt. l. xxiv. c. 4. Diod. Sic. l. vi. c. 9. Comment. l. vi.

[z] Keyzler. ubi ſup. p. 41, & ſeq.

[a] Cæſ. comm. ubi ſup.

[b] Schoen. de ſedib. Franc. apud Matth. Analect. & Keyzler. ubi ſup.

diligent in their accounts of thoſe altars, and other piles of huge ſtones, which are to be met with in almoſt every kingdom and province of Europe, together with ſuch other monuments as deſcribe thoſe ſacrifices that were offered upon them, and the apparatus and inſtruments that were uſed in them; but they generally deal ſo much in conjectures, and agree ſo little with each other, that it is no wonder that kind of learning has been ſo diſreliſhed by the far greater part of the learned; ſo that it would be loſt time for us to enter further on this ſubject, and all that we think worth adding to it is, that the Gauls are affirmed by the generality of authors to have conſtantly aſſiſted at theſe ſacrifices armed cap-à-pé, and to have carried ſome ſmall thing belonging to the victim away with them in their mouths or hands [c], after it had been offered up, or had been led to the altar.

They had no temples till long after Cæſar.

TEMPLES, we have already hinted, they had not before the coming in of the Romans, nor, in all likelihood, for a long time after Cæſar's conqueſt of them. An author, who lived long after him, tells us expreſly, that they had not any other ſtatue of Jupiter but a tall oak [d], which could hardly be ſuppoſed to be growing in a temple, any more than thoſe coloſſian piles of hay and other combuſtibles, in which, we are told by other authors [e], they uſed to burn their numerous human victims, can be imagined to have been reared in any ſuch cloſe places, much leſs ſtill the trees on which they faſtened thoſe whom they pierced with arrows. Their groves, ſuch as we have deſcribed them, were much fitter for thoſe ceremonies; and this appears to have been one main difference between the Gauls and the Greeks and Romans [f]. When Mars came to be adopted among their inferior deities, they only worſhipped him under the figure of a naked ſword, that was repoſited upon an altar in one of thoſe groves; but as they had then a cuſtom to vow to him what ſpoil they took from their enemies, Cæſar tells us they generally depoſited them in any place where they chanced to be. There they ſacrificed all the cattle they found, and laid up the reſt of the plunder in vaſt heaps in the open country, which were nevertheleſs held ſo ſacred by the people, that none dared to touch any part of it, though there were amongſt them great quantities of gold and ſilver, and other rich ſtuff; for he tells us, that thoſe

[c] Cæſ. ubi ſup. Diod. Sic. Mel. l. iii. & al. [d] Maxim. Tyr. ſerm. xxxviii. [e] Cæſ. comm. Diod. Strab. ubi ſup. [f] See Voſſ. in Maimon. Aboda Zara, c. 1, n. 2. Reineſ. apud relig. des Gaul. p. 119, & ſeq.

thoſe conſecreated heaps were to be found in moſt cities in Gaul [g]. This ſeems likewiſe another material point, in which they differed from other nations, who choſe to ſhut up thoſe treaſures in their temples, as in places of greateſt ſafety; whereas the Gauls left them expoſed under the canopy of heaven, and in the open fields, or, at moſt, in ſome lakes and groves, which were on that very account eſteemed ſacred (M). The Germans appear to have been ſtill more averſe to the [g] Cæſ. comm. ubi ſup. Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 2.

(M) It muſt be owned, however, that ſome of theſe authors give to theſe places the name of temples or oratories, and Cæſar is affirmed to have rifled them to ſupport his army (25); but then they ſpoke like Greeks and Romans, among whom it was cuſtomary to recond ſuch ſacred treaſures in their moſt famous temples, and even to call ſuch conſecrated places by the names of ἱερὸν and templum. Thus Tacitus, though he affirms that the Germans had no temples, tells us, that their goddeſs Hertza uſed ſometimes to come out of her grove or Caſtum nemus, to air herſelf, and, when ſhe was weary of rambling, was carried back, and placed in her own temple, which, the ſame author tells us afterwards, was no more than a lake within the wood where that goddeſs reſided (26).

The ſame may be ſaid of that famed one of Thouloufe, upon whoſe account the aurum Tholoſanum became famous, even to a proverb, on account of the vaſt quantity that was repoſited in it. This place Strabo, ſpeaking of it, calls a temple: There was, ſays he, a very famous temple at Thouloufe, the veneration and credit of which made it grow immenſely rich, becauſe none dared to touch any part of what was conſecrated in it (27); and yet the ſame author, when he accounts for the vaſt quantities of gold that were found there, from ſome rich mines which he ſuppoſes to have been in the neighbourhood, and which, joined to the plain frugal way in which the inhabitants lived, made it encreaſe upon them to ſuch a ſtupendous height, he adds, that they had other treaſures in many ſuch-like places, which, ſays he, were depoſited and conſecrated in whole ingots, in lakes, as in ſo many ſacred aſyla. So that this Thouloufan temple, and thoſe other lakes he ſpeaks of, were in all probability the ſame thing, or meant, at moſt, but ſome more ſacred and private part of the lake, to which he gives the name of temple, only on account of the deity to whom that metal was conſecrated.

What confirms it ſtill more is, that Strabo, ſpeaking of the ſacrilege

(25) Sueton. in Cæſar. (26) De morib. German. (27) See before vol. xii. p. 475.

the introduction of temples amongſt them, as we learn from Tacitus and other authors, and ſhall ſee in the next chapter; and even the Britons, who certainly muſt have had them, if any other Gauls had, becauſe they were the ſtandard of the Gauliſh religion, from whom all the others received it; for we are told [h], that theſe uſed to croſs over in great numbers into Britain, or, as ſome think, into the iſle of Angleſey [i], and to ſpend there ſome years in the ſtudy of their religion and myſteries, as it was indeed the ſeat and nurſery of it, and the reſidence of the grand druid, or chief pontif, and conſequently of all the learned doctors of the Gauliſh religion; and yet, when Tacitus ſpeaks of the deſcent of the Romans into this iſland [k], he tells us, that their firſt care was to deſtroy thoſe groves and woods which the druids had polluted with the blood of ſo many human victims; and would they not, upon the ſame account, have done ſo by their temples, if any ſuch had been in this country? And ſince all the other Gauls appear to have regulated their whole religion, and its rites, from theſe, it cannot be ſuppoſed, that they could, at leaſt in Tacitus's time, have had any temples any-where elſe, what ever they did afterwards more by force than out of choice, as we ſhall ſee by-and-by. Some ſtatutes they might have, and in all probability had, before Cæſar's time; but it would be difficult to prove, that they bore any reſemblance with thoſe of the Greeks and Romans, either as to their figure or deſign, or that they were ſet up by the prieſts, and not rather by [h] Comment. ubi ſup. ſeq. p. 53, & ſeq. 78, & ſeq.

[i] See Mona antiqua, ſect. viii. &

[k] Annal. lib. xiv. c. 3.

ſacrilege committed by Cepio (28), mentions only the lake out of which this famous Tholouſan gold was taken; and Juſtin, ſpeaking of the Tectoſagi, whom he ſuppoſes to have brought it from the temple of Delphos, ſays, that, being returned to Thoulouſe, and afflicted with a grievous plague, they were ordered by their augurs to fling their ill-gotten pelf into that lake (29). We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more particularly of this Thouloufan treaſure, and its being expoſed to ſale, in the ſequel; and we only mention it here to ſhew upon what account Strabo called it a temple, though no more than a ſacred lake, with a σηκὸς or niche, with ſome emblem of a deity in the richeſt, and, conſequently, moſt ſacred part of it.

(28) Vide Relig. des Gaul. lib. i. cap. 13. (29) Geogr. l. iv.

by the people, who are often hurried away by imitation, though contrary to the conſent of their guides, who appear to have been moſt ſtrict obſervers of the old patriarchal way of worſhipping the Deity; for as, on the one hand, they ſeem to have kept all along ſome kind of tradition from their progenitor, who was but a third in deſcent from Noah, not to ſay any thing of thoſe before the flood, of which they could not ſo ſoon loſe all memory, and whoſe cuſtom it was to worſhip GOD without temples or images; ſo, on the other, their great veneration and tenaciouſneſs for their antient rites and cuſtoms, joined to the contempt they had for thoſe of other nations, muſt have proved an effectual and long-winded preſervative againſt their introducing them. At leaſt it is very probable, that theſe ſtatues or images we are ſpeaking of, if there were really any ſuch among them, might be no other than monuments of ſome eminent perſons and tranſacti-ons, ſuch as that which Laban and Jacob reared in memory of their mutual reconciliation, or that which the latter ſet up in the place where he buried his favourite Rachel[1]; or perhaps to point out thoſe ſacred treaſures, which were conſecrated in the manner and places already mentioned, and to deter people from profaning or ſeizing upon them; all which might be eaſily miſtaken for ſtatues and idols by thoſe Greek and Roman authors who beheld or heard of them.

BEFORE we diſmiſs this point, it will not be thought unſeaſonable to make ſome further enquiry into thoſe vaſt piles of ſtones which remain to this day both in England, and in other parts of Europe; concerning which ſo many different conjectures have been offered by learned antiquaries, and others, whilſt ſome have maintained them to have been erected by the Romans, others by the antient Gauls and Britons; one ſort taking them for monuments erected in memory of ſome famous battle or victory, others for burying-places, and a third ſort, though with leſs reaſon, as we think, for temples, or places of worſhip. We ſhall, however, willingly ſave ourſelves the trouble of entering into a detail of them, conſidering how difficult it is to deſcribe ſuch kind of antiques, ſo as to give our readers any tolerable idea of them, without having conſtant recourſe to ſome iconography of them, which are not in many caſes eaſy to be had, and in moſt not without greater expence than they would perhaps think they deſerve. But ſince that famous one of Stonehenge, which has been ſeen by all the curious, and of which we

[1] See Geneſ. xxxi. 45, & ſeq. xxxv. 19, 20.

An account of Stonehenge on Salisbury plain.

we have so many descriptions in many of our English authors, may be justly affirmed to exceed all the rest, as well in the largeness of the stones as the perfection of its figure, we shall, notwithstanding its more properly belonging to a subsequent chapter, venture to speak of it here, and give the best light we can concerning that truly curious piece of antiquity; especially as we proposed at the beginning of this chapter, to treat of every thing that related to the Gauls, and those other nations that are descended from them, in so full a manner, as might save us the trouble of needless repetitions in those that follow. But what more effectually calls upon us to treat of it here, is, that a reverend and learned author lately, in that curious and elaborate account he has given of that stately edifice [m], hath endeavoured to prove it an antient druidish temple, which, if it had been such, would overthrow all that we have hitherto said, on the testimony of so many antient authors as we have produced, in favour of the opposite opinion. Had that learned author contented himself with calling it a druidish edifice of any kind but that of a temple, we should have readily agreed to it; because we think he has given us full proofs of its being not only much antienter than the Romans, and, consequently, much more so than the Saxons, but has further demonstrated, as far as the subject is capable of demonstration, that it never could be a fabric of the former; so that upon the whole it must be owned to have been a British or druidish work: and thus far we readily agree with him, tho' we shall take the liberty, as we think we ought, to differ from him in his origin of the druids, as well as in this of their having erected temples in imitation of the patriarchs, who are no where recorded to have reared any thing but bare altars of unhewn stones, or, at most, some groves over them, rather for shade and coolness, than out of any superstitious regard for either the oaks, or any other trees. And as our author offers nothing but far-off conjectures on a subject of such remote and dark antiquity, there seems to be one insuperable obstacle against his hypothesis of their coming from Phœnice; namely, that if these druids had [n] been of so different a nation from the Celts the ancestors of the Gauls, let them have come into Britain when they would, either before or after the Celtes, it is not to be supposed, that Allowed a druidish fabric.

[m] Stukeley's Stonehenge. p. 1, 17, 60, & seq. [n] Idem, p. 31, & seq. 50. & seq. 61, & seq.

that theſe, much leſs all their Gauliſh deſcendents, who were ſo ſuperſtitiouſly tenacious of their antient rites, laws and cuſtoms, could have ever paid ſuch a blind and univerſal ſubjection to them, not only in religious, but in all civil and military concerns, as we have ſeen from the univerſal conſent of Greek and Roman authors they actually did: and if thoſe druids had had ſuch ſublime notions of the Deity, and been ſuch ſtrict followers of the partiarchal religion and rites, it is ſcarcely to be imagined they could have fallen into ſuch horrid exceſſes, ſuperſtitions, and cruelties, as we have ſhewn they did, even from the earlieſt times.

We come now to ſpeak of this famous fabric of Stonehenge, and to give our readers ſuch an account of it as may afford them an idea of the excellent taſte of thoſe druids, who were the projectors and conductors of it; and may ſerve to ſhew the nature and deſign of all other works of this kind, that are extant in any parts of Europe (N), where they bore any ſway; and herein we ſhall make no difficulty to follow

(N) Though there are many of theſe to be found in Germany, France, Spain, Brabant, Holland, &c. yet they are no-where ſo frequent as in theſe Britiſh iſles, even, as our author obſerves, from the very Land's-end in Cornwall to the utmoſt promontory in Scotland, where the Roman power never reached. They are to be ſeen in all the iſlands between Scotland and Ireland, in the iſle of Man, in all the Orkneys, and numerous in Ireland; and all pretty near after the ſame deſign, being generally arches of rude ſtones, of different diameters, upon elevated ground, open heaths and downs, and chiefly made of ſtones taken from the ſurface of the earth, though ſome of them appear to be of different forms, and ſo decayed and disfigured by time, that it is hardly poſſible to gueſs at their original uſe or intention, but from ſome analogy which they ſeem to bear with thoſe that are more perfect, as this we are upon (30).

Thoſe on the continent have ſuffered ſtill more, not only from the Romans, who took ſingular pride in deſtroying them, and introducing ſome of their own in their ſtead, and bringing the Gauls over to their religion and cuſtoms; but likewiſe from the blind zeal of weak chriſtians, who looked upon it as a piece of merit to deſtroy or deface them, as monuments of idolatry, and ſuperſtitious cruelties. The reader may conſult concerning them the authors quoted in the margin (31).

(30) See before vol. xii. p. 475. (31) Vide. relig. des Gaul. lib. i. acp. 13. Keyzler antiq. ſeptentr. &c.

low our learned author's deſcription of it in every caſe but that we have excepted above, it being, in all other reſpects, the moſt exact and accurate we have; tho' we ſhall refer thoſe who deſire a fuller account of it, to his late elaborate deſcription here referred to.

And not built by either Saxons or Danes.

THE name of Stonehenge, being of Saxon extract, and ſignifying barely a heap of hanging or gallows ſtones, is ſo contemptible a one for ſo noble a work, that it plainly ſhews it to have been reared long before their coming into England. Had they been the builders of it, or capable of judging of the magnificence of that work, or had there, in their time, remained any traces of its builders, and their deſign in it, they would doubtleſs have called it by a much more honourable name. The antient Britons, in the time of the Romans invading them, ſpake of it only by long and immemorial tradition, and as of a work far above human power; and called it, in the language, Choir Ghaur, which ſome interpret the choir or dance of giants, on account of a general notion that ran through all thoſe countries, where ſuch heaps of vaſt ſtones were ſet up, that it was done by giants, though others, more abſurdly, by the aſſiſtance of dæmons, probably from the reputation which the druids were in for their ſkill in magic, and by the help of which they were ſuppoſed to have reared thoſe ſtupendous piles in the form they ſtood; though our author very judiciouſly obſerves, that Choir Ghaur might be more properly rendered the grand choir, as it exceeded all other works of this kind in bigneſs, and, not unlikely, in dignity, on account of the arch-druid, or of his holding his grand aſſembly of all the inferior ones in this place. This etymon is altogether ſuitable to the grandeur of the fabric, and the deſign of it, whether we ſuppoſe it, with our author, to have been a temple, or, as ſeems more probable to us, for ſome other public uſe, in either of which it appears equally grand and noble. And this will go a great way to convince us, that it never was reared by the Romans; for the antient Britons would hardly have given ſuch a grand name, to a fabric of theirs, in their own language: but our author has taken a much more effectual way to convince us, that it could be none of their work, much leſs ſuch a one as our famed architect Inigo Jones (if he really was the author of that plan and performance which Mr Webb publiſhed under his name, and has been ſo amply confuted by Dr. Charlton ° and Keyzler) has endeavoured to prove it, and

The notion of its being a Roman temple confuted.

° Chorea gigant.

and in which he aſſerts it to be a round Roman temple, like the Pantheon (O).

Dr. Charlton, though he fully exploded that notion, yet failed in proving his own, which attributed it to the Danes; upon which he was ſoon after confuted by Olaus Vormius [P], there being really no ſuch monuments to be found among the Gothic nations. Beſides, this of Stonehenge is mentioned in ſome manuſcripts of Ninnius, who wrote two hundred years before they ſet foot in Britain; all which is a ſufficient confutation of its being a Daniſh work. Keyzler, for want of being thoroughly acquainted with our Britiſh antiquities, after having confuted the notion of Inigo Jones, of its being a Roman temple, or having any relation to public worſhip, and the vulgar error of its being built by giants, or by magic art, or of its being ſome old broken remains of the flood (P), endeavours

[P] Faſt. & Monument. Danic.

(O) That great architect, or, as is commonly thought, his publiſher, to make the dimenſions anſwer to his ſcheme, has been forced to alter and miſrepreſent them, to diſplace ſome of thoſe huge ſtones, and remove them at ſuch a diſtance as beſt anſwered to his imaginary plan. All which was afterwards diſcovered by a new ſurvey of it before perſons of taſte and judgment. Jones not publiſhing his account, though he lived thirty years after he had taken a view of it, makes one conclude, that he never deſigned it; and that, upon a ſerious examination of it, he found it impracticable. But upon his death, Mr. Webb his ſon-in-law, it is thought, found an expedient of ſurmounting that difficulty by the alterations we have mentioned; and by way of ſalvo tells the world, that if his father-in-law had lived to finiſh it, it would have appeared in a much better guiſe.

(P) There are two other vulgar errors more worth confuting than any of theſe, becauſe they have proved exceedingly detrimental to theſe antient monuments. The one is, the notion of the ſtones being factitious, or caſt by art, which hath and doth ſtill induce ſtupid pretenders to antiquity to come and diſfigure thoſe curious ſtones with chizels and hammers, to find out whether they are really ſo or not. The other is, their digging near and round about them, in hopes of finding out ſome hidden treaſures, or other curious antiquities; by which means many of them are fallen down, and others ſo very near doing ſo, that, if this humour continues much longer, thoſe noble fabrics will be reduced, in time, into a heap of ruinous fragments, and no traces be left, either of their ſtructure, deſign, or magnificence, but what we find in ſuch deſcriptions as thoſe given by this and other authors.

vours to prove it a ſepulchral monument erected by the Anglo-Saxons [q]. We hope we have already ſaid enough to prove, that, if it was ſuch a ſepulchral fabric, it is of too old a date to have been reared by that nation, or indeed by any but the antient Britons; though he is pleaſed, in order to prove them every way unqualified for ſuch a work, to repreſent them as ſuch ignorant ſavages, and ſo like the wild Americans [r], that he thinks it argument ſufficient, and indeed it is the only one he gives, againſt any one believing them to have been the contrivers of it. But how truly ſoever this character may ſuit to his antient Germans, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the next chapter, we hope to ſhew in the ſequel of this, beſides what has been occaſionally ſaid of the Britons, and their druids, that they were the very reverſe of what he has painted them: he has ſucceeded much better in his proofs, that it was a monumental work, from many more of the like nature and form, which are known and allowed to be ſuch. Our very author himſelf tells us of one in Ireland, which, by his deſcription, is Stonehenge in miniature, and which he owns to have been the monument of a famed druideſs [s]; though he inſinuates it to be her temple likewiſe. What he mentions in order to prove the great pile being rather a temple than a ſepulchral monument, viz. the horns, bones, charcoal, and other things that were dug up from under it, is quite inſufficient, it being common, at the funerals of antient Britons and Gauls, not only to offer hecatombs of victims, which alone would anſwer for theſe horns, bones, &c. but likewiſe to bury their favourite horſes and ſlaves, as we ſhall ſee in its due place: and if the reader will be pleaſed to look back at what we have ſaid of the funerals of their brethren the Scythians, eſpecially of thoſe of the higheſt rank [t], and compare it with the form and diſpoſition of the ſtones in this place, he will be apt to think it a more decent refinement upon that antient and inhuman Scythian cuſtom; and only rearing a number of huge ſtones in this form, inſtead of the ſkins of men and horſes, which they uſed to ſtuff, and ſet up round their monuments; for as it favoured leſs of barbarity, ſo it was of a much more laſting nature. But this we offer only as our own conjecture, and conjecture is all that can be offered, in favour of any other hypotheſis about it at this vaſt diſtance of time, and with thoſe little helps we have have left. For this reaſon we ſhall omit mentioning ſome other notions which people have entertained; ſuch as, that it was the place where the grand council of Britain met, a Roman trophy, the monument of the famous queen Boadicia, of king Vortigern, and ſuch-like, all which, carrying ſtill leſs probability than any of the preceding ones, are not worth dwelling longer upon.

[q] Antiquit. ſeptentr. p. 50, & ſeq. 97, & ſeq. 109. & ſeq. 230, & ſeq. [r] Ibid. cap. 4, 5, 13, & ſeq. [s] Stonehenge reſtored, p. 3. & 4. [t] See before vol. v. p. 450.

We ſhall now give a ſhort deſcription of the fabric itſelf, out of that accurate ſurvey which the reverend author laſt quoted made of it. It is ſituate on a pleaſant part of Saliſbury plain, about two miles from Amberſbury, and ſix from Saliſbury, and is ſituate not upon the ſummit of a hill, but very near it; and, for more than three quarters of the circuit, you have a gentle aſcent to it from the lower ground; at half a mile diſtance the appearance of it is quite ſtately, awful, and auguſt, eſpecially on the north-eaſt ſide, which is the moſt perfect. According to his plan or iconography of it, the circumference of it exceeds that of the outſide of St. Paul's cupola. The height of the outward cornice is eighteen feet complete, and that of the inner twenty-four at a medium; for theſe, for reaſons to be mentioned hereafter, are not all of equal height. Thus the height of the inner circle, or rather ellipſis, as our author has proved it, bears a juſt proportion to the curve of the circumference, which is above one hundred feet, and was one fourth part of it, though at preſent ſome of theſe ſtones either ſtooping, or by long time being ſunk lower, come ſomewhat ſhort of the proportion above-mentioned. The nobleneſs likewiſe of their lights and ſhades, as well as the variety ariſing from their circular form, adds to the elegance of the proſpect; ſo that it is not without reaſon that our great Jones blamed Mr. Camden for calling it ſo ſenſleſly as he doth in his Britannia, inſana ſubſtructio, a huge, or, as he engliſhes it, "a will kind of ſtructure;" whereas it plainly appears to have been the very reverſe. But it is manifeſt, that he never ſaw it, or took but a ſlight view of it; and his deſcription is ſo faulty and incorrect, that he ſeems not to have thought it worth a more exact ſurvey, though he had ſeen thoſe of Mr. Aubrey and Inigo Jones; but theſe likewiſe he ſeems to have had but little opinion of, and rather mentions their account of it to confute them, than to rectify his own by them; and we own, that he has very judiciouſly exploded both their notions, as well as all thoſe other vulgar ones, which aſcribe the rearing of this odd edifice, as he thinks it, to any but to the antient Britons. But to return to the fabric itſelf: the whole is encloſed within a circular ditch, which being croſſed, one aſcends thirty-five yards before he comes to the work; ſo that the area, as it is encloſed by the ditch, is three times the diameter of the building; and therefore the diſtance from the ditch within-ſide, quite round, to the fabric, is equal to the diameter of the fabric. When you enter the building, whether on foot or horſeback, you are ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at the ſight of the vaſt ſtones, whether you view thoſe that are ſtill ſtanding in their antient ſite, or thoſe which lean forward, and are ready to fall, or thoſe which lie down, and, by their immenſe weight, have cruſhed a number of others under them, eſpecially that which our author ſuppoſes to have been the altar-ſtone (Q), and is broken into three large pieces by the fall of one of the large architraves. What encreaſes the wonder, eſpecially to a man verſed in theſe antique works, is, that, among thoſe dreadful dilapidations, in which every ſtone lieth, like the carcaſe of a giant, with a number of horrid ruins under it, there remains ſtill as much of it undemoliſhed, as enables one to recover an idea of what it was when in its perfect ſtate, and enough of every part to give one a notion of the whole. To all this we may add the beautiful contraſt, which the view of the inſide gives you, when joined to the vaſt and beautiful proſpect of the country about it. The one, if you look up to thoſe huge ſtones, and the vaſt ponderous impoſts over them, the chaſm of ſky between the jambs of the cell or inner circuit, you imagine you ſee whole quarries mounted in the air; and if upon the rude havock below, it looks like the bowels of a mountain turned inſide out. The other gives you a moſt ſpacious and variegated proſpect of the country round about, bounded only by the horizon. One of them is what they call Veſpaſian's camp; a beautiful proſpect

Proſpects from Stone-Henge.

(Q) And ſo it may really have been, let the fabric be ſuppoſed a temple, a ſepulchral monument, a grand court or council, or any thing of the like nature, ſeeing that, as we have obſerved before, ſacrifices were uſed in great numbers in all thoſe ſolemnities, and an altar cannot but be ſuppoſed to have been fixed in ſome convenient part of the building; but why ſo cloſe to one part of the cell or nich as Mr. Jones has made it, and not in the centre, where Keyzler would rather have it, this reaſon may be well enough aſſigned, that it is moſt likely to have ſtood where we find the huge fragments ſtill lying, and cruſhed by one of the large impoſts falling upon it; for, had it ſtood in the centre, it would have been out of the reach of it, and have remained whole to this time.

ſpect it is ! another the antient hippodrome, or place for horſe and chariot-races ; a third the grand avenue to the fabric, which, as our author ſuppoſes, begins ſome miles from it. The plain is here-and-there interſperſed with a vaſt number of mounts, or, as they are called, barrows, ſome larger than others. The largeſt of them is encloſed about with a ditch an hundred cubits in diameter. Theſe are ſet thicker and cloſer in one place, and thinner at another ; and, upon digging ſome of them up, there have been found human bones, urns, and ſome kinds of beads, and other pieces of glaſs, cryſtal, jet, amber, and ſuch-like female trinkets, of different colours and metals ; as alſo ſome ſwords, hatchets, and other weapons [k], have been dug out of them ; which plainly ſhew them to have been burying-places ; but whether of the antient Britons, Romans, Saxons, or Danes, is not eaſy to determine, though the firſt ſeems moſt probable upon one account, which the reader will find in the margin (R). Theſe barrows however are ſo thick about

The barrows or burying-places.

[k] Stonehenge reſtored, p, 10, 43, & ſeq.

(R) The author obſerves, that the via Icenia, or Ikening-ſtreet, a road made by the Romans, which reached from Norfolk into Dorſetſhire infringes upon one of thoſe barrows, and croſſes ſome part of it ; from which it is reaſonable to conclude, that theſe barrows were older than that road (29).

In theſe barrows, beſides thoſe human and other bones, and materials, which have been digged out of them, there was a broad ſword taken out of one, and ſent to Oxford ; in another was found a weapon of the ſame metal like a pole-ax, which weighed twenty pounds, and given to colonel Wyndham ; out of a third was dug a braſs inſtrument, called celt, and is ſuppoſed to have belonged to ſome druid, and to have been uſed for cutting the miſleto off the oaks. We have taken notice above, that the Gauliſh druids uſed one made of gold for that purpoſe. In one of the female barrows was found, beſides ſome other ornaments and trinkets, the head of a javelin of braſs, at the ſocket of which were two holes for the pins, that faſtened it to the ſtaff, and a ſharp bodkin, round at one end, and ſquare at the other, where it went into a handle. Some of the trinkets ſeem to have been originally covered with metal ; and one of them had ſtill a thin film the neighbourhood of Stonehenge, that, from ſome heights, one may tell one hundred and twenty-eight in ſight [l]. Among them one may obſerve, in ſome places, two or more, ſometimes to the number of ſix or ſeven, incloſed in the ſame circle or ditch, of which one is larger than the reſt, and ſeems to be the tomb of ſome head of a family, and the reſt that of the family itſelf. The moſt remarkable of all the reſt are, that which is called the tomb of king Carviſius, who was the famed king of the Iceni, who fought againſt Julius Cæſar. It ſtands on the other ſide Wilton, antiently Carvitium, ſo named, as is ſuppoſed, from, if not built by, him. It is ſituate on an eminence, and of a handſome heighth, and has four tall ſtately trees planted on the top. From this mount you have the proſpect of Old and New Sarum, of Wilton houſe and park, the Ikening road, and ſome diſtant hills. The other, called Buſhbarrow, is beautifully planted by the ſhepherds, and commands the proſpect of Stonehenge, of the curſus or antient races, and of all the barrows around that plain, beſides a moſt elegant and ſpacious landſchape [m]. Thus much may ſerve to give an idea of the grand proſpect, which this noble ſtructure affords you from without.

(29) Stukeley's Stonehenge, p. 3, & ſeq. Mona antiq. ſect. ix. p. 88, & ſeq. p. 92, & ſeq.

Stonehenge probably a ſepulchral monument.

BUT, before we come to ſpeak of its ſymmetry, and the form and bigneſs of its ſtones, it may not be amiſs to obviate a difficulty, which will, in all probability, occur to our readers from what we have juſt now ſaid of thoſe barrows; for ſince they evidently appear to have been burying-places, and to bear a kind of relation to the fabric itſelf, which is, as it were, the centre and kebla of them, will not this deſtroy film of gold: all which ſufficiently ſhew this barrow to have been the ſepulchre of ſome heroine.

[l] Ibid. p. 45. & plate xxxi.

[m] See p. 46. & plate xxxiii. & ſeq.

All that is further worth obſerving on this head is, that thoſe materials, as well as the bones, appear to have ſuffered the fire in ſome, though not in others. In ſome likewiſe the aſhes were depoſited in a ſmall urn of reddiſh earth unburnt; and, in others, the bodies were buried at full length, generally north and ſouth. From all which it is concluded, that the cuſtom of burning dead bodies was in uſe among the Britons, as well as that of burying without it, before the times of the coming in of the Romans.

deſtroy our ſuppoſition of the latter being likewiſe a ſepulchral monument? Will it not appear abſurd to ſuppoſe ſuch a noble fabric to have been ſubſervient to the ſame ends with thoſe hillocks, which are ſeen around it? And will it not be more reaſonable to ſuppoſe it, with our author, to have been a temple, than a monument? To which we beg leave to anſwer, that we ſhould have made no difficulty of admitting it ſuch a temple, had we not ſo many convincing arguments, that neither Celtes, nor Gauls and Britons, had any ſuch buildings till long after the coming of the Romans. We have already given our reaſons, and hope they will appear as ſatisfactory to them, as they do to us, when duly weighed. However, to ſhew that our conjecture is not ſo inconſiſtent at the bottom, as it may appear at the firſt ſight, we ſhall obſerve, firſt, that there is a manifeſt difference between a monument and a burying-place; and that the latter is deſigned only to incloſe the remains, and the other to preſerve the memory, of the deceaſed. Theſe might be appropriated for the ſepulture of the great ones, and their family; and this to burn their bodies, to be afterwards depoſited in urns, and conveyed to their proper burying-place. Again, the ſtone fabric might be the ſepulchre of kings, and conſequently deſerve greater magnificence; or it might be that of the druids, then in very high eſteem; or more particularly of the head of that order, or grand druid, and require not only to make a more ſtately appearance, but likewiſe to bear ſome kind of affinity, as, in fact, it ſeems to do, in its ſtructure, to thoſe ſacred groves, in which they performed their religious ceremonies. But laſtly, and to name no more, that which appears to us the moſt probable conjecture, from the relation which thoſe barrows bear to the building, is, that this laſt was, as it were, the centre or kebla, that is, in other words, the point of view, or rather of diſtance, to all the reſt, and might be erected at the charge of the whole nation, and be deſigned, not only as a magnificent monument, or rather an open and majeſtic edifice for the performance of funeral rites to the whole people, and more eſpecially to thoſe of a ſuperior rank and merit, but likewiſe to aſcertain the property of each barrow to its reſpective family, by the number of cubits or furlongs they ſtood eaſt or weſt, &c. from it; for that they had a clear notion of the points of the compaſs, and of geometry, is evident from the very planting, ſtructure, ſituation and ſymmetry of the fabric, as has been demonſtrated by our author himſelf, as well as by ſome others, who have written before him of it.

THIS conjecture being allowed, as indeed every thing about this noble pile ſeems to confirm it, (viz. the long and ſpacious avenue to and from it, its dividing itſelf at a convenient diſtance, the one road towards the curſus, and the other to Radſin and the adjacent plains, the ſituation and ſtructure of the edifice, its proſpect and command over all the country, eſpecially the barrows and curſus, above-mentioned) we may carry it on a little farther, and ſuppoſe the corſe of the deceaſed, eſpecially if a prince, a grand druid, a celebrated warrior or heroine, to have proceeded with a ſuitable funeral pomp, ſuch as we have formerly ſhewn was obſerved by the Scythians to their monarchs [n], from the place of his reſidence to this ſepulchral monument. Here the druids and bards received it, and performed the funeral ceremonies over it, which conſiſted chiefly, at leaſt as far as related to their office, in offering ſacrifices, rehearſing the genealogy and heroic exploits of the dead, ſinging their encomia on him and his anceſtors, and, if the body was to be burnt, in aſſiſting to, if not performing, that ceremony, committing the aſhes to the funeral urn, and conveying it, with all its apparatus of ornaments, weapons, &c. to the proper place of its interment. The area on the outſide might ſerve for exhibiting ſuch games, ſhews, and fights, as were uſual on ſuch occaſions, to the numerous ſpectators round about, and of which we ſhall ſpeak in due place. After which, the company might proceed to the curſus, and there cloſe the ceremony with races, and other ſuch-like exerciſes. Every one of theſe places ſeems indeed ſo excellently ſituate, as if they had been deſigned for this grand ceremony. They all ſtand at a convenient diſtance from one another, and each commands the proſpect of the others, and may be viewed at a great diſtance by the largeſt number of ſpectators which we can ſuppoſe to have aſſiſted at it. We ſhall only add, that this notion, which we have been offering here, doth include all the various conjectures, which our beſt antiquaries have been able to make of it, either from the various antient traditions of it, or from their own diſcoveries. It anſwers to that of a temple, by reaſon of its ſacredneſs, its reſemblance to the antient religious groves, and [n] See vol. v. p. 450.

and the ſacrifices and other rites performed there. It anſwers to that of a ſepulchral monument, on account of its being appropriated to the grandeſt funeral ceremonies, and its being the centre or kebla to all the adjacent monuments round about: to that of an amphitheatre, on account of the funeral games and ſhews exhibited at it; and may alſo have ſerved for a convening-place of the national council for the election and proclamation of a new king, general, or grand druid, whilſt rhey aſſiſted at the obſequies of a deceaſed one. Laſtly, it appears not to have been reared by either Romans, Saxons, or Danes, becauſe it is evidently prior to them all, for the reaſons we have alleged a little higher, to which we ſhall ſubjoin one more, as we are come now to ſpeak of the huge ſtones, that compoſe this ſtupendous fabric.

The ſtones whence and how brought hither.

We have already hinted, that their monſtrous largeneſs, joined to their apparent great diſtance from any quarry, and the many ups and downs through which they muſt have been conveyed hither, led the unthinking vulgar into the notion, that they were brought hither by magic, or the help of demons, according to ſome, and by giants, according to others, either of which were readily enough ſuppoſed able to bring them upon their backs from Africa (S); whilſt the wiſer ſort rather imagined them to be factitious, and caſt from ſome ſuch compoſition as ſand and morter, and the like, and hardened by the weather. This notion, as we hinted in a late note, has been ſufficiently, and, we may ſay, experimentally, diſproved, though to the great detriment and diſfiguring of the ſtones themſelves, and the endangering of the ſtructure. Theſe ſtones, rough and battered as they have been by theſe pretended curioſoes, as well as by a long ſeries of ages, appear to have been originally ſmoothed by the chizel, at leaſt as far as they ſtand above ground; for, as to that part which lies buried in the earth, it ſhews itſelf, upon digging round it, to be in its primitive roughneſs, and as it was digged up out of the quarry, or, as our author rather ſuppoſes, and with greater ſeem-

ing

(S) From a notion, which our author has likewiſe adopted, which ſuppoſes Afer to have been the ſame with Hepher, one of the ſons of Abraham by Keturah, to have come hither from Africa with Hercules, and to have brought with him the druids, who erected the fabric we are now ſpeaking of,

ing probability, as they were found lying on the ſurface of the ground in great numbers, and various dimenſions, perhaps ever ſince the creation of the world (T), and as they are to be ſeen ſtill in vaſt quantities upon Marlborough downs near Abury, at a place called from thence the Grey Wethers, and are of the ſame kind, viz. a baſtard white marble. Hence another argument is drawn of its being of antienter date than the coming of the Romans; for, by this time, the Belgæ, a colony of the Gauls, had ſeized upon, and ſeated themſelves in, that part of the country; ſo that the Britons muſt have fetched theſe ſtones from, and drawn them ſome miles through, an enemy's country, unleſs we could ſuppoſe, that thoſe Belgæ were the builders of Stonehenge; which is leſs probable than that the Britons did, becauſe theſe have left ſuch kinds of monumental piles where-ever they can be traced, as we hinted a little higher.

their bulk and weight.

The difficulty is, to convince how ſtones of that immenſe weight, one of which, though neither the largeſt nor heavieſt, has been computed, by proper judges, to weigh between thirty and forty tons, and conſequently would have required

(T) This is at leaſt our author's conjecture (30), which we muſt be content to ſubmit to our readers, till a more probable one be found out. We never had an opportunity of viewing thoſe Grey Wethers but at a diſtance, whence they appeared as huge ſtones dug from ſome neighbouring quarry, which, though not now to be found, might have been exhauſted, or covered up; in which caſe, theſe might have been deſigned by our antient Britiſh druids for ſome other edifices of the ſame nature, which they were obliged to ſet aſide, upon their being forced from this iſle into thoſe of Ireland, &c. and of which we ſhall ſpeak in due place; but doubtleſs our author, who has been a curious examiner into all theſe particulars, had his reaſons, though he doth not mention them, for not thinking them to have been dug out of any quarry, but to have lain there ſcattered from the beginning.

One thing is remarkable, that all theſe Britiſh ſtructures in Wiltſhire, and no others, are built of the ſame kind of ſtone as that of the Wethers; whereas the cathedral of Saliſbury, all their great churches, and other large edifices, are of quite another kind, and were hewn out of the quarry called Chilmark, in the ſame county and neighbourhood.

(30) B. Montfaucon. ſeplem. de l'antiquit. Mahudei. Relig. des Gaul. Keyzler. Chorier. Hiſtor. Delphinal. La Faille annal. Toloſan. & al.

required about an hundred and fifty oxen to have drawn it, could be conveyed from their original ſeat to Stonehenge, which is ſixteen computed miles, and along ſuch uneven ground, and in ſuch quantities as compoſe the fabric. Sure it is, that no carriage can be conceived, which would not have been ſunk into the ground by ſuch a monſtrous weight, unleſs it be that of rollers; but even this muſt appear a more than Herculean labour; the arduouſneſs of which cannot be extenuated, but by the ſuppoſition, that the whole, or at leaſt the greateſt part, of the nation contributed their help towards it, in their turns.

Diſpoſition and form.

THE rearing of them afterwards in ſuch form and ſituation, was a work of no leſs difficulty; for though we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that they were all pecked and chizelled, had their mortiſes and tenons wrought, and every thing done, that could lighten and fit them for the deſign, at the place where they were brought from, yet every man will eaſily perceive what an immenſe labour it muſt be to rear ſtones of that vaſt bulk and weight, to place them in their proper places, and at ſuch due diſtances, that the architraves or impoſts, that locked them to each other at the top, ſhould fall ſo exactly every mortiſe upon his own tenon, as we find they actually do to this day; for it is plain to every eye that views them carefully, that each of theſe tenons are ſo exactly fitted to its mortiſe, that if either of the ſtanding ſtones had been ſet ever ſo little out of its place, and perpendicular, they could never have locked one in the other, till they were reduced to their due diſtance and poſition; eſpecially conſidering that there were at leaſt fifteen in number of this large ſort, ſet up two and two, the whole in a beautiful oval, neareſt to a circle, and exactly locked each to the other by architraves of proportionable bigneſs. Each tenon is a druidiſh cubit, ſomewhat above twenty inches in diameter (V) on the broadeſt ſide; for they are of an oval figure, and the mortiſes exactly anſwerable

(V) Dr. Stukeley hath clearly demonſtrated, that this fabric was never built according to the Roman meaſure, from the great number of fractions and uncouth numbers, that occur in the meaſuring of each part, but according to the antient cubit, &c. which was common to the Hebrews, Phœnicians, Egyptians, &c. as well as, as it appears here, to the druids and antient Celtes. His proofs the reader will ſee in the work itſelf (31); for it is not for us to dwell on thoſe.

(31) P. 6, & ſeq. & plat. vi.

ſwerable to it. By this contrivance the impoſts or architraves lie firm locked upon the uprights, and theſe are kept firm to each other. Where the impoſts are heavieſt, the tenons are ſhorteſt; and where thoſe are lighteſt, and conſequently more in danger to be ſhaken, as in thoſe of the outward circle, theſe are made longeſt, and the mortiſes deeper accordingly. If the bottom face of the impoſt be divided into three ſquares, the two mortiſes will be found in the middle of the two outward ones: draw diagonal lines from corner to corner, and where they interſect is the center of the mortiſe; which central diſtance from one to the other is ſeven druidiſh cubits, or about eight of ours. We might mention ſeveral other curious particulars, which make the whole appear to have been done geometrically, and from ſuch plain and ſimple principles, as would beſt anſwer every purpoſe of the grand deſign; but for theſe we muſt, in a work of this nature, refer our readers to the author's account [o], to avoid prolixity. But from what has been ſaid, the reader may frame an idea of the curiouſneſs, as well as arduouſneſs, of the work, which, conſidering its regular complexity and ſymmetry, muſt be owned to outvie all that we read of ſingle obeliſks, pillars, and ſtatues, how gigantic ſoever, if we except the pyramids of Egypt, and the Rhodian coloſſus, of which we have given an account in former volumes [p].

The fabric deſcribed.

THE whole fabric conſiſted of four circles, or rather ovals, of ſtones, the moſt conſiderable of which had ten uprights, and five architraves or impoſts, making up five trilithons, each trilithon conſiſting of two uprights and one impoſt, which locked together at the top by the tenons and mortiſes above-mentioned. Theſe trilithons were not all of the ſame height, as our author obſerved, and is indeed the only one we know, that has taken notice of this elegancy; but each of them raiſed its head or impoſt ſomewhat higher, as it drew neareſt to that before which the altar is judged to have ſtood, and which appears to have been not only the higheſt, but fineſt, both for the ſmoothneſs and beauty of the ſtones. The height of theſe trilithons, with their architrave or cornice, is computed in a medium, to be about twenty-four feet; for there is no coming at an exact dimenſion in a work ſo decayed by time and weather; the uprights being between twenty and twenty-one feet high, and leſſening a little upwards to the top, and the cornice computed about three feet and a half, making up up the complement of twenty-four feet. Theſe impoſts, on the outward face, bore the ſame ſweep with the oval which they compoſed; but, on the inſide, went in a ſtrait line. They ſeem likewiſe to have been ſomewhat broader on the top than at the bottom; ſo that their ſides bear a little ſlant downwards, whether to preſerve them the better from the weather, or to make up the ſhortening, which is cauſed by their elevation from the ſight. The gradual aſcent of theſe three orders, as they may be termed, of trilithons, is, according to our author [q], thirteen, fourteen and fifteen druidiſh cubits. The breadth of each trilithon is computed, in a medium, about ten cubits of the ſame meaſure, and is conſequently the length at leaſt of the impoſt. Each upright is about three feet nine inches thick, and twice that, i. e. ſeven feet and an half in breadth, or four cubits and an half druidiſh. Each trilithon, which compoſes this oval cell, ſtands at ſuch convenient diſtance from the other, as to yield a beautiful proſpect into it, which is not a little heightened by the ſpace which ſtands between the two uprights, and which widens upwards, as theſe leſſen in their breadth, and form an oval from its two centres, whoſe longeſt radius is fifteen, and ſhorteſt twelve, druidiſh cubits; ſo that the ellipſis is formed by a line of ſixty cubits; which, being joined at the two ends, and turned round the two centres, give a diameter of thirty cubits at the longeſt, and twenty-five at the ſhorteſt, five cubits being the ſuppoſed diſtance between the two centres (W).

[o] Ubi ſup. p. 26, & ſeq. vol. vii. p. 400, & ſeq.

[p] See vol. i. p. 570, & ſeq.

THIS was the figure and greatneſs of that which Mr. Jones called the cell, and our author the adytum or the concha, of, what they ſuppoſed the fabric to be, the temple, and which we have taken the more pains in deſcribing, as it is indeed the grandeſt part of the whole. As for the remainder of the ſtructure, though it bears an exact and beautiful proportion with it, we ſhall

[q] P. 26.

(W) Hence, among ſeveral other arguments, one may infer, that this nich or cell could not be originally ſuch an hexagon, as Mr. Jones ſuppoſed it; much leſs could it be formed, as he pretended at the ſix points of three equilateral triangles; for, if this had been the caſe, there muſt have been ſix inſtead of five trilithons; but here is not the leaſt footſtep of a ſixth, no ſtump or fragment of it, nor cavity in the earth, where it may be ſuppſed to have ſtood; ſo that three ſtones of that immenſe weight and magnitude, as we have deſcribed them, muſt be imagined to have been ſpirited away by the ſame magic art, by which the vulgar ſuppoſed the whole to have been reared, before we can think, that it ever had this trigonometrical form.

ſhall content ourſelves with mentioning the moſt remarkable parts of each, without entering into a detail of all the particulars. Within this grand oval, is another of much leſſer, though harder and finer ſtones. This circle, together with the long ſtone now broken, which is ſuppoſed to have been the altar; and is of a darkiſh-blue marble, ſuch as is often ſet upon common altar tombs, and about ſixteen feet in length, conſiſts of twenty ſtones, the greateſt part of which are ſadly broken and mangled; but not ſo much as to hinder a curious obſerver from recovering the form and order in which they ſtood, though their uſe and deſign is hard to be gueſſed at. Another circle or oval of forty ſtones ſurrounded the cell or adytum at a proper diſtance. Theſe were likewiſe of a much leſſer ſize; after which one comes out to the greateſt or outer circle, compoſed of thirty ſtones, likewiſe harder, and ſomewhat of a pyramidal form. It ſeems as if the founders had wiſely provided, that their leſſer bulk ſhould be compenſated by their ſolidity. The difference between this outward circle, and that of the cell or adytum, conſiſted in this, that the architraves of the trilithons of the latter did not touch one another, but preſerved the ſame diſtance with the two uprights, on which they were locked; whereas, in the former or outward circle, the ſtanders were joined by a continued cornice. Each ſtander or upright here had two tenons, at equal diſtances on the top, by which the two impoſts were locked by their mortiſes, and ſo continued quite round, in the form of a crown or cornice. The whole was ſurrounded by a vallum or deep ditch at a proportionate diſtance, as we have hinted above; and this, with the grand avenue, and the gradual aſcent up to the fabric, afforded a noble proſpect, both as you advanced towards it, and much more when you viewed from it all the champaign country round about it. And thus much ſhall ſuffice for us to ſay on this ſtupendous Britiſh fabric, which has aſtoniſhed and puzzled all the architects, antiquaries, and curioſoes, that have either ſeen or read of it. We hope we have made a ſufficient apology for our anticipating this ſhort account of it here, which might otherwiſe have more properly belonged to the Britiſh hiſtory; and that the accurate author, from whom we have taken the moſt conſiderable and curious part of it, will not take it amiſs, that we have not followed his hypotheſis of its having been a druidiſh temple, when he conſiders the reaſons we have given for aſſerting, that neither Gauls, Germans, nor antient Britons, had ever any ſuch buildings, till long after their being conquered by the Romans, and being forced to introduce a foreign religion amongſt them, that is, the worſhip of Jupiter Mars, Mercury, and a great number of other inferior deities. How and when this was moſt probably brought about, we ſhall endeavour to account for in the next ſection.

of

SECT. III.

How and when the antient Gauls introduced the worſhip of inferior deities among them.

IT is plain, by what we have quoted out of Cæſar, Strabo, Lucan, and others, that though the Romans had had a conſiderable footing in Gaul before the coming of that conqueror, yet they had not been able to perſuade them to imitate them in their rearing of temples to any deity. If they had, Cæſar would not have failed hinting ſomething of it, it being one of the chief maxims of his republic, to ſpread their religion, laws, and cuſtoms where-ever they came; ſo that, if the Gauls had ever been forced, or prevailed upon, to build any ſuch temples in their country, it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that he would have omitted mentioning it; he who took ſuch pleaſure to tell us how many petty kingdoms and commonwealths he had brought over to the Roman intereſt, and to a fondneſs for ſome of their cuſtoms. Since then there is not the leaſt hint of it either in that or any author, but the contrary plainly appears to have been the practice of this nation, we may ſafely conclude they had not begun, even in his days, and under his government, to introduce this foreign cuſtom, tho' could it be made appear, that any ſuch ſtructures had been reared then, yet would it not from thence follow, that it was done by the Gauls, but would appear more probably to have been done by the Romans, who, as we obſerved at the beginning of the laſt ſection, made it a part of their religion to adopt the gods, to vow temples and ſtatues, and afterwards to rear them in every country they conquered; whereas the Gauls made it a conſtant maxim of theirs to wage open war againſt, to plunder and demoliſh, all ſuch ſtructures, from a principle bred amongſt them, in common with the Perſes, that it was offering an indignity to the Supreme Being to confine him within any place; which made Cicero, who was not deeply verſed in the Gauliſh religion, ſay, that it chiefly conſiſted in a hoſtile contrariety to all others (A).

When temples, altars, and ſtatues, began to be reared in Gaul.

WE

(A) Whether it was his ignorance or contempt of their principles, or done out of a deſign to make his client's cauſe appear

We cannot affirm with the ſame certainty, that they did not imitate the Romans in another part of their religion, the worſhip of a plurality of gods and goddeſſes, before their conqueſt. We are told, that they worſhipped Mars under the emblem of a naked ſword, and that Mercury was in the higheſt veneration among them all over Gaul [a], doubtleſs on account of the vaſt benefits and improvements, which their trade, commerce, arts, and ſciences, had received from him, and of which we have ſpoken in a former volume [b]. Here is indeed no mention of temples, altars, but only of ſtatues reared to them; and probably that worſhip might, at firſt, be no more than a civil one, though it grew up, in time, into downright idolatry and polytheiſm. Theſe two deities, as well as Uranus, Saturn, Jupiter, Apollo, Juno, Venus, Diana, pear more juſtifiable (1), he expreſſes himſelf in theſe virulent terms againſt the Gauls, that they profeſſed no other religion than that of waging war againſt thoſe of all other nations, and againſt the very gods themſelves. He accuſes them of having left their native ſoil, and croſſed immenſe tracts of land, merely to go and attack the Delphic Apollo, and plunder the oracle of the whole world. This, continues he, is that holy nation, which had the boldneſs to beſiege our capitol, and even the great Jupiter himſelf in it.

[a] Comment. ubi ſup. l. vi. [b] See vol. v. p. 434, (D), & ſeq.

We ſhall have occaſion, in the ſequel of this hiſtory, to explode the greateſt part of this charge, for which that orator ſo foully inveighs againſt them. All that we ſhall obſerve here is, that they had, at that time, neither regard for the pretended gods of other nations, nor for the pretended ſanctity of their temples, but rather a ſingular contempt for the one, and abhorrence of the other; and this ſhews, that they had not as yet adopted any of the Greek or Roman rites into their religion, whatever they did afterwards.

One thing may be obſerved, that the general character, which the authors of both theſe nations give of the Gauls, is a continued contradiction, one while repreſenting them as people of no religion or principles, and at other time as the moſt addicted to all kind of ſuperſtition of any nation under heaven: all which can be only reconciled by allowing, that they actually had a religion of their own, of which they were ſo tenacious, that they deſpiſed all others for the ſake of it.

(1) Orat. pro M. Fonteio.

Diana, &c. being all of Celtic extraction, as has been formerly ſhewn, it was much more natural for the Gauls to deify them, as having formerly reigned over their nation, than for the Romans and Greeks to adopt or challenge them from others as their own, and, in proceſs of time, to ſtrive to outvie them in thoſe divine honours, which the reſt of the world paid to them. This will, in ſome meaſure, lead us to the motives of that great change, which they ſuffered to be made in their antient religion, for thoſe temples which they erected, and for thoſe ſacrifices which they offered, to all thoſe deified monarchs, till at length they ſunk down into the ſame abſurd notions concerning them with the reſt of the idolatrous world; and the notion of Eſus, or ſupreme Deity, was ſwallowed up into that of a Jupiter, as it had been every-where elſe; and this might reach no farther neither than the vulgar, whilſt the druids and wiſe men among the Gauls, as well as the philoſophers among the Greeks and Romans, ſtill preſerved the notion of one Supreme Being, and either pitied, or perhaps laughed and winked at, the reſt of the pretended deities, heathen theology, and fooliſh ſuperſtition.

The druids forced to it.

BUT neither is this account altogether ſatisfactory, conſidering the averſion and contempt which the Gauls had of all other religions; and this extraordinary change will perhaps be better accounted for, if we can ſhew, with any probability, that they were rather forced to it by thoſe, under whoſe tyranny they came afterwards to groan, than out of any vain imitation of their neighbours, or affectation of reſpect for their deceaſed princes and heroes. It is not to be doubted, but to ſuch a brave and warlike nation as the Gauls, among whom one conſtant maxim was univerſally followed, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel, to prefer the worſt of deaths to the loſs of liberty, the Roman yoke muſt appear intolerable; and that they could not be expected to ſubmit to it longer than they were forced to it by the ſuperior power of their tyrants; and as theſe made it their conſtant practice to introduce, either by fair or foul means, their religion, laws, and cuſtoms, where-ever they conquered, the druids, tenacious as they were of their own, could not but be extremely averſe to all ſuch changes, and uſe all their power and authority, which was ſtill very great, and almoſt uncontroulable (B), either to oppoſe

(B) It plainly appears, that this high power of theirs, except what related to religion, was not of very antient date; and that they raiſed themſelves to it in proceſs of time, by the help of the people's oppoſe them, or to prevail on the people to ſhake off the yoke. This their hiſtory will ſhew they did upon all favourable opportunities that offered; ſo that there was a kind of neceſſity for the Romans to find out ſome plauſible pretence to ſtrip them of their great ſway, and force them to a blind and thorough ſubmiſſion. Accordingly we find, that ſeveral emperors took an effectual method to ſuppreſs the druidiſh power (C), by iſſuing out ſome ſevere edicts againſt their bloody people's ſuperſtition. Antiently the women ſeem to have had a greater ſway in all civil matters, and even about making peace and war. This privilege they had even before their firſt expedition into Italy; and it appears that they held it ſtill, when Hannibal paſſed through Gaul to croſs the Alps; for, in the treaty they made with him, it was agreed, that, if a Gaul offered any injury to a Carthaginian, he ſhould be tried before the court of the Gauliſh women (2). The reaſon of this great ſway is variouſly accounted for: ſome think, that they were looked upon as inſpired; others think, it was owing to their having ſhewn a ſuperior degree of wiſdom in quenching a civil war, which the men had kindled among themſelves. The Germans, according to Tacitus (3), allowed them the very ſame privileges; and we find ſomething like this practiſed by the Elians, who, having in vain ſued for ſatisfaction from Demophoon tyrant of Piſa, agreed with the Piſans, after his death, to ſubmit their difference to a court of ſixteen women, to be choſen out of ſixteen cities of the Elians. Our author adds (4), that their deciſion ſo pleaſed both parties, that they appointed a perpetual college of ſixteen matrons to preſide over the Junonian games, and to aſſign the prize to whom they thought worthieſt of it.

However, with reſpect to the Gauliſh women, though we cannot aſcertain the time when they loſt this their authority, yet it is plain, by what Cæſar ſays of that extenſive one (5), which the druids had in his time, that they had found means to ſtrip thoſe female heroes of theirs.

(C) We are told by three Roman authors, that Claudius did quite aboliſh this ſect, and their inhuman ſuperſtition (6). The laſt quoted calls him indeed Tiberius, from which ſome have aſcribed this edict to the emperor of that name, though wrongfully; for he only calls Claudius by his prenomen, Claudius being called Tiberius Claudius Nero Druſus; and it doth not appear,

(2) Plut. de mulier. Polyæn. ſtrat. l. vii. (3) Hiſt. l. iv. c. 61. (4) Pauſan. Eliac. (5) Comm. l. vi. (6) Suet. in vit. Claud. Senec. in luctu de morte Claud. Plin. hiſt. nat. l. xxx. c. 1.

bloody cuſtom of offering human ſacrifices. Auguſtus was the firſt who iſſued out a decree againſt them, and at the ſame time introduced a cenſus among the Gauls; upon which the whole nation was juſt ready for a revolt. But by the addreſs and authority of Druſus, who was left there by him, they were not only prevented from riſing, but prevailed upon to aſſiſt at the dedication of Julius Cæſar's temple, and to build an altar to Auguſtus [c]. However, it is plain, that the edict of the latter was not executed there, and the druids, by this time in leſs authority with the people, might buy it off, by rearing the above-mentioned altar to him; and this is the reaſon why Claudius renewed it againſt them. But, whatever the pretence of thoſe edicts might be, it is ſcarce credible, that religion had any hand in them; and they might as well have fallen foul upon all other nations under their empire, nay, and upon their own, ſince none was exempt from this barbarous cuſtom, much leſs the Romans, as the reader may infer from what we have ſaid in their hiſtory, and elſewhere [d]. However that be, it doth not appear, that even theſe took any more effect againſt them than that of Auguſtus, ſince we find them ſtill not only in high vogue ſome centuries after, but even authorized by the emperors Severus, Aurelian, and Diocleſian. They ſubſiſted ſtill, even down to the times of Solinus Polyhiſtor, and of Euſebius of Cæſarea [e], and much appear, that the other Tiberius made any ſuch edict againſt that cuſtom, but only againſt aſtrologers, whom he baniſhed from Rome (7). And here we beg leave to rectify a miſtake, which inadvertently ſlided into our Carthaginian hiſtory (8), where we ſaid, that the emperor Tiberius puniſhed the African prieſts for their practice of theſe human ſacrifices; whereas it ſhould have been ſaid, Tiberius the proconſul of Afric under the emperor Adrian; for it appears by Tertullian's account of it, that his own father was a centurion under him (9); which can by no means agree with the rank, nor with the times of the emperor of that name. We hope our readers will be candid enough to overlook ſuch overſights in a work of this extenſive nature, eſpecially when they find how ready we are to acknowledge and rectify them, as ſoon as we have diſcovered them.

[c] See vol. xiii. p. 416. [d] See vol. xiv. p. 599, 600, 645. vol. xv. p. 104, 153. vol. xvi. p. 608, 639, & ſeq. [e] Polyhiſt. c. 21. Præp. evang. l. iv. c. 17.

(7) Vide Xiphil. ex Dion. lvii. (8) Vol. xvi. p. 639. (9) Vide apolog. c. 9.

longer ſtill in their chief abode in the province of Chartrain, where whole towns continued in their antient paganiſm, even down to the fifth century[f]. Neither did thoſe edicts ſuppreſs the practice of human victims amongſt the Romans themſelves, among whom they continued to the time of Conſtantime the Great, and even down to that of Gratian, who gave the finiſhing blow to it[g].

How and where introduced.

FROM all this it appears very probable, that theſe edicts againſt the druids, and their bloody rites, were not ſo much iſſued out to aboliſh their ſect and religion, as to intimidate them, and ſuppreſs their exorbitant power, which, ſomewhat before this time, was grown to ſuch a height, that they over-ruled in all courts and councils, raiſed whom they liked to the higheſt dignities, and even to the crown, and often aſpired at and obtained it for ſome of their own order. They directed in the making of peace and war, and, even after they were conquered by the Romans, could ſtir up the people to a general revolt; and ſo jealous were they grown of their uſurped authority, that they puniſhed, as we have hinted a little higher, all that diſobeyed or diſputed their commands with excommunication, and even with death. Nothing could therefore be more ſuitable to the Roman policy, than to uſe all poſſible means to ſuppreſs and cruſh ſo dangerous a ſet of men; and ſince religion was the common pretext to all their exorbitant ſway, ſo that there was no poſſibility of pulling down the one, without aboliſhing the other, it was natural for their conquerors to uſe all their power and addreſs to bring about ſuch a thorough change, and introduce their religion amongſt them; and there might not perhaps be a more favourable opportunity than that which this period offered them, when the Gauliſh nation, groaning under a double, and, we may add, a divided tyranny, that of their conquerors, and that of their druids, would, in all likelihood, think it no ſmall eaſe to be rid at leaſt of one of their yokes, and that perhaps which, at that time, ſeemed the moſt intolerable of the two; for it muſt be remembered, that the Romans ſeldom made uſe of force, when they could gain their ends by cajoling and flattery, by fair promiſes, or even bribes and rewards; whereas the druids, if we may believe the Roman authors, bore all down with an arbitrary and uncontrouled ſway, till being overpowered by their enemies, and forſaken by their own people, they were at length forced forced to submit to, and exchange their religion and rites for, those of their conquerors.

[f] Vide relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 32.

[g] See vol. xiv. p. 645.

THIS at least appears, by several concurring circumstances, to have happened about the time of these edicts; for, in Cæsar's time, who left the Gauls to the free enjoyment of their rites, and even of many of their laws and customs, there was not as yet any temple built, or any place of worship, but their oaks and groves. In the very next reign, we find the Lugdunenses building a stately temple to that conqueror, and an altar to Augustus, then on the throne, and a professed enemy to the druids and their religion. Under his successor Tiberius, their chief deity Esus is transformed into Jupiter the god of heaven and earth, or rather, as it should seem, divides his worship with him for a while (D). Both are worshipped at first in groves, and under oaks; and at length the former is quite swallowed up in the latter, and temples, altars, and statues, are erected to him after the Roman manner over all the conquered parts of Gaul. After a few reigns more, during which they were still greatly oppressed, Gaul at length overrun with them.

(D) This is inferred from some antient bas-reliefs found in the great church of Paris, in which both these deities are carved one close to the other, the inscription of which is indeed to Jupiter; but the ceremony of the oaky mistleto, with the words Senani veilo, shews, that Esus was looked upon still as the chief godhead there represented.

We would not rely too much upon these dark and enigmatic monuments, which every antiquary wrests according to his own favourite hypothesis. Sure it is, that, in the time of Maximus Tyriensis, who lived about an hundred years after Tiberius, Esus was already transformed into Jupiter, and worshipped under the type of a large oak (9). The author of the life of St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz, tells us, that that prelate found no better expedient to bring his people from their old superstition to christianity, than by cutting down an oak of a very large size, called the oak of Jove, and the strength of Jove (10). The same is said to have been done, with like success, by still later preachers (11). So long did this veneration for those trees continue, as one may say, in the heart of christianity. We may add, that the name of Jupiter doth not appear to have been adopted by the Gauls, but only that of Jove, which we have already shewn is of Celtic original (12).

(9) Max. Tyr. serm. xxxviii. (10) Hensch. apud relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c 5. (11) Bzovii annal. sub ann. 1233. ap. eand. (12) See before vol. v. p. 428, & seq.

and made ſeveral vain attempts to regain their liberty, eſpecially under Caligula and Claudius [h], who ſucceeded Tiberius, the whole country is filled with Roman temples, all their deities adopted and worſhipped, and ſcarce any traces left of their antient religion, but their bloody rites of offering human victims to theſe new deities, and perhaps alſo in their auguries; which occaſioned the above-mentioned decrees againſt them. To theſe we may add the great veneration which they ſtill retained for their oaks, notwithſtanding their multiplicity of temples, and which continued, according to ſome authors, till the twelfth and thirteenth century. One of theſe was dedicated to an hundred deities, as appears by the inſcription engraven on a neighbouring column, which the reader will find in the margin (E). However, the ſluice thus broken, an inundation of ſuperſtition and idolatry enſued, which nothing could reſiſt; and the Gauls, having once ſhaken off the yoke of their druids, became ſo enamoured with the pageantry of polytheiſm, that they deified at length lakes, rivers, marſhes, and even fountains, to all which they aſcribed ſome peculiar deity, and extraordinary virtues; upon which account it was looked upon as the higheſt ſacrilege to fiſh in them, to draw or drain them, and eſpecially to lay hands on any treaſures that were committed to their care and protection (F). To all theſe changes

Run into all kinds of ſuperſtition.

[h] See vol. xiv. p. 76, & ſeq.

(E) This oak being afterwards cut down by St. Severus, the inſcription engraven was to preſerve the memory of it; ARBOREM DIVUS SEVERUS EVERTIT CENTUM DEORUM. Our author adds, that, in rooting it up, they found a head full of gold and ſilver, which was laid out by that ſaint in the building of a church ſince dedicated to him, as appears by the epitaph upon his tomb (13).

(F) Of theſe lakes, fountains, &c. ſome were dedicated to one deity, ſome to another. Tacitus pretends to give us the reaſon why the Gauls deified them, becauſe, ſays he, they were nearer heaven, and conſequently nearer the ear of thoſe deities, to whom they pray from thence (14). This is a very fooliſh one; and it is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that they fanſied thoſe deities to be changes the druids found themſelves obliged to ſubmit, to avoid the penalties of thoſe edicts; and ſo compliable did they ſhew themſelves, that, from that time, whether to ſhew their complaiſance to the Romans, or to take off the odium which their name laid them under, they exchanged it for that of Senani, which, in their language, ſignified the ſame as elder or venerable with us. From hence we may date their downfal, though not their total abolition till ſome ages after; for, being once reduced to ſuch a low ebb of authority, or rather being once ſtripped of it, and become ſuch ſervile creatures to their new and potent maſters, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that theſe would ever ſuffer them to recover it again, but, if they ſtill permitted them to make a gain of religion, it ſhould be only in the worſhip and rites of thoſe new deities, which they had now adopted. This was an effectual means to induce them to give into all kinds of Roman and Greek ſuperſtitions, or even to outdo them in it, ſince it would open a new door to their intereſt, inſtead of the old one that had been ſtopped up.

(13) Jo. de Boſc. antiq. Vien. p. 4. Tableau des prov. Franç. tom. ii. p. 107. apud eund. (14) Annal. l. xv.

be more immediately preſent there. However, ſuch regard they had for them, that the ſame author tells us, that the Hermonduri and Catti waged a bloody war againſt each other for the property of one of theſe fountains, which was a ſalt one; and that the former at length gained their point againſt the latter, by a vow which they made to ſacrifice their enemies, and all their ſpoil, to Mars and Mercury; which was accordingly done; the Catti were all maſſacred without mercy, together with their horſes, cattle, and all their ſpoil, and flung into the lake (15).

However, unleſs it be upon ſuch bloody devowments, we do not find, that they offered any victims to them; but abundance of gold, ſilver, rich cloaths, and other coſtly things, they flung into them, which it was ſacrilege to touch. We have ſpoken of the famous like of Tholouſe dedicated to Apollo, whoſe treaſures, eſpecially in gold and ſilver ingots, and maſſy utenſils, amounted to immenſe ſums, and was continually encreaſed by freſh offerings (16). In time theſe places became ſo liable to be plundered by foreign nations, as well as perhaps by their neighbours, that they began to repoſit thoſe ſacred treaſures in their temples, of which they had ſoon after a vaſt number, as we ſhall ſee in due time.

(15) Ibid. ſub fin.

(16) Oroſ. l. v. c. 15. Cic. de nat. deor. l. iii. Aul. Gell. l. iii. c. 9.

up. We have taken notice, in the last note, of the immense treasures, which were flung into their consecrated lakes, rivers, and afterwards into their temples; and who can imagine those druids and priests to have been as scrupulous as the stupid laity, of converting any part of it to their own uses? But this we must submit to our readers, who will be better able to judge of it, if we subjoin here some few more instances of this kind of superstition; for it were endless to mention them all, they were grown to such number and variety.

One lake they had in some part of Gaul neareſt the ocean, which received its name from two white ravens, with whitish wings, which constantly kept about it. Incredible wonders were told of it [i]. Amongst others, it was much resorted to in matters of controversy between parties. Each of the contenders brought a kind of cake, and laid it at the end of the same plank, which was set afloat on the lake, to be exposed to these ravens, whose custom, it seems, was to devour one of the cakes, and to crumble and scatter the other; and this last gave the cause to its owner. Another we read of at the foot of a mountain in the neighbourhood of Savoy, dedicated to the moon, under the name of Helanus, which signifies splendor. It was resorted to by all the neighbouring people once a year, who threw into it, some cloaths, linen, fleeces of wool; others bread, cheese, wax, and the like, according as they could afford it. Here they kept a sumptuous feast, which lasted three whole days, a sufficient quantity of provisions being brought in waggons to the place. On the fourth day, we are told [k], when they were ready to return home, there constantly arose such storms of wind, thunder, rain, and hail, as made them afraid for their lives. We have taken notice how they used the waters of the Rhine to discover the fidelity of their wives, and the legitimacy of their issue. They seem to have had a much greater veneration for this river, than for any other. The offerings and sacrifices offered to it were of a peculiar kind: whole armies called upon it for help and victory, and the sight of it, or of any of its waters, inspired the soldiers with courage and bravery [l]. Each river, fountain, lake, or pool, was looked upon as inhabited by some deity, and had some peculiar and extraordinary virtues ascribed to it, for the sake of which the credulous credulous people reſorted to them in ſhoals, and with proper offerings, every one according to their ability. Some others of their ſuperſtitions we ſhall haye occaſion to hint in the ſequel; and theſe ſhall ſuffice to ſhew into what lengths they ran in their imitation of the Greeks and Romans, and what profit their druids, bards, &c. are like to have made of them (G).

[i] Strab. l. iv. ad fin.
[k] Greg. Tur. glor. conf. c. 2.
[l] Tacit. hist. l. v. c. 18.

THIS multiplicity of deities, or rather of lakes, marſhes, &c. conſecrated to them, did not hinder them from building temples, altars and ſtatues to them after the Roman manner, and not only in great number, but ſome of them very ſtately, and in the grand taſte, as one may infer from ſome remains of them, and other monuments of that nation; but yet in theſe they commonly ſacrificed to the gods only brute victims, and offered their vows and rich donatives in them; but, as to human ſacrifices, they ſtill offered them, it ſeems [m], under their oaks, and in their groves; but whether they did it for privacy, or for fear of the Romans, and to avoid the penalty of their edicts, or ſtill retained their antient notion of that ſupreme being, to whom they thought them more peculiarly to belong, is not eaſy to determine (H). To give our readers a ſpecimen of theſe new buildings, we are told, that the ſtatues of theſe gods, ſuch as Pennin, Mercury, Diana, &c. of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel, were placed ſometimes on a pedeſtal, which ſerved

[m] See relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 15.

(G) It may not be amiſs to obſerve here to our readers, that this deifying of lakes, rivers, and ſprings, might probably be owing to ſome extraordinary qualities and virtues they obſerved in their waters, eſpecially ſuch as were of a hot and medicinal nature. Even lakes and rivers, though leſs extraordinary on any ſuch account, might yet riſe to this height of veneration, on that of their perpetual flowing, and diſcharging ſuch conſtant ſtreams of water, without being exhauſted; of all which the druids, though well enough acquainted with the natural reaſon, (for they were great philoſophers) might yet make a myſtery with the vulgar, for their own politic ends.

(H) The former ſeems the moſt probable, becauſe they did likewiſe chooſe to offer theſe victims in caves, rocks, precipices, and other deſert and unfrequented places, which they choſe ſometimes by mere chance, and as they fell in their way; at other times ſerved likewiſe for an altar, ſometimes on a column of a prodigious height [n]. In ſome they were expoſed to the open air, and in others ſheltered by an edifice of poliſhed ſtones in form of a cupola or cone. Their temples were no leſs rich and magnificent, witneſs that famed one called Vaſſo at Clermont in Auvergne, the walls of which are affirmed to have been thirty feet thick, covered, on the outſide, with carved ſtones, and on the inſide with ſmall ones nicely wrought and poliſhed, and on the top incruſtated with marble, and compartments of Moſaic work. The pavement was likewiſe of marble, and the top covered with lead [o]. A learned French antiquary mentions eight of theſe ſtately fabrics of an octagonal form, and whoſe eight faces were adorned with a number of Gauliſh deities, generally eight in number in thoſe which he himſelf obſerved; which made him ſuſpect, that this combination of numbers contained ſome druidiſh myſteries, which are now quite out of our reach [p] (I). We ſhall refer our readers to the two authors times by their auguries and lots: all which ſeems to intimate, that they avoided being ſeen at theſe bloody ceremonies by any other people (17), eſpecially the Romans, who had ſo ſtrictly forbid them.

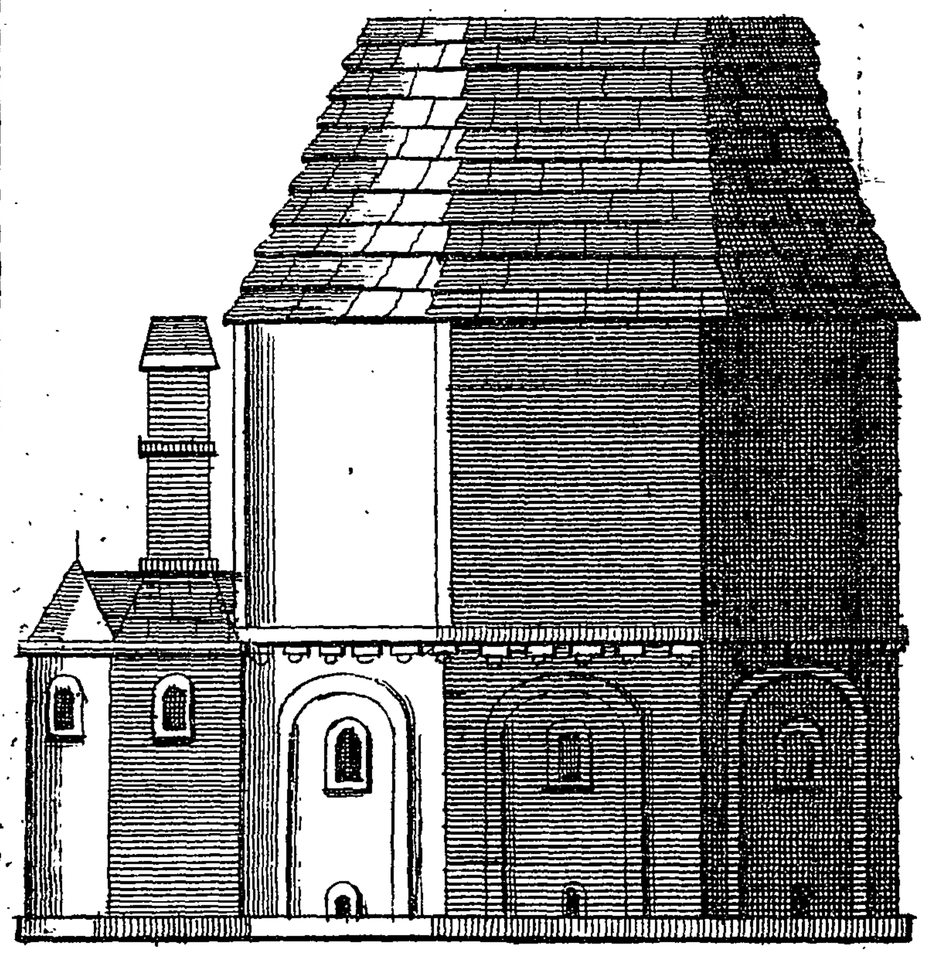
Their temples deſcribed.



[n] Greg. Tur. l. viii. c. 15. Sulp. Sever. dial. l. iii. c. 9, & ſeq. Guich. hiſt. des ſcavant. ap. relig. des Gaul. ubi ſup.
[o] Iidem ibid. [p] Suplement de l' antiq. tom. ii. See alſo relig. des Gaul. ubi ſup. c. 16, & ſeq.

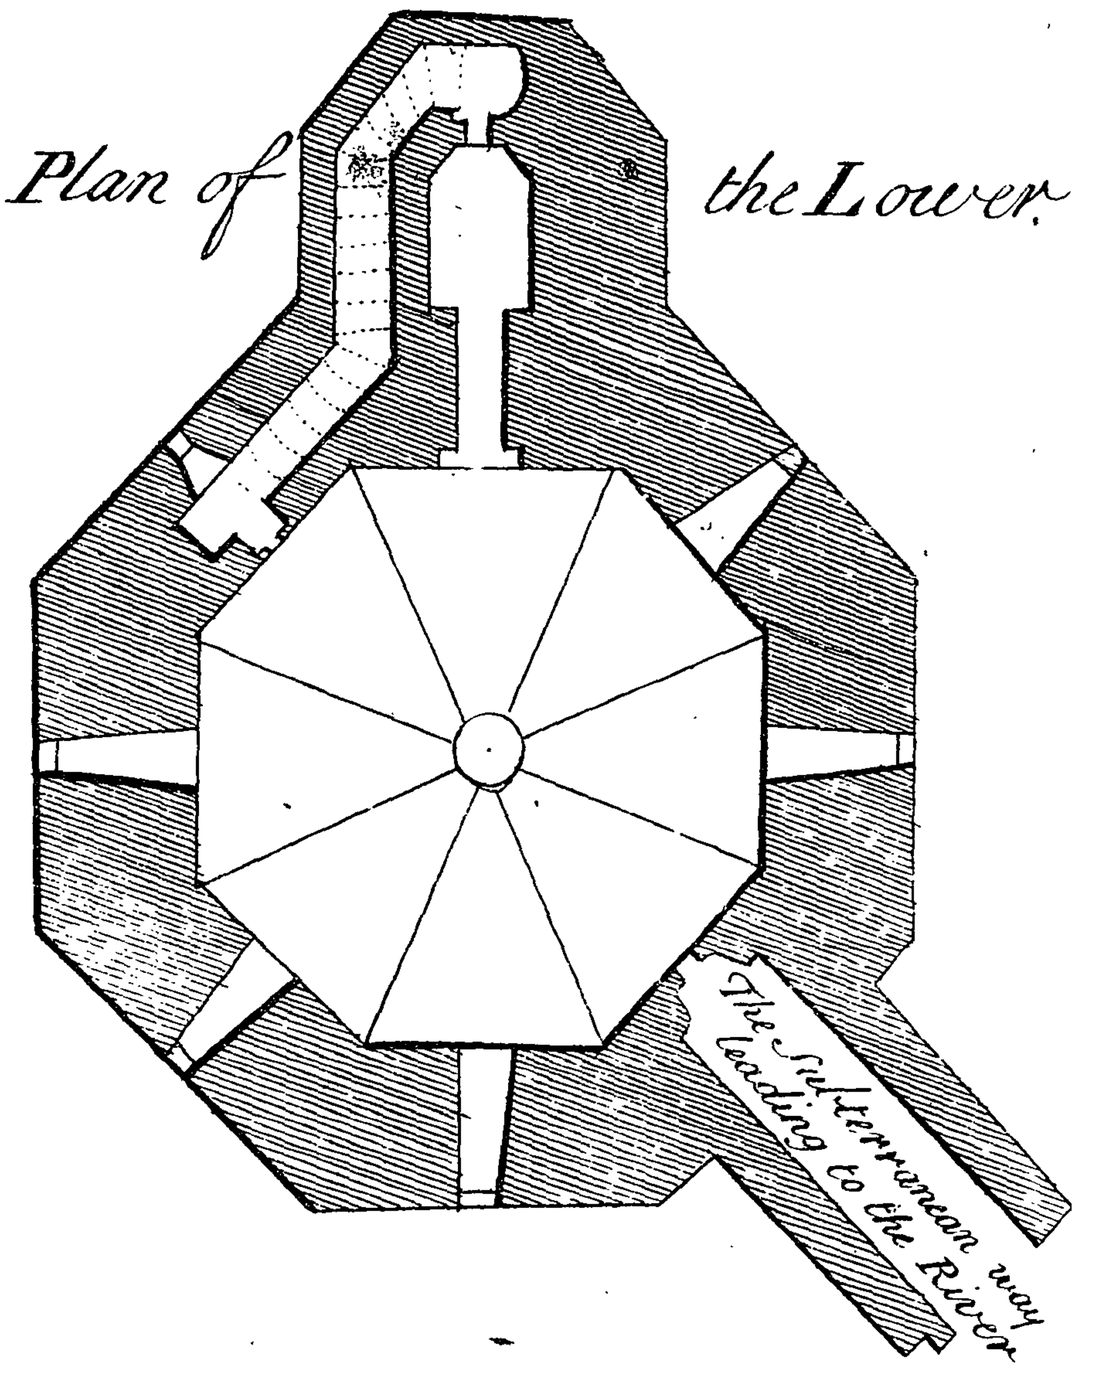
(I) The author of the religion of the Gauls has however diſproved the conjecture of that learned antiquary, by ſhewing (18), that this octagonal form was common among the Romans, as well as the Gauls; and that the latter had temples of different forms, ſome round, ſome oblong, ſome decagonal, without any apparent myſtical deſign. The thing is not worth diſputing at this diſtance; and it doth not appear, that the Gauls had any ſuch regard for the number eight. They had indeed a greater one, if we may believe Pliny (19), for the number ſix, which was held ſo ſacred amongſt them, that they overturned the order of months, years, &c. in honour of it; but on what accout they did ſo, doth not appear.

(18) Vide Burchard. decret. l. x. c. 10. Keyzler. antiq. ſeptentr. apud relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 15. ad fin. (17) Ibid. c. 16. (19) Idem, l. xvi. c. 44.

PLAN OF YE FAMED TEMPLE OF MONTMORILLON. BOTH ABOVE AND UNDER GROUND.



Plan of the Upper.

The side on wch the eight figures stand over the Temple gate.

Plan of the Lower.

The Eight Figures over the Gate of the Temple.

P. Simms Sculpt

authors laſt quoted for a further account of thoſe famous edifices, that we may not draw this ſection into an exceſſive length, and content ourſelves with giving them a ſhort deſcription of one of the moſt curious of them in the next note (K), and figure, by which they may frame an idea of

(K) This octagonal ſtructure ſtands at Montmorillon, in the province of Poitou, and conſiſts of two temples, one above ground, and the other under it, ſomewhat like our St. Faith and St. Paul, the loweſt of which is much narrower than the upper, and its wall as thick again. The upper received its light from eight windows, in form of portals, under the arch of each of the eight faces; but now walled up, except that over the gate or entrance into the fabric; and another which leads to a kind of wing or portico, which projects from the fabric on the oppoſite ſide. The great overture in the centre of the roof, which reſembles that in the Rotonda of Rome, gives likewiſe ſome light to the building, tho' not much, becauſe it deſcends through a hole in the roof, like a cylinder, of twenty-four feet in length, and about ten in breadth. The rain, that falls thro' it, gathers itſelf to the centre of the pavement, which is made with a proper declenſion, and empties itſelf through another, and much leſſer hole, into the lower temple, and is ſucked up by the earth, this laſt having neither ſink nor pavement.

The wing, at one of the ſides of the octagon, is equal to it, that is, eighteen feet in breadth without and within. That, which leads into the lower, is much narrower than that which leads into the upper building; and at the end of the former is a ſtair-caſe, that leads up to the latter. This place appears to be of the ſame age and ſtructure as the octagon, and has, on the top, a kind of ſquare tower of about the ſame height with the roof of the inner temple; but whether it had a bell in it, as ſome think, who imagine it to have been ſince turned into a church, is not eaſy to determine. This advanced building ſeems to have ſerved for a kind of veſtry to the prieſts and druids Juſt over-againſt this, acroſs the temple, is the gate that leads into it; and on the one ſide of it, in the ſubterranean temple, begins a covert way above ſix feet broad, and about ſix hundred in length, which leads to the neighbouring river, to which, it is ſuppoſed, the druids went to waſh themſelves, and their victims, whenever they performed the prieſtly function.

Over the gate of the temple were eight human figures, coarſely carved, ſuppoſed to have been ſo many Gauliſh deities. Of theſe, ſix are of the male kind, three in a group or nich, and the two others, one at each end, are females. The former are differently of the Gauliſh taſte in architecture. All that we ſhall add here is, that, by the multitude of niches that appear in ſome ferently dreſſed. Thoſe that face you, and ſtand fartheſt out, have a kind of antique mantle; the others have on a kind of tunic. One has a long gown quite down to his feet, and open from top to bottom, and all of them are girdled up. In one group the figure that faces you is ſhod, and the other two on each ſide are barefooted. In the other group, that which faces you is unſhod, and the other two ſhod. In the one they appear old men, with long beards; in the other, all young and beardleſs; ſo that in the firſt there are two old men unſhod, and one ſhod; and in the other two young men ſhod, and one unſhod. This odd contraſt was not, doubtleſs, without ſome myſterious meaning.

Of the two women, which ſtand one at each end, the one had a long head of hair plaited hanging on each ſide before her, and is dreſſed ſomewhat in the modern form, that is, in a kind of ſtiff-bodied gown. She holds her hands on her ſides, and hath a kind of mittens which cover about one-half-way her arms. That, which ſtands on the oppoſite ſide, is quite naked, and hath two ſerpents twiſted one round each leg, and both, twining between her thighs, rear their heads up to her breaſts, as if they were ſucking at them, whilſt ſhe holds them by her hands, as it were, cloſe to the ſides of her belly. From this combination of eight figures over the gate of an octagonal temple, our learned author inferts, that that number was looked upon by the Gauls as ſacred to the gods, as we hinted a little higher.

The intablature over it was not without its ornaments, which chiefly conſiſted of a great variety of heads oddly variegated, the meaning of which, if it was done with any, is not eaſy to gueſs. As to the figures themſelves, this is the conjecture of our author, for the proofs of which we ſhall refer our readers to the place quoted in the margin (19): The naked woman, with two ſerpents, he ſuppoſes to have repreſented the moon, to whom therefore he concludes the temple to have been dedicated. The three old men he takes to have been three druids, and the three young men to have been their diſciples, and the number ſix to have been deſigned to ſignify the ſacredneſs in which it was held by the Gauls, it being on the ſixth day of the moon that they performed their grand ceremony of gathering the miſſeto, as we have already hinted. The ſerpents, ſucking at her breaſts, may ſignify properly enough the virtue, which that planet imparted, (19) Idem, l. i. c. 31.

ſome of them, they ſeem to have had a vaſt number of ſtatues in them, which are ſince moſtly demoliſhed, upon their converſion to chriſtianity; and ſome of them, ſince dug up out of their ruins, are ſo ſadly broken and mangled, that it is hard to gueſs, whether they were Gauliſh deities, or ſtatues of any other kind. Our two authors differ in their judgment about them; but, ſince the Gauls were grown ſo fond of multiplying their deities, as to dedicate one oak to an hundred of them, as we lately hinted, why may we not believe with Montfaucon, that they might ſhew the ſame fondneſs for multiplying their idols in thoſe temples, in imitation of the Romans? A great many of theſe edifices have been preſerved here, as they were in other countries, upon the planting of chriſtianity, by being converted into churches, though a much greater number were then demoliſhed, of which there are ſtill ſome fragments remaining, and may be ſeen more particularly deſcribed in the authors above quoted.

The gods worſhipped by the Gauls.

WE are now come to ſpeak of the gods that were afterwards adopted and worſhipped by the Gauls. We have already ſeen, how their antient Eſus came to be changed into Jupiter, at firſt indeed under the ſymbol of an oak, and even of a ſhapeleſs ſtump of a tree. But at length, as they gave wholly into the Roman ſuperſtition, they came to erect altars and ſtatues to him, and to repreſent him after the Roman manner: thus in ſome antient ſtatues and bas-reliefs he is parted, not only to that plant, but to all other vegetables, as the ſnakes are ſaid to renew their age with their ſkins. As for the other woman, he ſuppoſes her to have been deſigned for Venus, becauſe ſuch a kind of figure had been dug up at Chalons, with her treſſes plaited ſomewhat like this. If ſo, we would rather ſuppoſe the three young men, which ſtand next to her, to have been deſigned for her prieſts. But if the naked one, ſuckling two ſerpents, ſignifies the new moon, may not the other, which is dreſſed in a cloſe-bodied gown reaching up to her neck, have been deſigned to expreſs the old one, and to ſignify, that, after ſhe is paſt the full, ſhe ceaſes to communicate her influence? for the druids, being well verſed, for thoſe times, in aſtronomy, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel, and much addicted to aſtrology, it was natural for them to think, that as the encreaſe of that planet did daily approximate her virtue to the earth, ſo her decreaſe did divert and elongate it from it. But whither are we running with our conjectures?

is carved with a lance in one hand, and a thunderbolt in the other, and with his arms and bosom bare; his head is sometimes surrounded with a radial crown; his name of Jupiter is never met in any of his inscriptions; but only that of Jou, or Jovis, which, being of Celtic extract, was designedly retained by them, instead of the Roman. He is likewise surnamed Taran, which, in the same tongue, signifies thunderer: we would not, however, pretend to affirm, that this last name is the Taramis, or Taranis, of Lucan, or that the Gauls did not give it to any other god but the great Jupiter: but we may be well assured, that that of Jovis was peculiar to him, and has been preserved not only by the antient Gauls and Welsh, but is still retained by the French in many of their compound words (L). In that part of Gaul nearer the Alps he was called Peninus, and those high mountains Peninæ, from the old Celtic word Pen, which signifies an head, an height, a summit (M). He was represented as a young man naked, on a column reared to him on the top of mount St. Bernard the Less, by L. Lucilius, and is styled Optimus Maximous; whence it is concluded, that he was the same with the Gaulish Jovis. What seems to confirm this beyond all question, is, that the column on which it stood is Jupiter.

(L) Particularly in those that follow Joudy or Jeudy, Thursday, or day of Jove; Joumont, Joubarb, the mount of Jove, a mountain so called by the Romans, and the beard of Jove, an herb so called, from its resemblance to it; and many more of the like nature. As for that of Taran, which is still kept in many words which express any loud and fearful noise, and from which we take the Greek ταραχὴ and ταράττω to be derived, it is not unlikely, that it may have been also given to Mars, on account of the thundering noise which the Gauls made upon their shields, when they invoked him, either before an onset, or after a victory.

(M) This deity is called Apenina by Cato the elder, who derives it from Apis, the first king of Italy, with whom, according to him, ended the golden age (20). Servius (21) calls her Penina. But the figure and inscription which Guichenon has given us of it, shew it to have been erected to a male deity. The inscription is, LVCIVS LVCILIVS DEO PENINO OPTIMO MAXIMO DONVM DEDIT. The column was of marble, and about fourteen feet high.

(20) Apud Marcrob. Saturn. l. i. c. 21. (21) Comment. in Æneid. x.

is indifferently called the column of Jove and of Peninus, and the carbuncle that was placed on it, the eye of Jove, and the eye of Peninus [l]; but, ſince by the eye of Jupiter was meant the ſun from all antiquity [m], and the carbuncle was a very proper emblem of this laſt deity, why may we not as well ſuppoſe this ſtatue, naked and youthful as it was, to have been dedicated to it rather than to Jupiter? However that be, as this laſt ſucceeded their great Eſus, they paid much the ſame worſhip to him, and, in particular offered human victims to him, as the Romans did to their Jupiter Latialis; ſome inſtances of which we have given in the laſt ſection of this chapter, and in a former volume [n].

THEIR next deity was Mars, whom they eſteemed as the chief protector of the Gauliſh nation. Their invincible warlike temper inſpired them with ſuch a veneration for, and confidence in him (N), that whenever they went to war, they made him heir of all their poſſeſſions, and about the time of the onſet they vowed to him all the plunder [o]. If they came off with victory, they frequently ſacrificed their priſoners, as well as their cattle, to him, and hung the heads of their ſlain enemies about the necks of their horſes, in token of their valour. They even encloſed ſome of the moſt conſidera- Their cruel vows to him.

ble

[l] Guichenon. hiſt of Savoy, tom. i. l. i. c. 4. Vide relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c. 29. [m] Vide Macrob. Saturn. l. i. c. 21 [n] P. 453, & ſeq. (D). [o] Ulp. fragam. tit. 21. Comment. l. vi. Diod. Sic. l. vi. c. 9. Athen. l. iv.

(N) Julian the apoſtate, among his many other chimerical notions, attributed all the bravery and ſucceſs of the Gauls to the influence which the providence of the Creator of all things had endued that deity with, when he put them under his protection (22). But it is far more reaſonable to think, that their natural bravery, joined to their hatred of the all-conquering and enſlaving Romans, directed them to the choice of that deity for their protector, and which they antiently worſhipped, not as a god, but as one of the attributes of the Supreme Deity, which ſquared moſt with their warlike temper, as we have had occaſion to hint in a former note (23).

(22) Vide Cyril. Alexand. l. iv. cont. Jul. (23) Before, p. 411. note (E).

ble ones in frames of cedar, and, upon proper occasions, shewed them to strangers, and at no rate could be prevailed upon to part with them [o]. Another barbarous custom they are justly branded with, of poisoning their arrows with a juice, which they extracted from a tree not unlike our fig-tree, but of a quite deadly quality [p]. In times of sickness, or imminent danger, they immediately sacrificed some human victims to Mars, or vowed to do it, as soon as they had it in their power; and performed it accordingly. It was even common with them, in pressing dangers, to vow all their enemies to that deity, and to massacre them, as we have formerly hinted, without mercy or distinction. We have already taken notice, that he was formerly worshipped under the emblem of a naked sword, and under the name of Mars or Mavors, or Mawr-ruisc, which signifies warlike or powerful. Since then, we find him represented in the habit of a Roman warrior, with a spear in one hand, and a shield in the other, and with the surname of Camulus (O). We are told, that the Accitani of Spain, or the inhabitants of Cadiz, a Gaulish colony, represented him surrounded with rays of light, because, says our author [q], the boiling of the blood, and flow of animal spirits, which are the cause

[o] Strab. l. iv. Diod. Sic. ubi sup. [p] Rhodig. l. xxiii. c. 12. [q] Macrob. Saturn l. i. c.

(O) This appears from two inscriptions which Gruter has given us, the one on a bas-relief, with figures of five gods, viz. Arduinne, Camulus, Jove, Mercury, and Hercules, all which have their names engraven over their heads. The inscription underneath shews it to have been dedicated to them by one Quartinus, who is there styled Civis Sabinus Remus; from which that great critic, not observing, that the last word shews him to have been a citizen of Rheims, mistook those deities to be of Sabinian extract, and Camulus to be the same as Camillus (24), one of the names which the Sabines gave to Mercury.

But there is another inscription, of older date by an hundred years, which shews, that the Rhemenses in Gaul worshipped Mars under that title. It runs thus; MARTI CAMVLO OB SALVTEM TIBERI CLAVDI CÆS. CIVES REMI TEMPLVM CONSTITVERVNT (25). Hence it is plain, that if Camulus was known in that part of Italy, it was by means of this Quartinus, a Rhemish citizen, who dedicated this inscription there to him, under the reign of cauſe of a martial temper, were produced by the heat of the ſun. The variety of inſcriptions, that have been dug up by the curious, ſhews him to have been in the higheſt eſteem. We took notice formerly, that all the treaſures and plunder, that were vowed to him, were laid up in heaps in the next convenient place in the open fields, and were looked upon as ſo ſacred, that no Gaul dared to meddle with them. Some ſtones have been found, with eight or nine human heads buried under them, which, by the inſcription, appear to have been dedicated to him, and theſe heads to have belonged to thoſe human victims, which they were accuſtomed to vow to him in times of peril and ſickneſs In ſome of theſe inſcriptions he is called plainly Mars; in others he has the title of Segomen; in others Vincius or Britovius, the meaning of which names is not very clear. The reader may ſee the moſt probable conjectures about them in the next note (P).

(24) P. 40. num. 9. (25) Idem, p. 56. n. 11.

Apollo of Antoninus; whereas that city appears, by the ſecond inſcription, to have dedicated their temple in that of Claudius: ſo that, upon the whole, all theſe five deities here appear to have been Gauliſh, not only by their names, which are of Celtic extract, but from the reſemblance of their dreſs, attitudes, &c. with thoſe that have been found among the antient monuments of Gaul, eſpecially in the the great cathedral of Paris (26).

As for the etymon of Camulus, it is not eaſily decyphered. It may be derived from the Celtic camp, a field of battle; from campa, to fight, and ulvu, a fire, blaze; whence perhaps the Greek cammonia, by which they called the victory gained in ſingle combat. It may perhaps alſo come from the cam or chant, or ſongs, which the Gauls uſed when they went to fight. But we have had frequent occaſion to obſerve throughout this work, that there is nothing more uncertain, and apt to miſlead men, than ſtrained etymologies. Beſides, the Gauls having received, as we have ſeen, their polytheiim from the Romans, it were unreaſonable to expect, that names and ſurnames of thoſe deities ſhould all be of Gauliſh extract. As for Arduina, her dreſs, as well as name, ſhews her to have been Diana, who was worſhipped in Gaul, as well as in Greece and Rome.

(P) That of Segomen appears to be Celtic, and ſignifies rich, or making rich. Hence the Segones, who inhabited the moſt fruitful part of Gaul, and were reckoned the moſt opulent, are thought to have had their name. That of Vincius ſeems to have been

(26) Vide relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c. 36.

Apollo. APOLLO was another of their deities, and in as great veneration, on account of his being the god of phyſic, as Mars was for being the god of war. The druids, who were as famed quacks as prieſts, failed not to celebrate him, as the implanter of all the virtues that they attributed to their materia medica, which chiefly conſiſted in vegetables, accompanied with a great deal of ſuperſtitious traſh, which they uſed in the gathering, preparing, and adminiſtring (Q). The Aquileians and Tectoſagi choſe him for their patron and protector. The latter, who occupied a vaſt territory about Tholoſa, had a very rich and magnificent temple dedicated to him in that city, which was their metropolis. This is ſuppoſed to be the been given him on account of his ſtately temple at Vincia, now Vences, in Provence; and, in all likelihood, that of Britovius from ſome other city, where he was more particularly worſhipped; perhaps that of Britonium, in Galicia, which was a colony of the Gauls, and became afterwards an epiſcopal ſee, but is now deſtroyed (26).

(Q) We have already given ſome hints of this, in ſpeaking of their miſſeto, and their time and method of gathering it. It were needleſs, as well as tedious, to follow them through all their other ſuperſtitious quackeries; but one inſtance we cannot omit, becauſe it ſhews not only the ſtupidity of them, but likewiſe their fondneſs for them; ſince this laſt continued in vogue, it ſeems, till the eleventh century.

They had an herb dedicated to Apollo, or Belenus, which they called, from him, Belinuncia, and the Romans Apollinaris; and is ſuppoſed to have been a kind of henbane. The Spaniards and Hungarians retain ſtill the former of theſe names, the one calling it Veleno, and theothers Belend. With the juice of this herb they poiſoned their darts, when they went a ſtag-hunting; and could poiſon the creature with a ſlight wound, and eſteemed the fleſh the more tender and luſcious for it. Amongſt other ridiculous uſes they made of this plant, the following is remarkable, as well for its oddity, as long continuance.

Whenever the country laboured under a great drought, the women aſſembled themſelves, and choſe from amongſt them a young virgin, to be the leader of the dance. She ſtripped herſelf naked, and went at the head of the reſt, in ſearch of this herb, which they then called Bæliſa: when ſhe had found it, ſhe plucked it up by the roots, with the little finger of her right hand, and tied it to a ſtring, the other end of which was faſtened to the little toe of her right foot. Her company did then cut off each ſome bough, (26) Idem ibid. & auct. ab eo citat.

the ſame that is mentioned by an antient author [r], on account of Conſtantine's repairing thither, to give thanks for his late ſucceſs (R), and the extraordinary preſents he made to it; upon which occaſion that author ſtyles it the fineſt temple of Apollo that was then in the world. The building was a decagon, in which there was a vaſt number of niches and ſtatues, and, among the reſt, that of Apollo, repreſented as a lively youth; upon which account, the panegyriſt compliments that monarch with joining to the youthfulneſs of the god, the grandeur of an emperor. Some words he adds, which ſeem to imply, as if the oracle of the god had juſtly promiſed him the empire of the world; from which one might be induced to believe, that there had been, likewiſe, an oracle of that god there, in imitation of that of Delphos; and that Conſtantine had been conſulting it. But we would not lay too great ſtreſs on the ſwoln expreſſions of a panegyriſt. However that be, as Apollo was the ſame deity with the ſun, the Gauls worſhipped him under ſeveval names, and different forms. He is ſometimes called Apollo, Belenus, and Abellion, which ſignify fair; ſometimes by the Perſic name of Mithras; ſometimes that of Penninus, of which we have ſpoken under that of Jupiter; and at other times Dolichenus. We ſhall not trouble ourſelves with diving for freſh etymons of all thoſe names, bough, and carried them in their hands after her, whilſt ſhe dragged the plant after her, towards the next river, where ſhe plunged it in the water: the reſt dipped, likewiſe, their boughs, and ſprinkled her with it. When this ceremony was over, they all returned to the place whence they ſet out, but took care to make the young virgin walk backwards all the way (27).

[r] Eumenius, panegyr. Conſtant ſub fin.

(R) Conſtantine had, it ſeems, juſt taken the city of Marſeilles, and in it Hercules his father-in-law, who had ſworn his ruin; ſo that he was now enabled to reſume the purple which he had been forced to quit. And this being before his converſion, he went to pay his acknowledgment to Apollo, at this ſtately temple, which, upon many accounts, is ſuppoſed to have been that of Tholouſe.

The ſame panegyriſt tells us, that there was another temple of that god at Autun, where there was likewiſe a ſpring of hot waters, which were uſed for the puniſhment of perjury, and which, though they ſent up a continual ſmoak, had neither ill taſte or ſmell, but were both pleaſant and wholſome.

(27) Idem ibid. Burchar. decret. l. xix. c. 5.

which may, perhaps, have risen from the places where he was more particularly worshipped, or from other circumstances not now to be come at. He was generally represented youthful, naked, with a radiant crown, or golden tresses [t]. In some antient bustoes found of him, as well as in some antient coins, he is represented with a pole, or ring (S), and a link of a chain fastened to his skull, by which he was, it is supposed, suspended to the roof, in imitation of the sun, whom they fansied to be suspended by a golden chain [u]. But, after all, might not such hanging figures of that deity have been the effects of some vows which the Gauls, and others, used to make to the deity in time of sickness; and who, upon their recovery, hung up the promised figure in his temple, without any regard to the ridiculous notion above-mentioned? One head of his was dug up at the castle of Polignac, which place is supposed to have been so called from Apollo, and is still there to be seen against the wall that surrounds it. It is but ill carved on a bluish stone, between four and five feet in height and breadth, and is surrounded, all over, with rays, which, when the sun shines upon it, cast a kind of golden or fiery lustre, and shew that those rays had been formerly gilt. What is remarkable in this antique, is, that he is carved with his mouth wide open; from which it is concluded, to be here represented as delivering his answers [w]. And, truly, the druids were, by this time, become such zealous mimics of the Greeks and Romans, that we [t] Vide Euripid. Phœniss. Ælian. varior. l. i. c. 20. [u] Idem ibid. Vide & Anaxag. & al. [w] Simoni Limag d'Auvergne, p. 123 & seq. Corneil. diction. histor. relig. des Gaul. l. xi. c. 27.

(S) To understand what the antients meant by these kinds of poles, we must have recourse to Diodorus Siculus, who is the only one that has given us any light in it, and who, speaking of Alexander's funeral procession from Babylon to Alexandria, tells us, that in the canopy which was over the car, or herse, there was a pole so nicely wrought, that neither the roughness of the roads, nor the jolting of the wheels could move it (28). Hence his interpreters have concluded this pole to have been a kind of hinge, or ring, to which a certain number of springs were fastened, which kept the whole machine tight, and immoveable (29). And hence it is supposed to have been called a pole, from the number of chains and springs which centred in it to keep the hanging statue steady. But whether they have hit the point, we will not affirm.

(28) Hist. lib. xviii. (29) Antiquit. expliq. tom. v.

we need not doubt but they had ſome one or more of theſe oracles among them, though we could not find any other footſteps of it. There is an inſcription, in this temple, of Polignac, out of which the head above-mentioned had been taken, which the antiquary above quoted judges to have been put up by the emperor Claudius, who was of Lions, and conſequently had lived in the neighbourhood of this caſtle, and had been there, perhaps, either to conſult the oracle, or, more probably, to pray to that god for the recovery of his health, as he was a very ſickly prince when he cauſed his name and titles to be ſet up there. For Cæſar tells us, that even in his time the Gauls looked upon Apollo as the god of phyſic [x]; and another author adds [y], that the ſick perſons that addreſſed themſelves to him for health, uſed to ſend thither that part of their body where the ailment was, carved out in wood, or caſt in braſs. At Marſeilles was found a ſtatue like that of a Roman warrior armed cap-à-pé, about eleven or twelve feet high, and ſtanding on the crupper of a bull, between the belly of which, and the pedeſtal on which it ſtands, is carved an eagle, as it were, ſitting ſquat; and on the pedeſtal an inſcription, importing, that Octavius Paternus had dedicated it to the god Dolichenius. The bull and the eagle has made ſome antiquaries ſuppoſe that deity to have been Jupiter; but another author, often quoted in this ſection, has given ſome convincing proofs that it was Apollo: we ſhall refer the curious, for thoſe proofs, to the book itſelf [z], to prevent running into too great a length. All that needs to be added, with reſpect to this antique, is, that the name, which is a Greek one, and ſignifies, according to ſome, a hippodrome, according to others, the poſts that directed the races, ſeems to intimate, that Apollo was looked upon by the Gauls to preſide over thoſe exerciſes.

But the deity in greateſt veneration among the Gauls, was Mercury. Mercury. We have already given ſome reaſons for it in the Celtic hiſtory [a]. Other deities had particular cities and provinces where they were more particularly worſhipped; but this, after he was adopted as the god not only of trade and commerce, of which he was antiently eſteemed the author, and chief promoter, in Gaul, but likewiſe of arts and ſciences, of the highways and travellers, of pregnant women, and even of thieves and robbers, ſtatues, altars, and temples, were erected to him every-where throughout this country. He is called, by ſeveral antient authors, Theutat, and Theutates [b], the ſignification of which name we have given, as well as that of Mercury, in the volume above quoted; and we need not doubt but they both meant the ſame deity, or that he was worſhipped under both by the Gauls, ſince both are of Celtic extract, and expreſſive of the excellent notion they had of him, upon both accounts (T). That of Theutat ſignifying the father of his people, they acknowledged him under that name, at firſt, as their founder; and afterwards boaſted

[x] Com. ubi ſupra. [y] Greg. Turon. vit. patr. c. 6. [z] Relig. des Gaules, ubi ſupra. [a] Vol. v. p. 413, (D) & 433, & n. (Y) (Z).

[b] Lucan. Pharſal. l. i. Liv. decad. iii. l. vi. c. 44. Lactant. & al.

(T) To theſe two names, and thoſe we mentioned in a former volume, we muſt add that of Ognius, mentioned by Lucan, and which, though that author gives to Hercules, by miſtake, yet, in all appearance, belonged to Mercury. The deſcription he gives of him, as he ſaw it in Gaul, being ſomewhat curious, though the humour of it be ſomewhat exaggerated, we ſhall give our Engliſh readers the ſubſtance of it.

"The Gauls, ſays he, call Hercules Ognius, and repreſent "him as a decrepit old man, bald, wrinkled, and weather-beaten, "like ſome old ſailor. One would ſooner take him for old "Charon, or any one elſe, than for Hercules. But if one con- "ſiders him with his lion's ſkin, the bow and quiver in his left, "and the club in his right hand, he looks quite like a Hercules. "What is moſt curious, is, that the good old man holds a mul- "titude of people tied to him by the ear; the chains are of gold "and amber, and, though very fine and ſlight, not one of them "ſeems to ſtrive to break them, or even unwilling to follow him. "On the contrary, they ſeem ſo pleaſed, and the chains ſo looſe, "that there appears a viſible eagerneſs in them to keep cloſe to "him. His hands being both full, the painter has repreſented "thoſe chains as faſtened to a hole boared through Ognius's "tongue, whilſt he looks back ſmiling on his followers."

Lucan, having expreſſed his ſurprize at the oddneſs of the picture, introduces a Gaul accounting to him for it, in words to this effect: "You will ceaſe to be ſurpriſed at it, when I tell "you, that we Gauls make Hercules the god of eloquence, con- "trary to the Greeks, which give that honour to Mercury, who "is ſo far inferior to him in ſtrength. We repreſent him as an "old man, becauſe eloquence never ſhews itſelf ſo lively and "ſtrong as in the old people. The relation which the ear hath to "the tongue, juſtifies the picture of the old man, who holds ſo "many people faſt by his tongue; neither do we think it any "affront to Hercules, to paint him with his tongue bored; "ſince, to tell you all in one word, it was that which made boaſted themſelves to be ſprung from him (V), in imitation of the Thracian kings, who were another branch of the an-

"him

 tient

" him ſucceed in every thing; and that it was by his wiſdom " that he ſubdued all hearts unto him " Thus far Lucan: and it is not eaſy to gueſs whether he was impoſed upon by his Gaul, or whether he himſelf introduces this ſtory as a burleſque upon the Gauliſh nation, who depended ſo far on their ſtrength and bravery, whilſt they as much valued themſelves upon their eloquence, as if they had excelled the world in it; and ſo expoſe them for their veneration for Hercules, rather than Mercury. It is plain, however, that theſe ſlight and brittle chains, which held ſo many pleaſed captives faſt by the ear to the tongue of the god, could not belong to Hercules, in any caſe, but to Mercury, the god of eloquence; and are, accordingly, attributed to him by the generality of antient mythologiſts. On the other hand, the club, the quiver, &c. were indifferently given to Mercury, to whom, we are told, Hercules conſecrated them, after ſome ſucceſsful fight againſt the giants (30). Accordingly, we read, that the emperor Commodus, who affected to appear at public ſhews in the habit of Mercury, uſed to wear the caduceus in his hand, whilſt his officers carried the club, lion's ſkin, &c. before him. And in giving theſe to that god, the meaning was plainly this, that where-ever wiſdom and eloquence were, there could be neither ſtrength nor courage wanting; becauſe the former was ever able either to procure, or, at the worſt, to ſupply the want of the latter.

Many other reaſons might be aſſigned to prove, that this picture of Ognius repreſented a Mercury, and not an Hercules; however Lucan came to give it to the latter (31), wherein he has been followed by the multitude of antiquaries. As for us, we think it unneceſſary to dwell longer upon it, in a work of this nature: and thoſe who rather chuſe to follow that author, have a Hercules here as worſhipped by the Gauls, under the name of Ognius, or, rather, as joined into one with Mercury by them, as he was antiently by the Egyptians, and other nations. But it is plain Lucan had no mind to admit the latter amongſt the Gauliſh gods, when he makes him tell Jupiter, that he doth not know which way to ſummon theſe to the aſſembly; becauſe, as he was a ſtranger to their language, he could neither underſtand them, nor be underſtood by them (32).

(V) We are told, that the famed Pythagoras, having paſſed over (30) Vide Pauſan. Corinthiac. Lil. Gyrald. hiſt. decr. ſyntagm. ix. (31) Xiphilin. excerpt. ex Dion. in Commod. (32) Vide antiq. expliq. tom. i. relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c. 11, & ſeq.

tient Celtes. Mercury was with them the god of riches [c]; no man could attain to them without his help: and hence he came to be confounded with Pluto, and to ſhare in his honours and attributes; or, if we may be allowed to gueſs nearer to the truth, Mercury, being dead, became Pluto, the god of riches, and of the lower regions; and hence both Gauls and Thracians claimed their deſcent from theſe two deities, after they had, by length of time, ſplit them into two, in imitation of their neighbours. Some inſcriptions ſhew, that not only Mercury, but even Venus and Mars, were reckoned among the infernal gods (W). As he was worſhipped as their progenitor, he is often joined, in thoſe ſtatues and inſcriptions erected to him, with the goddeſs Poſtverta, to aſſiſt women in labour. This goddeſs has much puzzled all mythologiſts, and may be only an epithet of Proſerpine, whom, Strabo ſays, they worſhipped as their mother [d] (X); or, perhaps, of Diana, who had the ſame office. According to all theſe diſtinctions, one may reckon three Gauliſh Mercuries, or rather the ſame god worſhipped under three different titles, and repreſented in three different forms.

As

[c] Cæſar, com. l. vi. [d] L. iv.

over into Gaul, to learn the myſteries of the druids, was ſo taken with this notion of theirs, that he boaſted the ſame deſcent, and that that god had promiſed to grant him whatever favour he ſhould aſk, except that of being made immortal (33).

(W) DIIS INFERNIS VENERI, MARTI, & MERCURIO ſacrum (34). With relation to his being the god of riches, we find an antient witty inſcription at Lyons, in Latin, to this effect. "Mercury promiſes you gain here, Apollo health, and Septu-"manus a lodging; but he that brings his dinner with him, "will fare the better. After this, ſtranger, you muſt look out "where to lodge (35)." As this city was one of the moſt trading ones in Europe, the ſcarcity of inns in it, at that time, might make the opulent and generous Septumanus give ſtrangers this odd invitation.

(X) As ſhe was ſuppoſed to aſſiſt women in labour, the names of Poſtverta, and Anteverta, might be given her on account of her turning the child to the right poſition for the birth. Thoſe who make two goddeſſes of them think, that the one had power to remedy what was paſt, and the other to prevent what was to come.

(33) Dial. Jupit. tragœd. (34) Clem. Alex. Strom. l. i. Diog. Laert. l. viii. (35) Hiſt. de l'academ. des inſcriptions, tom. iii.

As the god of eloquence, he was repreſented in the manner we have deſcribed him from Lucan, in a late note, as an old man, with his bow, quiver, club, and lion's ſkin, holding a willing multitude chained to his tongue by their ears. As the god of merchants and travellers, he was repreſented naked, and without ſex and beard, and with his winged cap, his caduceus, &c. He is under this head, likewiſe, repreſented with a purſe in one hand, and ſometimes with a cornucopia in the other, and with wings on his heels, as the meſſenger of the gods. In ſome ſtatues he has a creſcent, over the wings of his cap, and was often joined with the moon in the Gauliſh worſhip; and that, probably, upon theſe two accounts: Firſt, as the one was the diſpenſer of wealth, and the other the giver of fertility to the earth; and, ſecondly, as both preſided over the highways, upon which account, the latter was called Trivia; and both protected the roads, the travellers, thieves, ſhepherds, and ſhepherdeſſes [e], as he is affirmed to have followed their life; upon which account, theſe likewiſe offered ſacrifices to him [f]. As an infernal deity, we conjecture him to have been repreſented with a beard; his winged cap rather reſembled a diſk, and inſtead of a caduceus, he held in one hand an odd kind of ſcepture, and in the other a purſe. His body was ſurrounded with a kind of imperial mantle, or paludamentum, tyed, or faſtened, by ſome ornament, on one of his ſhoulders. This we infer from an antient monument, an account of which may be ſeen in the margin (Y), in the inſcription of which he is ſtyled Auguſtus. There have been many come. In one of thoſe inſcriptions, under a double buſto, one of Mercury, and the other of that goddeſs, ſhe is called Roſmerte; in ſome others it is Mercury, and Fort. Verte, or Fortuna Verte, or happy return; as he is often ſtiled in others, Mercurio Negotiatori, Nundinatori, &c. (36).

Three Mercuries among the Gauls.

[e] Porph. de abſt. l. ii. Macrob. ſomn. Scip. l. i. Auct. hymn, in Merc. verſ. 15, 290. [f] Euſtat. Odyſſ. ξ, Iliad. ξ.

(Y) This appears, from a large bas-relievo, between five and ſix feet long, and about three in breadth, and near two in thickneſs, dug up out of a gentleman's vineyard, near one of the gates of the city of Beauvais. The inſcription is, Sacrum Mercurio Auguſto C. Julius Healiſſus V S L M. It is plain, from ſome other inſcriptions in Gruter, that a bearded Mercury was common in Gaul, though not among the Greeks and Romans; and the title

(36) Menet, prép. à l'hiſtoire de Lion, p. 56.

many other conjectures offered, both concerning this antient monument, and the title there given him, as well as ſome others, which are met with in thoſe old inſcriptions [g]; ſuch as that of Artaius, Ciſſonius, Arvernus, and ſome others, which we ſhall not tire our readers with: we ſhall likewiſe paſs by ſome other dreſſes and attitudes with which the luxuriant fancies of the Gauls have repreſented him, and only add, that from what we have obſerved of thoſe mounds in which the Gauls and Britains buried their dead, ſuch as thoſe we deſcribed on Saliſbury plain, and what Livy ſays of ſuch a kind of tumulus, or ſepulchral mount, which Scipio took notice of in the neighbourhood of New Carthage in Spain, and which the natives called Mercury Teutat [h], one may draw a probable conjecture, that he was buried there. We have formerly ſhewn, that he reigned in Gaul [i], which comprehended then the greateſt part of Europe, and particularly Spain; and may be reaſonably therefore ſuppoſed to have been there interred, after the Celtic or Gauliſh manner. Other heaps or mounds, there were, which likewiſe bore his name; but thoſe were of a different nature, as the reader may ſee in the next note (Z). How he was worſhipped by the Gauls under any of theſe three

His tomb.

Worſhip.

[g] See relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c. 17, & ſeq.

[h] Decad. iii. l. vi. c. 44. chronic. Alex. Suid. Pezron.

[i] See vol. v. p. 433, & ſeq. & relig. des Gaul. Pelloutier. & al.

title Auguſtus, which we find in ſeveral antient medals given to other gods and goddeſſes, or rather to emperors and empreſſes deified under their names, inclines us to think, that this monument was dedicated to Mercury after he had been deified by the Gauls, and reckoned among the infernal deities. Some diſtinction, doubtleſs, there muſt have been of his dreſs, &c. under this laſt denomination, and this ſeems the moſt likely to have been it; but it is here offered only as a probable conjecture.

(Z) Theſe laſt are known to have been heaps of ſtones, and other obſtacles, of which the highways were either cleared by his command; or in honour of him, as he was thought the god that preſided over them. Whenever, therefore, any traveller met with any ſuch, he took them up, and carried them till he found one of theſe heaps, which were in great numbers, and flung it in among the reſt; by which means they grew larger, and higher, and were called by his name (37).

The author of the vulgate verſion has alluded to this cuſtom, where three denominations, is hard to gueſs; only as he was, in imitation of the Romans, deified as the god of traffick and riches, we may ſuppoſe they borrowed ſome of their rites from the worſhip which the Roman merchants paid to him there, and which is beautifully deſcribed by the poet [k], who cloſes his account of it with this reflection, that Mercury could not but be inclined to forgive all the cheats and perjuries of theſe his votaries, when he remember'd how himſelf had been guilty of the like [l]. The chief victim with which they concluded his feaſt, was a ſow with pig.

(37) Vide Gruter. ubi ſupra, & relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c. 18.

THESE were the chief male deities which we find worſhipped by the Gauls; ſome others they had likewiſe adopted, ſuch as Mithras, from the Perſians (A), Neptune, Erebus, and Orcus, ſuppoſed both to be the ſame with Pluto; Bacchus, and ſome others, whom they adopted from the Greeks and Romans, concerning which we know very little, either of their worſhip, or of the notion which the Gauls had of them. As to their goddeſſes, the chief of them were, Diana, Goddeſſes.

or

[k] Faſt. l. v. ver. 663, & ſeq. [l] See hymn. in Merc. Lactant. l. iv. Sund. in voc. Euſtat. Iliad. ξ.

where he makes Solomon ſay (28), that "He who doth honour "to a fooliſh man, is like him that throws a ſtone in one of "Mercury's heaps." But the text in the original has no ſuch alluſion, but only compares the latter to one that binds a ſtone in a ſling. Theſe heaps were generally gathered up at ſome croſs-ways, and places where roads divided, and where there generally ſtood a terminus, or figure at half body; at the foot of which they threw thoſe ſtones (39).

Theſe ſerved, likewiſe, to remind people of the heavy curſes which this deity was thought to inflict on thoſe who abuſed travellers, or refuſed to put them in the right way (40). Their repreſenting him of no ſex, as he was the god of commerce and riches, was, in all likelihood, to intimate, that neither of them were confined to either ſex, but that both had an equal title to his protection and bleſſing; and we may add, that it might be likewiſe done in a modeſt oppoſition to the Greeks and Romans, who repreſented him as ambiſex, and with a ſpear in one hand, and a diſtaff in the other (41).

(A) It appears from ſeveral antient monuments and inſcriptions, that

(38) Proverb. xxvi 8. Odyſſ. ii. Anyt. in epigram. xxv. v. 5. (39) Nicander. Ἑρμαϊ. ſcholiaſt. (40) Vide Theocrit. idyl. (41) Albric. de deor. imag. Huet. demonſt. evang. & al.

or Luna, Juno, Minerva, Venus, Proſerpine, Arduina, whom we take to be the moon, as we hinted a little higher, and Cybele, a ſtatue of which was dug up at Paris with a head crowned with a kind of hexagonal temple, and was particularly in great veneration in the city of Autun, and whoſe prieſts were, it ſeems, all caſtrated in honour of her (B), and from thence called Galli (C). Before we cloſe this ſection, that Mithras, the Sun, and Mercury, were worſhipped, among the Gauls, as one and the ſame deity; at leaſt, Mithras being the ſun, among the Perſians, is often repreſented as conjoined with him, that is, with a ſun over his head, and ſometimes on his breaſt, and with this inſcription, Mercurio ſoli ſacrum. Hence the author of the Gauliſh religion has been at the pains to collect a number of other arguments, to prove that thoſe two deities were looked upon here as one and the ſame, or, at moſt, as aſſociated both in their virtues, and in their worſhip. And might not this be on account of the great and conſtant nearneſs the two planets, which bear theſe names, have to each other (42)?

(B) This appears, from what we read in the acts of Syphorianus, a zealous chriſtian ſince ſainted, who, being brought before the governor of that city, for refuſing to worſhip her idol, on a day in which her ſtatue was carried about in proceſſion, alledged, among other reaſons for his refuſal, that he could not acknowledge a deity, whoſe myſteries and worſhip conſiſted in a ſhameful and unnatural caſtration. But whether theſe Galli, or prieſts, were Gauls, or ſent for from Phrygia, or elſewhere; or whether the Gauls, who appear to have had an abhorrence for all kinds of mutilations allowed of theſe Galli; or whether they did not rather belong only to the Romans, as ſome authors believe (43), we ſhall examine in the next note.

(C) That Cybele, or the mother of the gods, as ſhe is called, was a deity of Syrian, and not of Gallic extract, is univerſally acknowledged. So that if her worſhip was introduced into Gaul, it was either by force, or in imitation of the Greeks and Romans. If we conſider their abhorrence to all mutilations, we ſhall hardly think that they could willingly give into ſuch a kind of worſhip as this, which required every prieſt, and encouraged every votary of the goddeſs to become an eunuch, as Heliogabalus is ſaid to have done, in one of his mad fits (44). We are, moreover, told, that thoſe Galli were had in ſuch abhorrence, that no other people would converſe with them; and that they were put upon the

(42) L. ii. c. 36, & ſeq. Pelloutier. Keyzler, & al.

(43) Idem ibid. l. i. c. 33. ad fin.

(44) Lamprid. in Heliogab. Victor. epitom.

ſection, it will be neceſſary to give our readers ſome account of the Gauliſh druids, bards, &c. and of ſuch of their doctrines and tenets as have not been yet touched upon, at leaſt as far as we can gather them from antient authors; for it cannot be expected, that we ſhould know much concerning that ſet of men, conſidering that they made a myſtery of their religion and philoſophy, and a conſtant rule never to commit any thing relating to either to writing [m].

Druids. We have already obſerved, that the order of the druids had the ſole care of all religious matters, which they ſo artfully and dexterouſly introduced into every other concern, both public and private, that nothing could be done without their approbation [n]; and that this abſolute ſway of theirs laſted till at leaſt ſome time after their conqueſt by the Romans. They the level with ſorcerers, gladiators, and hangmen (45); ſo that they had no other way of living, but by carrying their goddeſs about, and begging charity for her ſake; all which was moſt oppoſite to the genius of the Gallic nation.

[m] Vide Cæſ. com. l. vi. & alib. paſſ. [n] See before, p. 449. (B).

Accordingly, St. Jerom has a paſſage which plainly intimates, that the Romans forced this emaſculated prieſthood upon the Gauls, and called thoſe eunuchs Galli, in order to fix a perpetual ignominy upon that nation, for having taken their metropolis, and beſieged their capital (46). And we are told, by Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, that no Roman took that office upon him, but that they had a Phrygian male and female to perform it. This might be true, in part; and if what is reported of Heliogabalus, who became one of them, be to be credited, it will only ſhew, that he minded the laws and cuſtoms of Rome no more in this caſe, than he did in all others (47).

However, St. Jerom ſeems to have been miſtaken in his derivation of the word gallus and galli; which, if we may believe Pliny, and other Roman authors, were ſo called from a river of that name in Phrygia (48); and, in particular, Ovid, who, probably, to expoſe the unnatural caſtration of theſe prieſts, tells us, that the waters of that river had ſuch a dangerous quality, that whoſoever drank of them did run ſtark mad (49). But be that as it will, the contemptible name of Gallus may well enough have (45) Tertul. de reſurrect. c. 16. (46) Comment in Hoſ. c. 4. (47) See his horrid actions, vol. xv. p. 150, 151. & ſeq. (48) Plin nat. hiſt. l. v. Luc. de dea Syr. (49) Faſt. l. iv. v. 316, & ſeq.

They were called by ſeveral names (D), beſide that of druid, of which we have given the etymon in a former volume [o]. Their antiquity is looked upon of the ſame date with the brachmans have been given to the Gauls by way of pun upon their national one, let thoſe prieſts have been called ſo on any other account. So that, upon the whole, if any Gauls were ever ſeen in that office, they muſt needs be ſuppoſed to have been forced into it by their imperious conquerors: but, after all, this worſhip of Cybele, though eſtabliſhed in Gaul, as well as in Rome, may yet, for aught appears, have been countenanced by the latter, and diſapproved by the former.

[o] Vol. v. p. 406, & ſeq. ſub not.

Before we cloſe this note, it will not be amiſs to mention a noble teſtimony which a Roman writer gives of this averſion of the Gauls to mutilation (50); where, having amply expatiated on their known valour and bravery, their contempt of difficulties and dangers, and even of death, he adds, "We never find any "of them do, as ſome of us do in Italy, cut off their thumbs, "for fear of going to the wars, and upon which account they "call us, in deriſion, Murci."

To underſtand the ſting of this ſaying, it muſt be obſerved, that Murcia was reckoned, amongſt the Romans, the goddeſs of cowards and idle fellows; whence her infamous votaries were called Murci (51). And from this ſhameful cuſtom of cutting off their thumbs, to diſqualify themſelves for ſervice, came the old Gallic word poltron, from pollex and trunco, which is ſtill retained to this day, by many other nations beſides the French.

(D) One of them was that of Semnothei (52), given to them, doubtleſs, on account of their greater veneration for, and knowledge of, the godhead. Diodorus Siculus gives them that of Saronides, on account of their great regard to ſuch old oaks as were decayed, and ſtripped of their bark; for that is the meaning of that word, according to Heſychius.

A Gauliſh antiquary, not content to derive that of druid from the Celtic derw, an oak, compounds it with that and hud, inchantment; whence he infers the Greek dryades to have come (53): but though they are charged, and that perhaps juſtly, to have uſed many ſuch practices, and in a moſt inhuman manner; yet it is not reaſonable to think that they would add ſo odious a ſyllable

(50) A Marcell. in fin. l. xv. (51) Vide Valer. Max. l. vi. c. 3. Sueton. in vit. Auguſt. Arnob. l. i. c. 4. Aug. de civit. l. iv. (52) Diog. Laert. in proœm. Suid. in voc. (53) Orig. de la nat. Celt.

brachmans of India, magi of Perſia, the Chaldees of Babylon and Aſſyria, and, in a word, with the oldeſt ſects of philoſophers [p]. And, indeed, conſidering their vaſt diſtance from each other, and the conformity of their doctrine, we can ſuppoſe no other but that they all received it from the ſame hand, viz. from Noah and his immediate deſcendents, and carried it each to the different places of their diſperſion; for they can never be imagined to have communicated it to each other, as there could be no communication or commerce between them in thoſe early times; at leaſt the druids of Britain, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the next chapter, and from whom the Gauls received all their religion and philoſophy, cannot be ſuppoſed to have had it from any of theſe foreign ſects, to whom they were utterly unknown. The Gauls, tenacious as they were till their conqueſt, of their religion, laws and cuſtoms, never belyed their origin, but owned themſelves to have received all from the Britiſh druids: thither they ſent their own to be inſtructed. Here was the grand ſeminary where they received their inſtruction, and here was the ſeat of the arch-druid, or head, and high-prieſt of their religion; to whom they appealed, as to their dernier reſort, ſyllable to their name: neither can the Greeks or Romans be ſuppoſed to have done it, becauſe the monoſyllabe, being Celtic, was unknown to them. Dryades was, therefore, no more than a Greek termination of the word druid.

[p] Vide int. al. Laert. in proœm. Orig. cont. Celſ. l. v. Cl. Alex. ſtrom. l. iii. Polyhiſt. ap. eund. l. i. Celſ. ap. Orig. ubi ſupra.

The laſt name we ſhall take notice of was, that of Sanani, which we hinted above was, probably, taken up by them as more pleaſing to the Romans, it properly ſignifying a wiſe and venerable man; as their druideſſes were called ſenoe, and ſenes (54). This was probably done in imitation of the ſect of gymnoſophiſts, who agreed with them in many things, particularly, in having their ſocieties compoſed of males and females, like the Gauliſh druids, in ſtudying philoſophy, aſtrology, prying into futurity, living in celibacy, and the like (55). Theſe were by the Greeks called Semnones; the Gauls, among whom the "mn" was, and is ſtill, in many provinces, pronounced like "nn," called them Sennones, and, in the Latin termination, Sennoni and Sennani.

(54) Mela, l. iii.

(55) Diog. Laert. ubi ſupra. Clem. Alexand. ſtromat. l. iii. Relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 21.

reſort, in all doubtful and controverted caſes [q]. It were, therefore, abſurd to ſuppoſe, as ſome have done, either that theſe travelled into ſuch vaſt remote parts to learn their doctrines from the ſemnes of India, or any other ſects; or much leſs, as others too eagerly contend, that theſe travelled into Gaul and Britain to learn theirs from them. And it is much more reaſonable to derive that great reſemblance which is obſerved between them all, from thoſe antient times, when they were, in ſome meaſure, but one people, or great family; and that each carried, and carefully preſerved them in thoſe parts of the world where they ſettled themſelves (E).

Their exceſſive power.

AMONG other inſtances of the exceſſive power of the druidiſh tribe, Cæſar mentions one [r], by which we may gueſs at the reſt, viz. that they choſe the annual magiſtrates of every city, who had during that year the ſupreme authority, and ſometimes the title of king. And yet theſe could do nothing without their approbation and advice, not ſo much as call a council; ſo that, notwithſtanding their great pomp and ſtate, ſays another author, they were but the creatures and ſlaves of the druids [s]. They uſed the ſame arbitrary power in their courts of judicature, and all other caſes, and were every-where eſteemed as the chiefs of every Gauliſh commonwealth,

[q] Cæſ. comment. l. iv. [r] Ibid. l. vii. Dio Chryſoſt. orat. xlix. [s] Cæſar. l. vi. A. Marcell. l. xv. D. Sic. l. vi. c. 9. Lucan. l. i. & al.

(E) Some antient Roman authors, ſuch as Cæſar, Valerius Maximus, Am. Marcellinus, &c. have indeed affirmed, that the druids learned their doctrines from Pythagoras; and the ſame ſome have affirmed of Numa (56), though he was of ſo much older date. But we have formerly obſerved, that Pythagoras had made a voyage into Gaul, and had learned a great deal of his from them, as he did alſo from the brachmans (57). The truth is, Pythagoras was in ſuch high eſteem, that no man was hardly eſteemed wiſe, or learned, that was not his diſciple (58). And the Gauliſh druids, being found to have many doctrines in common with him, were of courſe ſuppoſed to have received them from him. Though that of the tranſmigration of ſouls, which was likewiſe attributed to them, doth not appear to have been at all held by them, and it is likely that philoſopher brought it from thoſe of India.

(56) See Cicer. quæſt. Tuſcul. l. i. n. 38. (57) Clem. Alex. ubi ſupra, l. i. Diog. Laert. l. viii. (58) Cicero, ibid.

wealth, and had the ſole management and inſtruction of youth in every thing but the training up in the art of war. For in this laſt reſpect the druids, and their diſciples, were not only exempt from going to war unleſs they pleaſed, but from all kind of tribute likewiſe [t]; and this did not a little increaſe their credit with the people, as well as the number of their diſciples. For their order was not fixed to any particular families or nation of Gaul, but every man had power to ſtand candidate for it, and, if approved by the ſociety, was admitted into it. As for their grand druid, he was choſen from amongſt them by the plurality of votes; and, when any diſpute aroſe, it was often terminated here, as in other caſes, by the ſword, as we ſhall have occaſion to hint in the ſequel. We have already obſerved, that they made it a part of their religion not to commit any thing to writing, but to couch all their myſteries and learning in verſe; and theſe, it ſeems, were multiplied in time to ſuch a number, that it took ſome of them twenty whole years to learn them all by heart. And Cæſar aſſigns theſe two reaſons for this cuſtom, viz. that their doctrines might appear more myſterious, by being unknown to all but themſelves; and, ſecondly, that having no books to recur to, they might be the more careful to preſerve them in their memory [u]. And what contributed much to this laſt was, their living in ſeparate ſocieties, chiefly in woods, and obſerving a conſtant celibacy.

THE three grand fundamentals of their religion conſiſted, 1. In their worſhip of the gods; 2. In abſtaining from all evil; and, 3. In behaving with intrepidity upon all occaſions [x]. In order to enforce this laſt, on which they valued themſelves moſt, they taught the immortality of the ſoul, and a life after this, of bliſs or miſery, according as they had lived. And this inſpired them with incredible courage, and contempt of death, of which we ſhall give ſome pregnant inſtances in its due place. This notion of a future life was ſo firmly believed by the people, that we are told they uſed to fling the account-books of the deceaſed into his grave, or, if he was burnt, into the fire, that he might make ſuch uſe of them in the next world, as would make his life more eaſy and comfortable there [y]. Several other ridiculous

Their principles.

[t] Lucan. ubi ſupra. [u] Comment. ubi ſupra. [x] Diog. Laert. l. i. [y] Cæſ. ubi ſupra.

diculous cuſtoms are recorded of them, with reſpect to this notion of a future life, which can hardly be credited, and which, for that reaſon, we ſhall juſt mention in the margin (F). They alſo pretended to great ſkill in ſome branches of geography and aſtronomy, ſuch as the knowing the bigneſs and form of the earth, the motions of the planets, their influence, and that of the ſtars; from which they aſſumed a knowledge of the divine will, to pry into futurity [z], and to foretel ſtrange events. And if that paſſage which Diodorus Siculus has preſerved to us out of Hecateus [a], and which the reader may find in the margin (G), be to be depended [z] P. Mela, l. iii. c. 6. [a] L. iii. c. 11.

(F) They are ſaid to have lent and borrowed money, &c. in order to repay it in the next world; to have ſent letters to the deceaſed perſon, by flinging it into the fire, or into his grave (59). There have been alſo found in thoſe antient ſepulchres, on Saliſbury plain, ſpoken of before, ſome ſmall plates of ſilver, and other metals, ingraved with a kind of old writing, which are ſuppoſed to have been ſent from the living to the dead by this conveyance. But theſe, and ſuch-like ridiculous cuſtoms, ſeem rather invented by thoſe authors in diſparagement of the Gauliſh notion, and are juſtly laughed at (60).

(G) This paſſage is to the following purport: That there is, according to that author, a northern iſland of conſiderable bigneſs, little leſs than Sicily, ſituate over againſt the Celtæ, and inhabited by thoſe whom the Greeks call Hyperboreans. It is fruitful, pleaſant, and dedicated to Apollo; that god, for the ſpace of nineteen years, uſed to come and converſe with them, and, which is more remarkable, they could (as if they had the uſe of teleſcopes) ſhew the moon very near them, and diſcover therein mountains, &c. He concludes, that over their ſacred grove and temple there preſided a ſet of men called (by the then Greeks, it is ſuppoſed) Boreadæ, who were their prieſts and rulers.

From the author's deſcription and ſituation of this iſland, every body will eaſily perceive that it could be no other but either Great Britain or Ireland; for the Mona, or Angleſey of Rouland (61), is vaſtly too ſmall and inconſiderable to have been meant (59) Valer. Max. l. ii. c. 4. Diod. Sicul. l. vi. c. 9. Cæſ. ubi ſupra. (60) See Keyzler ant. ſeptentr. p. 132, & ſeq. 175. Pelloutier. hiſt. des Celt. relig. des Gaul. & al (61) Mona antiq. ſect. 8. ad fin.

pended upon, and that the druids of Britain, for that ſeems to be the iſland meant by that author, could, as with teleſcopes, ſhew the moon nearer, and diſcover therein mountains, rocks, &c. it cannot but be ſuppoſed that they had made greater progreſs in theſe arts and ſciences than is generally imagined. The nineteen years converſe of Apollo, which is the cycle of the ſun, and the notion of the moon's opacity, of its mountains, rocks, &c. argue them to have been no bad aſtronomers; and if they had really any inſtruments to draw the moon nearer, and make ſuch diſcoveries upon its ſurface, we may conclude them to have been pretty good artiſts for thoſe early times. Pliny adds, that they ſtudied natural philoſophy, and practiſed phyſic [b]. This laſt conſiſted chiefly in the knowledge and uſe of ſimples, but they ſoon found out a way to render it more intricate and myſterious, by intermingling aſtrology, and other ſuperſtitious traſh, amongſt it. The configuration of the planets muſt be conſulted, the herb muſt be gathered with one hand, and not with the other; the hand muſt be covered with the oppoſite lappet of the man's robe; he muſt be dreſſed in white, his feet waſhed and unſhod, and a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe; but all which rather betrays that author's fondneſs of expoſing the Gauls, than to inform mankind. To give one inſtance for all, the reader needs but hear what he ſays of their ſerpents egg, which, as it is related by him, would ſcarcely, upon any other account, be worth inſerting in this hiſtory, but that, whilſt we give him the ſubſtance of it in the margin (H), we ſhall endeavour to Practiſe phyſic.

H h 2 ſtrike

[b] Vide nat. hiſt. l. xxiv. & ſeq.

meant here. It is mentioned as known to the Greeks, as well it might, by means of the tin which the Phœnicians fetched from it, of which we ſha l ſpeak in due time. The author adds, that one Abaris, who became afterwards a diſciple of Pythagoras (62), went from hence into Greece, and contracted an intimacy with the Delians. And might he not be ſuppoſed to have followed that philoſopher from Gaul thither? But we ſubmit that to the reader.

(H) According to his fabulous account, this egg, which was unknown to the reſt of the world, was formed by the ſcum of a vaſt

(62) See biſhop of Worceſter's letter to Dr. Bentley, ap eund ibid.

ſtrike out a more probable and advantageous meaning of this pretended piece of ſuperſtition, than that author could, or was perhaps, willing to do.

We muſt firſt take notice of an antient Gauliſh monument in the great cathedral of Paris, on which this ceremony of catching the egg is repreſented pretty near in the ſame manner as Pliny has given it. Another has been found in Italy [c], on which are carved two ſerpents, the one holding the egg in its mouth, and the other ſhaping and poliſhing it with its ſpittle. If the reader remembers what has vaſt multitude of ſerpents twiſted and conjured up together. As ſoon as they began to hiſs, it was raiſed up into the air, and muſt be caught before it touched the ground, and he that caught it muſt immediately get on a fleet horſe, and ride for his life, from the fury of the ſerpents, which purſued him till a river ſtopped them ſhort. The egg was then to be flung into the water, with a golden ring, which they faſtened about it, and muſt ſwim on the ſurface with it. Its virtues were then almoſt as numberleſs as thoſe of Fortunatus's cap, a great many of which our author mentions, as well as its colour and ſhape; and concludes with telling us, that the emperor Claudius cauſed a Gauliſh nobleman to be put to death merely for having been found with one of theſe eggs in his boſom, and which, it ſeems, he wore there with a view of gaining a law-ſuit in which he was engaged (63).

[c] Antiquité expliq. Relig. des Gaules, l. i. c. 26. iii. c. ult.

What increaſes our wonder of this ridiculous credulity, is, that a modern author (64) has endeavoured to confirm, in a great meaſure, what Pliny has related, by aſſuring us, that in ſeveral parts of Dauphiné, eſpecially one place he names near the confines of Savoy, there is ſuch a prodigious concourſe of all kinds of ſerpents from the 5th of June to the 15th of Auguſt, that there is not one to be ſeen for the ſpace of ten miles round the place. He adds, that the ground where they aſſemble is left covered with a kind of ſcum, which fills one with horror. But he ſays, that no care had been taken to enquire after the ſtory of the egg, whether it was fact, or only an impoſture of the druids. If any thing could perſuade us that the antient Gauls could give into ſuch ridiculous ſuperſtitions, it would be the ſeeing of them ſo eaſily ſwallowed by the modern ones.

(63) Plin. l. xxix. c. 3. (64) Chorier. hiſt. du Dauphiné.

has been ſaid in the coſmogony of the world, at the entrance of this work [d], of the Phœnicians and Egyptians looking upon the egg to be the principle of all things; that it was repreſented as coming forth out of the mouth of a ſerpent, the emblem of the Godhead, or perhaps rather of wiſdom; and if we add what Plutarch obſerves, that the theology of the antients did aſcribe to the egg the priority of time, and the ſeed of all things; he will eaſily decypher a much ſublimer meaning in the mythology of this egg, than that Roman author could, or was perhaps willing to ſee in it, either from thoſe emblematic monuments, or fabulous reports, from which he took his ridiculous account. For it muſt be further obſerved, that the druids were very fond of wrapping up all their learning, and even their moral precepts, in ſuch kinds of myſterious and enigmatic figures. However, we would not deny but after their power came to dwindle, as it began to do from the coming in of the Romans, they might ſlacken apace from their antient purity, and make a trade of ſuch ſuperſtitious fooleries as they would have deſpiſed whilſt in the height of their wealth and ſway, when nothing could well tempt them to it. It is, doubtleſs, to theſe latter times, that we muſt ſuppoſe the antient comedy, called Querulus, or Aulularia, which expoſes the druidiſh knavery with ſo much wit and ſharpneſs, to have referred; and perhaps, alſo, that which another author ſays of them [e], that in their lectures of morality they gave this for a maxim, that the fertility of their fields depended upon their riches, and the largeneſs of their revenues. One doctrine, he tells us, they taught, that fire and water would at length abſorb all things.

Their druideſſes, or female druids.

BEFORE we leave this ſubject, we muſt not omit ſaying ſomething of their famed druideſſes, and the great eſteem they were in among the Gauls, as well as among the Germans [f]. We have already ſhewed, that antiently the Gauliſh women bore a great ſway in this country, of which the druids, in time, ſtripped them; but it is likely, that the druideſſes held ſtill great part of their own credit, eſpecially on account of their being thought endowed with the ſpirit of prophecy; for we cannot find, that they were famed for any thing elſe; and ſome of them, we find, were among the loweſt rank of people. Witneſs Dioclefian's hoſteſs, who, when he was but a private man in the Roman army, then in Gaul, foretold him that he ſhould become emperor after he had killed a boar, or, rather, Aper, as the iſſue ſhewed it [g] a little time after. We have ſeen, likewiſe, in the Roman hiſtory, that their emperors were not above conſulting, and being adviſed by them; particularly Severus [h] and Aurelian, the latter of whom aſking ſome of them how long the empire ſhould laſt in his family, they made no difficulty to tell him boldly, that that of Claudius would one day become the moſt illuſtrious [i]. We ſhall not take upon us to enquire how they came by this extraordinary gift, or whether it was real, or a mere cheat and pretence; only we would obſerve, that the latter cannot be ſuppoſed, without allowing at the ſame time, that the druids themſelves were likewiſe impoſed upon by them; elſe it is not likely they would have allowed them to reign ſo long, and bear ſuch ſway in all religious and civil matters, contrary to the practice of the Indian brachmans, and other ſects of antient philoſophers, who never admitted their women into any of their myſteries [k]. There were three claſſes of druideſſes in Gaul, the chiefeſt of which was of thoſe who kept a perpetual virginity; for theſe were thought to have the ſpirit of prophecy. The next was that of thoſe, who, though married, were yet obliged to abſtain from the matrimonial intercourſe, except one ſingle time in the whole year, in which they were allowed to go and have children by them; after which, they returned to their office, which was, to aſſiſt the druids at their religious functions. The laſt were a kind of attendants, or ſervants, on the others; and this we learn rather from ſome antient monuments and inſcriptions [l], than from antient authors, who have ſaid little more of them than that they were propheteſſes. Both druids and druideſſes pretended to a great knowledge in aſtrology, calculated people's nativities, erected figures, and foretold ſtrange things, both by that, and, much more, by their inhuman auguries; of which bloody cuſtom, we ſhall give a ſpecimen in the margin margin (I) : but thoſe which were ſtyled propheteſſes, were thought to have a gift ſuperior to the reſt, and which was looked upon as ſupernatural ; theſe were called by ſome ſuperior title, ſuch as that of dame was heretofore among us; and were in the higheſt requeſt, not only among their own people, but likewiſe among foreign nations. As for the others, they were much leſs regarded, and their night aſſemblies about ponds and marſhes, to worſhip and conſult the moons, and ſome other ſorceries they pretended to uſe, made them be looked upon as downright witches, canibals, lamiæ, pythoniſſæ, ſtriæ, and every thing that is black and horrid, by chriſtian authors, from the ſixth century downwards [m].

[d] Vol. i. p. 100, 107, & 109. [e] Strabo, l. iv. [f] Tacit. l. iv. c. 54, & ſeq. de mor. Germ. Dio, in fragm. xlix. Plin. & al.

Three orders of them.

[g] See vol. xv. p. 291. [h] Ibid. p. 169. [i] Vopiſcus in Aurel. ſub fin. [k] Vide Plin. ubi ſupr. Tacit. l. iv. Strabo, l. xv. [l] Gruter. p. 62. Relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 27.

THE next order amongſt them, in great eſteem, was that of the bards. Some authors have, indeed, confounded them with the druids, and looked upon the former to be only a more modern name given to them. But there is a paſſage in Strabo which quite explodes that notion, where he ſays [n], that the druids were in the higheſt power, and gave laws

The bards, their office.

[m] Idem ibid. & auct. ab eo citat. [n] L. iv.

(I) It appears, by comparing what antiquaries have been able to collect from ſome antient Gauliſh monuments concerning this bloody ceremony, with what Strabo ſays of it (65) as it was practiſed among the Cimbri, who were a branch of the old Celtes, that there was no material difference between them in this reſpect. We ſhall, therefore, give the purport of what that antient author has left us of it, which is as follows :

The druideſſes were, on theſe occaſions, like the druids, cloathed in white tunics, faſtened with hooks, and girt with a braſs girdle, and without ſhoes. As ſoon as the Cymbrians had taken any captives, theſe women flew upon them with drawn ſwords in their hands, and threw them down ; thence they dragged them to a large capacious labrum, or ciſtern, by the ſide of which was a kind of foot-ſtool, on which the druideſs then officiating ſtood, who plunged a long knife into the breaſt of each of theſe unfortunate wretches, one after another, as faſt as they were brought; and from the flowing of their blood ſhe formed her predictions. The other druideſſes, who aſſiſted, took up the breathleſs bodies, opened and examined their entrails, and from thence likewiſe foretold ſome new things, which were immediately communicated to the whole army or council, and as readily believed.

(65) Lib. vii.

laws to the vates, eubates, and bards, who were everywhere to give them place, when they pleaſed to challenge it, and were not allowed to do any thing without their conſent and approbation. Beſides, we are told by that, and a number of other authors, that theſe bards were ſo called from their office, which was, to ſing the praiſes of their heroes [o], and to accompany their ſongs with muſical inſtruments. And we are told, that their compoſitions were held in the higheſt eſteem, as the moſt effectual means of eternizing the memory of thoſe who had the merit or good fortune to be celebrated in them. One of the authors laſt quoted adds, that they could at any time put a ſtop to a whole army's engaging, by their interpoſition: ſo great a power had wiſdom, and the muſes, over thoſe barbarians [p]. It was their buſineſs to accompany the Gauliſh armies with their ſongs, which were generally calculated to inſpire them with valour and intrepidity, with the love of liberty, and contempt of death [q]. During the onſet, they uſed likewiſe to give ſome loud ſhouts, ſometimes as of victory, other times to intimate their danger, in caſe they did not fight valiantly, or were ready to give way. So that though they did not really fight themſelves, they were ſo intermingled with the army, that they ran, in ſome meaſure, the ſame riſque with thoſe that did (K). By this means they were eye-witneſſes of the behaviour of the combatants, and either celebrated their praiſes in their ſongs, or cenſured thoſe that had not done their duty. And as theſe might in time degenerate, and be often bribed to extol thoſe who had been faulty, faulty, or in praiſing either too much or too little, for favour or intereſt, it is thought they acquired the name of paraſites [r]. But this ſeems very inconſiſtent with what we read of the great eſteem they were in, unleſs we allow that epithet to have antiently carried a more favourable meaning than it doth now (L). To theſe two orders we may add thoſe of the vates and euvates, or eubates, which ſeem to have been ſtill inferior to that of the bards; but whether they were ſo to each other, or the ſame under two names, is not eaſy to gueſs, with that little light we have from antient authors. All that can be conjectured upon the whole, is, that the druids preſided over all religious matters, and bore a great ſway in thoſe of a civil nature. The bards were the recorders of all tranſactions, and treaſured up in their poetic compoſitions the knowledge of things and perſons, and communicated as much of it to the laity, by their ſongs, as the druids thought proper. The vates and euvates might be ſingers of theſe bardiſh compoſitions, and be further retained in the families of the great, to celebrate their praiſes and heroic acts; but as the druids were more known to ſtrangers than the reſt, their name was given to all indifferently, by antient hiſtorians. Vates and euvates.

[o] Diod. Sicul. l. vi. c. 9. Lucan l i. verſ. 447. Ammian. Marcel. l. xv. [p] Diod. Sicul. ubi ſupra. [q] Pauſan. in Phoc.

(K) This may be inferred from what we read of one of them, named Pomponius, a man in great eſteem, both as a bard, and a poet; who finding himſelf in great danger from the enemy, made a vow to Mars, their great protector, to ſacrifice to him a boar, if he eſcaped ſafe (66). It was likewiſe, as we formerly hinted, cuſtomary among their generals, upon all ſuch occaſions, to vow to that god all the plunder, and even the priſoners of war, if they came off victorious.

(66) Macrob. Saturnal. l. vi. c. 9. Aul. Gell. noct. Attic. l. xvi. c. 6.

Diodorus and Cicero ſeem to mention a fifth ſort, viz. the ſaronides; but we have ſhewn, a little higher, that it was but another name for that of the druids, as the learned Bochart has fully proved [s]. As for the flamens, or flamines, though they have been ſuppoſed to have belonged to the druidiſh

[r] Poſidon. ap. Athenæ. l. vi.

[s] Vide & Pelloutier. hiſt. des Celt. l. ii. c. 9.

(L) This epithet, though by length of time become a term of reproach, might not carry ſo harſh a meaning in our author; if it had, it is hardly credible thoſe bards could have kept up their credit ſo long, and in ſo brave and warlike a nation. But, in our opinion, that name was given only to an inferior ſet of bards, who are judged to have been a kind of clients, or ſolduri, who entered themſelves into the ſervice of ſome noblemen or generals, and bound themſelves to live and die with him, and whoſe buſineſs it was to ſing the praiſes of their patrons, in poems compoſed by the bards, before numerous crouds of people, who never failed to ſurround and liſten to them (67).

(67) Caſaubon. in Athen. l. vi.

diſh order, yet biſhop Stillingfleet has ſufficiently diſproved them to have been of Celtic or Gauliſh extract. They were of the Roman kind, and of much later date than either druids or bards. We have ſpoken of them in a former volume, and to that, and the learned prelate above quoted, we ſhall refer our readers, and cloſe this ſection of the Gauliſh religion with obſerving, that, in ſpite of all the ſevere edicts of the Roman and Chriſtian monarchs, there were ſtill very viſible traces of it, and of the very worſt part of the druidiſh rites practiſed not only long after the ſettling of chriſtianity in Gaul, but even to the middle of the ſixth century, as appears by a notable inſtance of it, which we ſhall give in the margin (M).

The end of druidiſh ſuperſtition.

(M) This fact is taken from Procopius, who was himſelf an eye-witneſs of it, and is as follows: Theodebert I. having penetrated into Italy at the head of a conſiderable army, and taken poſſeſſion of the bridge of Pavia, his men offered in ſacrifice the wives and children of the Goths, whom they had ſurpriſed, and caſt their bodies into the river, as the firſt-fruits of that war. "For, ſays he, the Franks, though chriſtians, do ſtill obſerve a "great many of their antient ſuperſtitions. They offer up hu-"man victims, and uſe many execrable rites in their auguries." And another author, who lived till the latter end of the ſeventh century, has a long catalogue of ſuch ſuperſtitions, againſt which, as he was a biſhop, and ſince ſainted for his piety, he forewarns his chriſtian flock. The reader may ſee the paſſage at length in the authors quoted below (68).

(68) Vide father Coint. tom. i. & iii. Fleury's eccleſ. hiſtor. tom. viii. Relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 7.

SECT. IV.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, learning, arts, ſciences, commerce, and cuſtoms, of the antient Gauls.

Their government.

WE have already ſpoken at large of the origin and antiquity of the Gauls, in the hiſtory of the Celtes, their anceſtors [a]; of their migrations and ſettlement in Europe, and

[a] Vol. v. p. 383---394.

and of their antient monarchical government there [b]. How and when it came afterwards to dwindle, and ſplit itſelf into that variety of forms in which the Romans found them afterwards, were in vain to enquire after, conſidering their inbred contempt of learning, and that they kept neither hiſtory nor records but what was couched in the ſongs or ballads of their bards and druids, who kept them, as much as poſſible, from public knowledge, and only ſung or repeated them on certain times, or upon particular occaſions, rather to ſtimulate the people to an imitation of their heroes, than to preſerve any regular ſeries of their tranſactions. All that can be offered concerning this great change, would be only ſuch conjectures as are obvious to every reader; which may, therefore, be eaſily ſpared here, ſince all our intelligence, concerning this their new government, muſt be fetched from hints and ſcraps of ſuch foreign authors who have written of them, ſince they became more known to their neighbours, and of which this is the beſt account that can be given.

THE Gauls were by this time (though ſtill under the ſame name, uſing the ſame language and cuſtoms, and governed by the ſame general laws) under different governments, ſome of which were monarchical, others ariſtocratical, others partly ſo, and partly democratical, and theſe were, by way of diſtinction, called free [c]. Tacitus reckons no leſs than ſixty-four of theſe cities, or, as Cæſar better explains it [d], regions, or diſtricts, who were under this kind of government. Theſe little commonwealths were chiefly governed by the advice of the nobles, but antiently every year they choſe a magiſtrate for civil, and a general for military affairs [e]; yet theſe, as well as thoſe that were under a kingly government, obſerved one conſtant law, to call every year, at a certain time, a general council of the whole nation; in which, whatever related to the common intereſt of the whole nation, was debated and ſettled. And, indeed, theſe warlike people were in no ſmall need of ſuch a general council, ſince they made war one of their chief employments, and were no ſooner free from a foreign one, but they immediately fell a quarrelling among themſelves: ſo that, to prevent theſe inteſtine broils, the chief buſineſs of that grand aſſembly was, to find out ſome plauſible pretence for carrying it againſt ſome of their neighbours, either to pull down thoſe that were over-grown, and raiſed their jealouſy, or to protect the oppreſſed, or furniſh

Grand council of the nation.

[b] Vol. v. p. 403, & ſeq. [c] Cæſar. comment. l. i. c. 1. vi. f. 4. Tacit. ann. l. iii. [d] Iidem ibid. [e] Strab. l. iv.

nish some allies with a number of auxiliaries, and such-like [f]. The free commonwealths had, moreover, a law common to them all, that whoever heard any report, or common rumour, among their borderers, which concerned the common interest, they were obliged to acquaint their magistrates with it, and to conceal it from the people. The magistrates were to conceal what they thought proper, and acquaint the people with the rest; for it was not lawful for any person to talk of matters that related to the whole community, but in the council [g]. All that can be gathered, relating to this grand assembly, out of the same historian, the reader may see in the subsequent note (A). Upon the whole, then, this grand council was the dernier resort of the Gauls, wherein every thing relating not only to peace and war, but to property, boundaries, territories, distribution of plunder, and such-like, between district and district, was finally determined. For if, for instance, after some successful victory, or excursion, any debate

[f] Comment. l. vi. c. 6. Strabo, l. iv. Mela, l. iii. c. 3. Cæsar, ibid. l. vi. c. 4. [g] Comment. l. vi. c. 4.

(A) The Gauls, says that conqueror (1), demanded that a general council of their whole nation should be summoned, and that it might be done by his consent. A council was, accordingly, assembled at Bibracte, where was a vast concourse from all parts of the nation (2). And elsewhere he tells us, that he summoned that Gallish council to meet in the spring; and the Treviri, Senones, and Carnuti, not coming with the rest, he adjourned it to meet at Paris (3).

Among them who opposed his measures, were, Dumnorix, one of the chiefs of the Æduan commonwealth, against whom he had sent an order to have him slain, who, thereupon, applied himself to the council, alledging, that he was a member of a free commonwealth, and begged to be protected by them (4). Another was Vercingetorix, who, Cæsar says, flattered himself that he should be able to unite such commonwealths to him as dissented from the rest of the Gallish cities, and to form such a general council of all Gaul, as the whole world should not be able to withstand (5).

This is all that we can meet with concerning those grand councils; but as to other particulars relating either to the extent of their power, the time, manner, and place of their being summoned and held, and the like, history leaves us wholly in the dark.

(1) L. i. c. 12. (2) L. i. c. 12. (3) L. vi. c. 1. (4) L. c. 3. (5) L. vii. c. 6.

debate happened about the plunder, as it ſeldom failed to be followed with a great deal of bloodſhed, if not timely prevented, and, if Polybius may be credited, ſuch bloody frays did often happen for ſuch trifles as the plunder of a good ſtore of victuals, and eſpecially of wine [h]; the diſpute was deferred to the aſſembly of the diſtrict, or commonwealth. But whenever it happened, as it often did, between diſtrict and diſtrict, the grand council muſt either determine between them, or elſe they were ſure to butcher one another, till one ſide was forced to give over. So that Tacitus had great reaſon to ſay of them, as he did of their neighbours the Germans; "If "they will not be in friendſhip with us, let them at leaſt fall "out among themſelves: fortune can do no greater ſervice, "than to ſet them at variance among themſelves [i]." All that needs be further added, with relation to theſe ſmall commonwealths, is, that they ſeem to have had ſuch an averſion to kingly government, that one of them, that of the Ædui (B), ordered the great Certillus, the father of Vercingetorix, mentioned a little higher, a man in great power and credit, and eſteemed the firſt man in Gaul, to be put to death, for having aſpired to the kingdom [k]. At the ſame time they were ſo extremely jealous of each other's power, that they were Commonwealths.

[h] L. ii. [i] German. c. 33. [k] Vide & comment. l. vi. c. 11.

(B) The Ædui were one of the three chief commonwealths in Gaul (6), and ſituate near Autun; the country is now called Lower Burgundy.

The other two were the Arverni and the Rhemi. The former of theſe were ſited on the river Loire; their capital was called Arvernum, now Clermont, the capital of Guienne; and they became, in time, ſo powerful, that, according to Strabo, they made war againſt Cæſar with 400000 men (7), and, a little before the arrival of their conqueror, had quite weakened their rivals the Ædui, by withdrawing moſt of their clients and dependents (8): and it was, probably, upon this juncture, that they condemned that great commander of theirs to loſe his head, and choſe his ſon in his ſtead.

The Rhemi were the antient inhabitants of the country of Rheims, whoſe antient and famous metropolis ſtill bears the ſame name, and is one of the greateſt, and moſt populous cities of France.

(6) Tacit. l. iii Cæſar. com. l. v. (7) Strab. l. iv.
(8) Comment. l. vi. c. 4. vii. c. 10.

were obliged to enter into combinations againſt each other, and the little ones to put themſelves under the protection of the greater ones; an inſtance of which we gave in the laſt note. Cæſar doth ſometimes call the former tributary and ſubject to the latter, but moſt commonly confederate with them. Upon his firſt entrance into Gaul he found it divided into two factions: the Ædui were at the head of one, and the Arverni at the head of the other; and both, he tells us, had for many years contended for the ſuperiority [1]. What increaſed the diſſenſion ſtill more, was, that the Bituriges, a people in the province of Berri, and neighbours of the Arverni, were ſtill in ſubjection to the Ædui; and the Sequani, who lived in Upper Burgundy, now Franche Comté, and neighbours to the Ædui, were under the protection of the Arverni.

Kings. SUCH were the unhappy diviſions between the Gauliſh commonwealths (C), which gave ſo great an advantage to the Romans againſt them, and which they failed not to improve, according to their wonted policy, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. Cæſar,

[1] Idem, l. i. c. 12. vi. c. 4.

(C) Accordingly, we find the Senones, or rather Semnones, who inhabited ſome part of the Lionois, joining in league with that of the Pariſians, and both ſoon after putting themſelves under the protection of the Ædui. The Bellovaci, a very populous commonwealth, and in great repute and authority among the Belgæ (9), were likewiſe allied with them. Their capital, then a very conſiderable city, was called Bellovacum, and Cæſaromagus; their country ſtill retains the name of Beauvois.

Cæſar reckons, moreover, five different people under the dominion of the Nervii (10), another antient, fierce, and warlike people of Belgia, ſuppoſed to have dwelt in the now dioceſe of Cambray; theſe were the Centrones, or inhabitants of Courtray. Grudii, ſuppoſed to have dwelt about Bruges; the Lævaci, about Louvain; the Pleumoſii, or Pleumaſii, whoſe ſituation is uncertain; and the Gorduni, ſituate in the neighbourhood of Ghent. The Eburones and Condruſii, who lived in the territories of Liege and Namur, were clients to the Treviri or inhabitants of the country of Triers, the then principal nation in Belgia prima. The Veneti, or inhabitants of Gallia Armorica, or Britany, compoſed ſo powerful a commonwealth, that our author (11) tells us, their dominion was one of the moſt extenſive.

(9) Idem, l. ii. c. 4. vii. c. 7. (10) L. v. c. 11. (11) L. iv. c. 2.

Cæſar, finding the Arverni too ſtrong for, and averſe to him, entered into an alliance with the Ædui, who were by this time become vaſtly inferior to them, complimenting them with the title of friends and brothers to the Roman people. Their example was ſoon followed by others, ſo that partly by cajoling ſome, and ſowing jealouſies and diſcords among others, he facilitated the conqueſt of that noble and warlike nation, which, had it been more united in intereſt, and form of its government, muſt, in all appearance, have proved too hard for him.

But, notwithſtanding this great multitude, and variety of commonwealths, it is plain, that both Gaul, Germany, and Spain, ſtill ſwarmed with petty kingdoms, that is, with diſtricts, governed by kings, whom the Romans ſtyled reguli, or petty kings, but the Gauls ſtyled kings (D), though their

(D) The word rex ſeems plainly enough to be of Celtic extract, viz. from rhey, prince, or lord: hence we have ſhewed in a former volume (12), Rhea, Jove's mother, to have had that name given her, as implying a lady, or princeſs, as ſhe really was. The name of Rhey might therefore be given to thoſe antient monarchs, till their vaſt kingdom came to ſplit itſelf, as we have ſeen above, into ſo many petty principalities and commonwealths; at which time, it is probable, thoſe petty kings came to be called Tyrannes, or, according to the old Celtic, Tyr-rhanwir, from their being the perſons who divided the people into ſuch diſtricts, or communities, and ſettled the boundaries of each, as well as the portions of land which every family under them was to be entitled to. Hence the tyranni of the Greeks, and the word tyrant, might at firſt carry a much better meaning, till their degeneracy made it to become ſo odious, that they changed it for thoſe of princes, dukes, earls, &c. (13).

The author of the Mona antiqua, above quoted, thinks the name and office of theſe tyrans to be of much older date; and that, in all probability, ſome ſuch power or dignity is tacitly implied in one of the ſtatutes of the ſons of Noah, called de judiciis (14). We have formerly given our ſentiments concerning that rabbinic book (15) ſo much diſcredited by ſome, and ſo ſtrongly defended by our learned Selden. But, without having recourſe to ſuch queſtioned authorities, reaſon plainly tells us, that from the firſt diſperſion there muſt have been ſome ſuch tyr rhanwirs, or land-aſſigners, as the word implies, to prevent the continual quarrels

(12) Vol. v. p. 424, (K).
(13) See Rouland's Mona Antiqua, p. 41, & ſeq.
(14) Hottoman. Franco-Gal. c. 1.
(15) Vol. i. p. 341, & ſeq.

their dominions were ever ſo ſmall. Theſe differed from the magiſtrates of commonwealths, in that they enjoyed their dignity during life; and from common monarchs, in that it was not hereditary (E), but ſometimes conferred by the people upon ſuch as were in the greateſt eſteem for juſtice, wiſdom, and bravery. Sometimes they were forced by one nation upon another, as the Bituriges did one over the Celtæ, in the reign of Tarquinius Priſcus [m]; ſometimes a brave and powerful man forced himſelf upon the throne: and even thoſe who ſeem to have come to the crown by ſucceſſion, were far from being arbitrary, or having an unlimited power, but were as much accountable to the people as thoſe that were choſen by them. This is, at leaſt, what Ambiorix, king of the Eburones, owns, with relation to himſelf. "The conſtitution of our government, ſays he, is ſuch, that the "people

How choſen.

Their power limited.

[m] Livy, l. v.

quarrels that muſt inevitably happen for want of them. And theſe were moſt likely the heads of families, whoſe paternal authority carried a kind of divine right. For if mankind ſprung from one man, then the original of government muſt be ſuppoſed, of courſe, to have been not only monarchical, but ſuch by divine appointment, and veſted in the heads of families.

Moſes further obſerves (16), that the three families of Noah's ſons were, after the flood, divided after their tongues and families, begojehem, in their nations, that is, into ſeparate communities, over whom the chief, or head, preſided, and was the rhey, or lord, and tyr-rhanwir, or aſſigner of their proper lands in each ſettlement. But however that be, in ſuch a change of government as here happened among the Celts or Gauls, nothing can be more evident, than the neceſſity of ſuch a kind of deſpotic diſtributers and aſſigners of lands in each new kingdom or commonwealth; and who could be fitter for ſuch an office, than thoſe who bore the greateſt authority?

(E) At leaſt J. Cæſar mentions ſeveral eminent private men, whoſe anceſtors had been formerly inveſted with the regal dignity, and, among theſe, Caſticus, whoſe father had been many years king of the Sequani (17); Piſo, whoſe grandfather had reigned in Aquitania (18); and Taſgetius, whoſe anceſtors had been kings of the Carnutes (19), and whoſe territories retain ſtill the name of Chartrain. So that they ſeem rather to have been magiſtrates for life, than real kings, eſpecially as their power is affirmed to have been limited by the people.

(16) Geneſis x. (17) L. i. c. 2. (18) L. iv. c. 3. (19) L. v. c. 8.

"people have no less power and authority over me, than I "have over them [n]." This form has been, indeed, much admired by Aristotle, Polybius, Cicero, and especially by Plato, as by far the safest, and most excellent; because, as the last of these rightly observes, should kingly government be left without a bridle, when it hath attained the supreme power, as it stands upon such slippery ground, it easily falls into tyranny. "For this reason, says he, it ought to be "restrained, as with a curb, by the authority of the nobles, "and of such chosen men as the people have impowered for "that end and purpose [o]."

It is not easy to guess from Cæsar's commentaries, from which we have the greatest part of this intelligence, either how many of these kings there were in Gaul, or what nations were governed by them, and which by a common-wealth; but both were equally courted by the Romans, and for the same reason, viz. to withdraw from, and weaken the force of those that opposed their conquests. These petty kings, especially, were often corrupted by dint of gifts, promises, or some fine titles, such as that of "friends and con-"federates of Rome," to embroil the Gaulish affairs, and foment dissensions among their little kingdoms and republics: even the poorest and most inconsiderable amongst them were thought worth their while to bring over to them; and if they found them busy and active in their interest, they failed not to reward them in such a manner as was most likely to draw others into the same treacherous practices. Among those whom Cæsar mentions among the friends and allies of Rome, was Catamantales, king of the Sequani [p], the grandfather of Piso, mentioned a little higher, who reigned in Aquitain, and [q] whose name the conqueror has not thought fit to record; and Olevico, king of the Nitiobriges, or people of Agenois, who had that title bestowed upon him by the Roman senate [r]. Among those who made the noblest resistance against the Romans, was Divitiacus, king of the Suessones, a brave people of Gallia Belgica, who was one of the most potent princes of all Gallia. His territories were large and fruitful: he had twelve considerable cities, one of which, Noviodunum, now Noyons, Cæsar afterwards reduced, and with it that whole nation, as we have elsewhere shewn [s], notwithstanding they had had brought 500000 fighting men againſt him. This prince's dominions is ſaid to have extended even to Little Britany. He was ſucceeded by Galba, at the time when Cæſar invaded them [t]. Thus much for the Gauliſh government, which we ſhall cloſe with a ſevere reflection which that conqueror makes upon it, and which will ſhew how much their inteſtine feuds contributed to his conqueſt of them. "Among the Gauls, "ſays he [u], not only all their cities, cantons, and diſtricts, "but even almoſt all families, are divided and torn by fac- "tions. Theſe are generally cauſed and fomented by their "princes and demagogues, who exerciſe a kind of arbitrary "power and authority over their inferiors and dependents, "and manage all public matters with an uncontroulable "ſway." Tacitus obſerves much the ſame thing [w] of it; ſo that, in ſpite of all their bravery, their ruin ſeems no leſs than inevitable, when ſo torn and diſmembered from within, and invaded by ſuch powerful and politic enemies from without.

Caressed and corrupted by the Romans.

[n] Comment. l. v. c. 8. [o] Vide Hottoman. Franco-Gall. in fin. c. 1. [p] Comment. l. i. c. 2. [q] L. iv. c. 3. [r] L vii. c. 6. [s] See before, vol. xiii. p. 29.

Their laws. WHETHER theſe diſaſters were occaſioned through the want of a good body of laws, or through the neglect and violation of them, is not eaſy to determine. We have, indeed, obſerved, in a former volume, that Mercury is ſaid to have civilized the Celtic nation, in many reſpects, and, amongſt other things, that he gave them a ſet of laws [x]. Another author gives the credit of this to one Samothes, a man of profound learning and wiſdom among them, and ſaid to have been the founder of the Celtic monarchy [y]. But what thoſe laws were, if any ſuch were, indeed, compiled for them, we are wholly in the dark. The druids and bards, who had the keeping and interpreting of them, were too cautious to divulge them to ſtrangers, or even to any of their own nation, except to thoſe of their own order; ſince they obſerved the ſame ſhineſs with relation to all other branches of learning, which they carefully concealed from the people. But whatever that ſyſtem of laws may have been, it muſt have ſuffered a total change, upon the abolition of the monarchy, and the diſmembering of the whole into ſo many petty kingdoms and commonwealths. And, indeed, by all we can gather from Cæſar, or any other antient author, they ſeem ſo far from having been tyed by any common body of laws, that, except that of holding a general aſſembly every year, and another ther of permitting all private quarrels and conteſts to be decided by ſingle combat [z], which every community was obliged to permit, they rather appear to have been wholly governed by the deciſions of the council, whether of each diſtrict, or of the whole nation, unleſs where kings did bear an abſolute ſway, if any ſuch there were; for, as far as we can find, moſt of this ſort were as much ſubject to the people, as they to them. If we may, however, gueſs from ſome inſtances of their hiſtory, they ſeem to have held one general maxim, viz. that the longeſt ſword had the beſt title, and that it was the deſign of the ſupreme being that the ſtrongeſt ſhould ſtrip the weakeſt; and that he who had not power enough to defend his right, ought to yield it to him that was capable of taking it from him. The following inſtance, out of Livy [a], is a pregnant one, that this was an eſtabliſhed principle amongſt them.

[t] L. ii. c. 1, & ſeq. [u] L. vi. c. 11. [w] Annal. l. i. c. 11. [x] See vol. v. p. 434. [y] See Lewis hiſt. Brit. and the authors quoted by him, book i. ch. 2.

They founded their right on their ſwords.

THE Senones, of whom we have ſpoken a little higher, finding themſelves too much ſtreightened in their territories, fell foul upon the city of Cluſium, whoſe territories happened to lie very convenient for them; upon which, the beſieged applied to the Roman ſenate for help, who being, at that juncture, unwilling to enter into a war with the aggreſſors, contented themſelves with ſending them three young patricians of the Fabian family, in a friendly embaſſy to them. Theſe opened their commiſſion before the general aſſembly of the Gauls, which was, in ſubſtance, to require the Senones to ceaſe all further hoſtilities againſt the Cluſians, otherwiſe the ſenate would be obliged, againſt their will, to ſupport the oppreſſed, againſt whom they could allege no cauſe of complaint. To this the Gauls anſwered, with their uſual politeneſs, to the following effect; viz. that though they were not acquainted with the Romans, they could not but have a great notion of their bravery, ſeeing the Cluſians had implored their aſſiſtance under their preſent unhappy ſituation. "Your "principals, continued they, having choſen to ſend an embaſ- "ſy to us, rather than their forces to ſupport their allies, we "do not refuſe the peace which you offer to us, provided the "Cluſians, who hold more lands than they can cultivate, "agree to yield ſome of them to us, who are in want of "them. This is the only condition upon which we can "make peace with you, and we deſire a poſitive anſwer be- "fore your departure. If the Cluſians will not agree to it, [z] Concerning the origin of this cuſtom, ſee vol. xix. p. 312, & ſeq. [a] Livy, l. v. c. 35, & ſeq. Plutarch. in Camil.

" we are ready to give them battle, even now, before you,
" that you may be able to inform your countrymen how " much the Gauls are superior to other nations, in point of
" bravery."

Their sharp answer to the Roman embassadors.

To this the embassadors replied, without seeming to understand the force of the last words, that they could not but look upon it as a piece of great injustice, to insist upon a people's yielding the territories they were lawfully possessed of, and to wage war against them because they refused to do so. Whereupon Brennus, the Gaulish leader, without farther ceremony, answered, that the Gauls carried their right at the point of their sword; and that the brave had the best title to all things. " You yourselves, said he, have made " no scruple to strip the Albanians, Fidenates, Volscii, &c.
" of the greatest part of their territories; and yet you did " nothing, in all this, that we pretend to censure, as either
" strange, or unjust: for you did only follow the prime,
" and most antient of all laws, which obliges the weak to " give way to the strong. This law seems to be derived " from the deity itself, and extends down to the very
" brutes, amongst which, the strongest naturally seek to " subdue the weakest. Cease, then, to take the part of the " besieged Clusians, lest the Gauls should one day think
" themselves obliged, in their turn, to shew the same com-
" passion towards those whom you have oppressed." This was, indeed, an argument ad hominem, and such as the Romans could never answer, but tacitly approved and followed, though they had not the ingenuity to own it, as the Gauls did, upon all such occasions (F). What the success of this embassy

(F) A remarkable instance of this, we have in the same Gaulish general, who having promised the Romans to raise the siege of the capitol, and to retire from them, upon condition they paid him a thousand pounds weight of gold, when the money was brought to be weighed to him, ordered false weights to be made use of; and being asked by the Roman tribune what he meant by them, proudly answered him, " What should it mean, but woe to
" the conquered (19)?"

In like manner, a little before the battle which Marius gained over the Cimbri, another tribe of the Gauls, we find one of these sending a challenge to fight the stoutest of the Romans in single combat, and overcome by the brave L. Opimius (20). Soon after embaſſy was, is foreign to our preſent ſubject: we have given a full account of it in a former volume [a], and only repeat it here to ſhew, by what laws this nation was chiefly governed, viz. that of the ſtrongeſt arm; and that if ever they had any other laws, they ſuffered them to be ſuperſeded by this, which they falſely called the law of nature.

(19) L. v. c. 8.

(20) Livy, l. v. c. 48. Plutarch. in Camil.

NEITHER was this maxim of theirs confined to foreign conqueſts, but extended itſelf to the deciſion of private right among themſelves; for when any debates aroſe amongſt them, about their poſſeſſions, about any injury or affront, given or received, eſpecially among thoſe of the better ſort, in caſe the council or public magiſtrate did not give ſentence to the ſatisfaction of both parties, they generally decided the point by ſingle combat. Neither could their magiſtrates deny them that liberty, when once inſiſted upon by either party; nor could the oppoſite decline the challenge, without giving up the point, and being branded with ignominy. Antiently, indeed, that is, whilſt the whole Gauliſh nation were under a monarchical government, the druids and bards, who, as we have formerly hinted, were the keepers and interpreters of their laws, and preſided in all their courts and councils with ſuch an uncontrouled ſway, that it was the moſt dangerous thing to contravene their deciſions, ſuch diſputes may have been, and, it is moſt likely, were actually decided by theſe courts and councils; but after they came to be ſeparated into ſo many different governments, they began to look upon ſuch ſubjection as a kind of outrage to their freedom and honour, and to ſubſtitute this way of ſingle combat to it, not only as the ſhorteſt, but as the more after this, Bojorix, one of their kings, came in perſon to Marius's camp, and challenged him to appoint a day and place for a battle, there to decide their right to the territories they were then diſputing about, purſuant to their general and received maxim, that providence was always on the ſide of the ſtrongeſt and braveſt (21). The ſame notion was common among the Germans, and was alledged by their king Arioviſtus, who having conquered the Sequani, told Julius Cæſar, that the right of conqueſt intitled the conqueror to uſe the conquered as he pleaſed (22).

Decided their lawſuits, &c. by ſingle combat.

[a] See before, vol. xi. p. 577, & ſeq.

(21) See before, vol. xii. p. 496.

(22) Livy & Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

honourable, and more agreeable to that received maxim of theirs, that providence was engaged to side with the right party; and that success was a sure token that the conqueror had the best title to the thing in dispute. And as the party who thought himself injured had a right to appeal to this way of duel, to justify his dissatisfaction, even though the king himself had given sentence against him, and his opponent was obliged to submit to it; so if the case of the two contenders was so intricate, that the judges could not readily determine it, they used to adjudge them to this method of ending the contest. Even the very witnesses, if their depositions chanced to contradict each other, were obliged to clear themselves by fighting. In a word, whatever was decided by single combat, was looked upon as of greater weight and authority than any sentence that was passed either by king, or court of judicature. Accordingly, we read of two contending brothers in Spain, between whom Scipio would fain have compromised their dispute about the succession, who told him, with one accord, that they would submit to no judgment, either of God or man, but to that of Mars [b]. Herodotus, who often confounds the Scythians with the Celtes, tells us, that they were wont to keep, and shew to the strangers, that travelled through their countries, the heads of those whom they had thus overcome in single combat, in quarrels about property, honour, and such-like [c]. The same custom was also practised among the Germans, who are reported to have lulled Varro asleep, by complimenting him with having found out means to end quarrels and disputes by the way of justice, which they were wont to decide by the sword [d].

Strange fondness for duels.

To such a degree of fondness for these single combats were they grown, that the very candidates for places of honour or trust, when their pretensions or merit were esteemed nearly equal, had recourse to it; and even among the druids themselves, the choice of a chief, when the old one died, was often decided by it, whenever any dispute arose about the number or validity of the votes of those who had the chusing of him [e]. And, what was still more prodigious, these challenges were often sent for mere punctilios, and trifling piques, especially at their feasts, and drunken revels, and many times out of [b] Livy, l. xxvii. c. 21. [c] Herodot. l. vi. c. 65.

[d] Velleii Paterc. l. i. c. 118. [e] Comment. l. vi. c. 13. Tacit. ann. l. xiii. c. 57. N. Damascen. Veget. de re milit. & al.

of mere oſtentation, and to make parade of their ſtrength and bravery; of which, the two following are pregnant inſtances, and plainly ſhew how tenacious they were of this general law of deciding all controverſies by the ſword. Livy, ſpeaking of the funeral obſequies which Scipio Africanus performed to the memory of his father and uncle, who both died in the Spaniſh wars, tells us, that there came vaſt crowds of perſons of diſtinction to Carthagena, a city in Spain, ſaid to have been built by Aſdrubal, to honour that ceremony by ſingle combats. "Theſe, ſays he, did not fight "like the common gladiators, either by force, or for money, "but of their own accord, and free will." Some were ſent thither by their princes, to diſplay their bravery, for the credit of their nation; others declared they came to do honour to their general. Some came to fight there out of oſtentation; and others becauſe they could not refuſe the challenge that was ſent to them. Amongſt them there were ſome, who having law-ſuits, or ſome controverſies with others, agreed among themſelves to put off the deciſion of them to this time and place, and with this condition, that the eſtate or thing in diſpute ſhould fall to the conqueror [f]. The other inſtance, which we have out of the ſame author [g], is of ſome Gauliſh mountaineers, who were generally looked upon as ſome of the rudeſt and fierceſt of that nation, whom Hannibal had taken priſoners; theſe the Carthaginian general ordered to be brought at the head of his army, and, having provided them with a ſufficient number of Gallic arms, offered them their liberty, upon condition that they ſhould engage in ſingle combat, and vanquiſh every man his antagoniſt; promiſing, moreover, that every victor ſhould be preſented with a horſe, and a ſet of warlike accoutrements. This they readily accepted, and, in ſight of the whole army, fought with ſuch intrepid bravery, that the ſpectators knew not which to admire moſt, the victor, or the vanquiſhed (G).

[f] Livy, l. xxviii. c. 21. [g] L. xxi. c. 42.

(G) The Romans ſeem to have preſerved ſome ſuch barbarous cuſtom, at an antient temple of Diana, in the neighbourhood of Rome, where the high prieſt was to be a fugitive ſlave, and could keep his dignity no longer than he had the good luck to kill ſuch other fugitive ſlaves as came to diſpute it with him. Whoever killed him, was immediately declared his ſucceſſor and

continued

How long this duelling humour has been preſerved among ſome of our neighbours, and how little to their credit, in ſpite of their ſpecious pretence of honour, we need not here obſerve: their anceſtors, it is plain from their hiſtory, made war their chiefeſt trade, and higheſt glory; and if they carried that favourite paſſion to exceſs, this may be ſaid, in extenuation of it, not only that the ſame warlike phrenſy reigned all over Europe, and far beyond, but, likewiſe, they were under a kind of neceſſity of indulging it to the utmoſt, in order to put a ſtop to the encroachments of a neighbouring nation, who aimed at no leſs than the enſlaving of all the world (H). No wonder, then, if in ſuch a caſe they uſed continued in that office till another took it from him in the ſame way (23). But whether this cuſtom was introduced in imitation, or, rather, as ſeems moſt likely, in contempt of the Gauliſh and Celtic duelling, we leave to our readers.

Some think, however, that when the Romans exchanged the old Italic religion for that of the Greeks, they thought fit to turn over that pontifical dignity to their ſlaves, which expoſed the owner of it to ſuch continual and dangerous inconveniences (24). Caligula is reported to have put an end to it, by ſending an expert gladiator, who deprived him at once of his dignity and life (25).

(H) The Gauls, as well as Germans, Spaniards, &c. had the more reaſon to oppoſe the Romans, with all their might, becauſe they knew, by the experience of other nations, that where-ever theſe new conquerors got the better, they overturned their fundamental laws, put an end to all their public councils, gave them new governors and magiſtrates, diſarmed the people, loaded them with ſuch heavy taxes, and ſubjected them to ſuch a new form of government, as appeared to them intolerable.

To all theſe we may add a much greater inſtance of the Roman tyranny, which was, that when any of theſe brave nations, that had been unfortunately brought under their heavy yoke, did make any attempt, as it was natural and laudable in them to do, or were even but ſuppoſed by their deſpotic maſters to have a deſign, to regain their liberty, they were ſure to be made ſuch dreadful examples to the reſt, as can hardly be mentioned without horror: we ſhall refer our readers to the Roman hiſtory, for numberleſs inſtances of their cruelty to thoſe brave nations, and only obſerve here, that nothing could more effectually inſpire ſuch uſed all poſſible means to inure themſelves to martial deeds, to inſpire their youth with a contempt of death, and thirſt after glory and liberty, and to prefer an honourable death to an ignominious ſlavery. This became, accordingly, ſuch a ſettled maxim among them, that they ſeemed to have no other concern in this world, than either to preſerve their liberty, or to avoid ſlavery by a noble death [h]. Whenever, therefore, we ſhall ſee their deſcendents encourage theſe kinds of ſingle combats from the ſame laudable motives, we ſhall readily own them to follow in the ſteps of their warlike anceſtors. But if their views rather tend to rob other nations of their liberty, than to preſerve their own, they will be juſtly chargeable with having improved the Gallic ferocity, by the ſuperaddition of the Roman ambition and tyranny.

(23) Vide comment. l. i. c. 36. (24) Strabo, l. v. Ovid. art. amand. (25) Serv. in Æneid. verſ. 136. Vide Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. l. ii. c. 11.

Exceſſive love of liberty.

But to return to the antient Gauls: They had ſuch a ſingular contempt of life when not accompanied with liberty and martial deeds, that either upon the appearance of ſervitude, or incapacity of action through old age, wounds, or any chronic diſeaſes, they either put an end to their days, or elſe prevailed upon their friends to do it, eſteeming this laſt ſtate as much a kind of ſlavery, as falling into the hands of their enemies. In cities, when once they found themſelves ſo ſtreightly beſieged by their enemies, that they could hold out no longer, inſtead of thinking how to make the moſt honourable terms of capitulation, their chief care, many times, was, to put their wives and children to death, and then to kill one another, to avoid being led into ſlavery. In the field, when they were forced to make ſuch a haſty retreat, that they could not readily procure carriages for thoſe who were not able to follow them on foot, as the ſick, wounded, and the like; they made no ſcruple to diſpatch them, out of hand. And this was ſo far from being reckoned a hardſhip on them, that it was what they begged, with the greateſt vehemence and earneſtneſs; of all which we have ſeen very many inſtances through the courſe of this work, and ſhall beg leave to add two more, very remarkable in their kind.

Signal inſtances of it.

The firſt is of their famous, and, till then, ſucceſsful, general, Brennus, who being dangerouſly wounded, in that unfortunate

[h] Tacit. ann. l. ii. c. 15.

ſuch a brave warlike one as this of the Gauls, with a ſpirit of liberty, and deteſtation of the Roman tyranny, than thoſe diſmal cataſtrophes of their unfortunate neighbours, which they had before their eyes.

unfortunate expedition which he undertook againſt Greece, and ſeeing his army deſtroyed, partly by the enemy, and partly by hunger, cold, and other accidents, called together the broken remnant of his troops, and adviſed them to chuſe Cichorius for their leader, who ſhould firſt diſpatch him, and all the ſick and wounded, and afterwards head them back into their own country. The thing was accordingly executed by him, and 20000 of thoſe unhappy wretches were put to death. Brennus, only, choſe to die by his own hands, as the moſt glorious death of the two, in his opinion [i]. The other is of thoſe Gauls who being on the eve of giving battle to Antigonus, and being threatened by their aruſpices with a total overthrow, went firſt, and killed their wives and children, and then reſolutely marched to meet that glorious death, which their ſoothſayers had foretold them [k]. With the ſame ſpirit of liberty did thoſe act, who were unfortunately taken priſoners by their enemies, before they had had time to diſpatch themſelves: for if once the conqueror began to treat them as ſlaves, to load them with chains, or condemn them to hard labour, they ſeldom failed taking the firſt opportunity of putting an end to their ſlavery by a voluntary death; even the very loading them with chains, as was commonly uſed by all nations, has raiſed this ſpirit in them to ſuch a height, that they have ruſhed upon, and butchered one another, by mutual conſent [l]. Neither was this love of liberty confined to the men, their women are no leſs famous for it, in hiſtory; nor did they come ſhort of the Spartan, and other female heroines, but rather excelled them, in this deſperate kind of fury; inſomuch that, when they have perceived their men to give ground, they have ſallied out, armed with axes, and ſuch other weapons as came firſt to hand, and, with moſt hideous outcries, fallen foul both on the fugitives and on their enemies; on the firſt, as betrayers of their country; and on the others as invaders of their liberties. We ſhall give ſome remarkable inſtances of this female valour under the next head.

In the mean time, it will not be improper to take notice of a judicious reflection which Strabo makes upon this exceſſive love of liberty, and contempt of death, which reigned among the Gauls, viz. that it did very much facilitate the conqueſt of that nation; becauſe their pouring thus furiouſly their numerous rous troops upon such an experienced enemy as the Romans were, under Cæsar, their want of conduct and circumspection, made them rather encrease the number of the vanquished, than stop the progress of the conqueror; whereas those in Spain, by dividing their forces, and a prudent choice of the most advantageous grounds, and strongest passes, and disputing with them every such place, inch by inch, made their conquest more difficult, and longer in completing [m]. This remark is certainly very just, and the Spaniards, by joining policy to their valour, did put off their slavery some few years longer; whereas the Gauls trusting too much to their number and bravery, were more speedily reduced: yet were the former wanting in a main point of politics, and as they were, like the Gauls, divided into so many petty states, had they, like them, joined their forces against the common enemy, they might, in all likelihood, have baffled all the Roman valour and policy. For, as the same historian observes in another place [n], it was by this way of conquering one little state after another, that both Carthaginians, and, after them, the Romans, made themselves masters of that country.

[i] Excerpt. ex Diodor. Sicul. l. xxii. ap. legal. Hoeſhel. p. 158, Vide Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. l. ii. c. 14. Juſtin. ex Trog. l. xxiv. c. 8. Pauſan. in Phoc. c. 23. [k] Juſtin. l. xxvi. c. 2. [l] Iidem ibid. Vide & Florum, l. ii. c. 11. iv. 12.

THIS is not a proper place to enquire into the causes that occasioned the loss of liberty to the Gaulish nation: it will more properly be done, when we have brought their history down to that sad catastrophe. The point we are upon is, their valour, and love of their country, laws, and liberty, in which noble virtues no nation ever distinguished themselves more than this, or was more dreaded by the Romans for them. Witness that law which the latter made, and is recorded by several of their own writers [o], whereby all dispensations formerly granted to priests, old men, and invalids, were to be made void, in case they were threatened with any tumult or danger from the Gauls; which law is, moreover, taken notice of by Cicero [p], and by Cæsar himself [q]; so that there was a time when they were more afraid of the Gaulish valour, than of any other nation, or even their neighbours the Germans, whose superiors they proved themselves so far in this point, that they forced their own colonies upon them beyond the Rhine, whenever their vast encrease made their own territories too streight for them. Tacitus doth, indeed, tell us, in his life of Agricola, that they were by that time very much degenerated from their antient valour; which is neither improbable, bable, nor a great wonder, considering how many of their petty kings, and little states, had been corrupted, partly by Roman gold, partly by pompous titles, and high promises, which introduced amongst them luxury and indolence, hastened on the loss of their virtue and liberty, and turned them into traytors against the rest of their countrymen. We shall beg leave, in justice to them, to conclude this article with a remarkable passage or two out of Justin, which are as follow[r]:

[m] Strab. l. iv. [n] L. iii. [o] Livy, l. viii. Appian. l. ii. Vide & Plutarch. in vit. Marcel. & Camil. & Tacit. de morib. German. [p] Philippic. ii. [q] Comment. l. vi.

"THE Gauls, finding their multitudes to encrease so fast, "that their lands could not afford them sufficient sustenance, "sent out three hundred thousand souls to seek for new habi- "tations: part of these settled in Italy, and these both took "and burnt the city of Rome; another part penetrated as "far as the shores of Dalmatia, and, having destroyed there "an infinite number of barbarians, settled themselves at last "in Pannonia. A bold, hardy, and martial nation this, who "ventured (next after Hercules, who, by the like attempt, "raised himself to the highest pitch of reputation, and title to "immortality) to cross the almost inaccessible rocks of the Alps, "and places scarce passable through their excessive coldness; "where, having totally subdued the Pannonians, they waged "war with the neighbouring provinces for many years." And a little after,--- "Being encouraged by their success, "others subdivided their parties; some took their way to Græ- "cia, some to Macedonia, destroying all before them with fire "and sword. And so great a terror did the name of Gauls "spread round about them, that several kings, not in the "least threatened by them, came, of their own accord, and "purchased their peace with large sums of money." ---And in the very next book he adds, that "So great was the fruit- "fulness of the Gauls at that time, that they filled all Asia "with their swarms; insomuch, that none of the eastern mo- "narchs either ventured to make war without a mercenary "army of them, or, if driven out of their kingdom, fled "to any other but to them, for refuge."

WE shall have the less room either to doubt of, or to wonder at, what we read of in antient authors concerning the singular valour, and love of liberty, of the Gaulish nation, if we consider, that it was as remarkable in their women as in their men; so that both sexes had it, in some measure transfused in their blood; they sucked it at the breast, and learned the first rudiments of it in the very nursery. We have hinted a little higher, what pains these viragoes took to keep up their men men from giving ground to the enemy, and with what intrepid fury they fell, indifferently, upon thoſe who turned their backs upon them, and upon thoſe who purſued them: we ſhall now, according to our promiſe, add ſome few inſtances more of this female bravery from undoubted authority.

[r] Hist. l. xxiv.

In their women's

THE Ambrones, ſays Plutarch [s], (a Gauliſh people, who lived near the foot of the Alps, between Switzerland and Provence) having been defeated by Marius near Aix in Provence, were purſued by the Romans quite to their carriages: there they found the women armed with ſwords and hatchets, who, mingling themſelves with victors and vanquiſhed, did, with one hand, ſtrive to wrench their bucklers from them, and, with the other, to diſpatch them, and never let go their hold but with their lives. This might be imputed to their fury and deſpair; but when they found themſelves loſt beyond recovery, they ſent to demand of the conqueror three things (I); viz. firſt, Their liberty, that is, that they might not be condemned to ſlavery: ſecondly, That their chaſtity might be preſerved inviolate: and, thirdly, That they might be employed in the ſervice of the veſtals. Theſe conditions having been rejected by Marius, they were all found, on the next day, either hanging on trees, or wallowing in their own blood, with their children butchered by them, and by their own hands. We have given, in a former volume [t], another, and even more dreadful inſtance of this female love of liberty, in the Cimbrian women; the circumſtances of which are ſo ſhocking, that we hope we may ſave ourſelves the trouble of repeating them here. The ſame deſperate reſiſtance Julius Cæſar is reported to have met with from the Helvetian women, when, having defeated their husbands, he came to take poſſeſſion of their camp, and their baggage: for both the women,

[s] In vita Marii. Vide & Oroſ. l. vi. c. 16. Flor. l. iii. c. 3. Valer. Max. l. vi. c. 1. ad fin. Hieron. epiſt. ad Geront.
[t] Vol. xiii. p. 497. Vide & auct. ſup. citat.

(I) Florus, in the place above quoted, attributes this embaſſy to the Cimbrian women: theſe were another branch of the Gauliſh nation, of whom we have ſpoken in a former volume (26), and thoſe women were no leſs brave and warlike, as will appear, by their deſperate defence, and cataſtrophe, of which we are going to ſpeak. But he is, moſt likely, miſtaken here, as he is in many other inſtances: the other authors give the glory of it to the Ambronian females.

(26) Vol. xii. p. 429.

women, and their young ſons, defended themſelves to the laſt, chuſing rather to be cut in pieces, than to be carried into ſlavery [u]. The Dalmatian women are likewiſe reported to have ſet fire to their baggage, and to have thrown themſelves, and their children, into it; whilſt others hurried themſelves, and them, into the next river [w]. The ſame we read of thoſe of Iſtria, Illyrium, Spain, and other Gauliſh nations [x], as well as of thoſe of Germany, who retained more of the old Celtic ferocity than any of the reſt: of theſe laſt we ſhall give a remarkable inſtance, as they ſhewed this love of liberty, not in the heat of deſpair, but in cold blood; for a number of theſe being taken priſoners by the Romans, and ſcorning to be reduced to a ſtate of ſlavery, when it was offered to their choice, whether they would be publicly ſold, or be maſſacred, did, unanimouſly, prefer the latter. The emperor, however, not taking them at their word, cauſed them to be expoſed to ſale; upon which, they all ruſhed into a voluntary death, many of them having firſt ſent their children before, in the ſame way [y]. The ſame ſpirit may be ſaid to have run through all the deſcendents of the antient Celtes [z], and extended even to their children. The author laſt quoted mentions a ſtripling, in Spain, who, ſeeing his whole family taken priſoners, and having, by chance, ſtumbled upon a ſword, fulfilled the orders which his father had given him, to free them from their miſery, and put them all to death with it. He mentions, likewiſe, a woman, who ventured to free a number of other priſoners in the ſame way: ſo that we may conclude this article with what Oroſius ſays of the Gauliſh nation, when, ſpeaking of thoſe Iſtrian Gauls who choſe to burn themſelves, rather than capitulate with the beſiegers, he adds, that there was neither man, woman, nor child, that did not prefer death to ſlavery [a].

And children.

Their martial diſcipline.

WHAT their military diſcipline was, is hard to gueſs: by what we have hitherto ſeen, it ſeems to have been very imperfect; and their falling, in ſuch vaſt multitudes, upon the enemy, with more fury than diſcretion, without either taking the advantage of the ground, or dividing their numerous hoſts as occaſion required, but truſting altogether on their numbers, and reinleſs bravery, ſufficiently ſhews them to have been greatly wanting in this reſpect: and this ſeems the true reaſon why they had ſuch ill ſucceſs, whenever they engaged engaged with other nations, eſpecially the Romans. One might, at leaſt, have expected that thoſe continual wars which they waged with theſe laſt, and their being ſo conſtantly hired as auxiliaries, ſometimes by them, and oftener by other warlike people, would have, in time, rendered them the moſt expert nation in the art of war, conſidering their hereditary fierceneſs, intrepid valour, contempt of death, thirſt for glory and conqueſt, and their invincible dread of ſlavery; all which were ſo ſtrongly rooted in them by education (K), and continual exerciſe in martial deeds, as we have ſeen under the laſt article. But whether it were owing to their too tenacious fondneſs for their antient cuſtoms, or to a contempt of thoſe other nations, their hiſtory plainly ſhews, that they never ſtrove to excel in foreign martial diſcipline. Their chief talent ſeems to have conſiſted, principally, in invading, rather than defending, in pouring in their numberleſs troops with

[u] Plutarch. in vit. Cæſar. [w] Dio. Caſſ. in excerpt. Valeſ. l. lvi. & lxxvii. [x] Appian. Illyr. Oroſ. &c. [y] Dio ubi ſupra. [z] Strabo, l. iii. [a] L. v. c. 14.

(K) Beſides what we have lately ſaid of their excellent way of training up, and inuring their youth to the military trade, we muſt remind our readers of an excellent method they learned of their anceſtors, the Celtes, which was, to have their martial laws couched in ſome kind of verſes, or ſongs, ſet to proper tunes, and adorned with all the embelliſhments of rhetoric and poetry. Theſe the youth were obliged to learn by heart, and to ſing upon proper occaſions; ſo that they had learned all the rudiments of military diſcipline long before they were able to bear arms (27); and it is not unlikely that they likewiſe initiated them in the practice before that time.

In theſe ſongs, or poems, were, moreover, recorded, the actions of the great and brave, the victories which they gained over their enemies, the names of thoſe who ſignalized themſelves in them, and the monuments which were erected in memory of them. For as theſe bards and ſongſters never committed any thing to writing, or (if they did, for their own ſakes, and the better remembering the vaſt number of ſuch pieces, which time, and their continual wars, muſt of courſe occaſion, yet) they never let them go out of their keeping, they were wont to rear up monuments, which were nothing but rude heaps of huge ſtones, artfully, and by main ſtrength, laid one over another, without any inſcription: ſo that the people were obliged to have recourſe to thoſe poems for the meaning of theſe monumental heaps, of which the reader will find many inſtances in the authors quoted in the margin (28).

(27) See before, vol. v. p. 409. (28) Rowland Mona antiqua. Stukeley's Stonehenge. Keyſler. antiq. ſeptentr. Borel. antiq. Gauloiſ. Cluver. Ital. & German. antiq. paſſ.

with incredible fury and speed, and spreading terror wherever they came; in surmounting all the difficulties, and enduring all the hardships, that fell in their way, and falling upon their enemies with dreadful shouts, and desperate eagerness, maintaining the combat with an intrepidity almost peculiar to them; and, when all these failed, as it often did whenever they were engaged with troops that were better disciplined, and trained up in all the politic arts, and stratagems of war; their last resource was, to signalize their valour, and love of liberty, by such desperate exits as those we have lately hinted. Much of their success was owing to their horse, and armed chariots, in both which respects they displayed such a wonderful dexterity, as, joined to their bravery, seldom failed of doing considerable execution. When they came to be divided into small kingdoms, and commonwealths, their method was, to divide their armies, in time of action, in the same manner, that the merit and prowess, as well as the faults and misbehaviour, of every nation and tribe, might be better known, and that every man might be thereby spurred to advance the honour of that to which he belonged. But this, though excellently well designed at first, was attended with great inconveniencies, and often threw things into confusion, either for want of a general discipline, or through the jealousy and misunderstanding between their commanders, and especially from the time the Romans undertook the conquest of Gaul, through the treachery of those who had been corrupted by them.

One thing more we must not omit, concerning their military discipline, which is, their extreme superstition, in which they seemed to outdo all other nations: they were very careful in observing the moon, in particular; and avoided, as much as possible, engaging the enemy before it was past the full. An eclipse of it was looked upon as such a bad omen, that no appearing advantage, how great soever, or, indeed, any thing but absolute necessity, that is, nothing but their being attacked, and forced either to defend themselves, or die, could induce them to fight; and then they did engage more like desperadoes, than regular troops. They gave, moreover, particular heed to their druids and aruspices, who, in their auguries, are branded with using some very inhuman ceremonies, of which we have given some hints in speaking of their religion. If the augury promised them success, those diviners used to march before them with songs, and dances, and musical instruments, until the onset began; but if it proved otherwise, they forbore fighting, if possible, till they met met with a more favourable one: and ſuch a ſway had this order of men amongſt them, that they have protracted, or even hindered the fight, even at the very inſtant they were going to engage. But dreadful was their caſe, whenever they were forced to engage after a ſiniſter omen, or threatening augury; for then ſuch panic horror and deſpair reigned through their hoſts, that they rather ſtrove to avoid ſlavery by a ſpeedy death, than by a brave defence to annoy the enemy, and give the lye to their knaviſh aruſpices, and their conjuring tricks.

THEIR weapons and armour, as they were antiently in uſe among the Celtes, we have elſewhere given an account of [b]; but whether through a ſhew of bravery, or a contempt of thoſe which were more peculiar to other nations, we do not find they had any others in their wars with the Romans, but their bows and arrows, the ſword and lance, which laſt was either longer or ſhorter, according to their fancy, and the ſhield; and yet it was with theſe weapons that they performed ſuch aſtoniſhing feats, as made them, a long time, a terror to their enemies. They deſpiſed the helmet, cuiraſs, and other ſuch defenſive armour, and rather choſe to fight half, and ſome quite, naked. They were utter ſtrangers to thoſe machines which other nations uſed in ſieges; they had, indeed, learned the method of undermining, but they rather laid their chief ſtreſs on a briſk and fierce attack, which they began with throwing clouds of ſtones into the place, to clear the walls of their defendants; after which, they ſcaled them, with the utmoſt fierceneſs and rapidity. This fierceneſs did often prove fatal to them, eſpecially when they have chanced to meet with a ſtout repulſe, as they frequently did, from the Romans; for, in all ſuch caſes, they loſt all their courage, and preſence of mind, and ſuffered themſelves to be butchered, without offering to make any defence. Thoſe who choſe rather to ſurrender, did lay down their arms, and preſented their left ſhoulder bare to the enemy, and the women their naked boſoms, in token of ſubmiſſion; after which, they ſcattered ſome of their money, plate, and fine cloaths, amongſt them, to bribe their conquerors. Theſe inſtances, however, of ſubmiſſion, were but ſcarce and rare amongſt them, in compariſon of thoſe in which they preferred death to ſlavery. But we have, by this time, followed them long enough in that bloody tract; let us now take a view of them in

[b] Vol. v. p. 409.

in their pacific excellencies, in their arts and ſciences, trade and navigation, &c.

Their language.

We begin with their language, which being univerſally allowed to have been the old Celtic, or Gomerian, of which we have given a full account in a former volume [c], we ſhall have the leſs to ſay of it here, except it be as far as relates to the changes it underwent after it divided itſelf into as many dialects as the whole nation was into little eſtates. There is ſcarcely any doubt but this old Celtic was the common language ſpoken all over Europe. A modern author has not only given undeniable proofs of it, which, barely to abſtract, would carry us too far, and be thought, perhaps, too dry a ſubject for the greateſt part of our readers; but he has further confirmed what we had formerly advanced as a probable conjecture, that the German language was originally a dialect of the old Celtic [d]. We ſhall have occaſion to mention ſome of his proofs, in the hiſtory of the antient Germans immediately following: in the mean time, ſo far as relates to the Gauls we are now treating of, it is manifeſt, that they all uſed this language, and that it was that ſame which is ſtill preſerved in ſeveral parts of Europe, particularly in Biſcay, Britany, Cornwal, and Wales, but no-where more purely than in North Wales.

What occaſioned this to be called in queſtion, by ſeveral learned men, was, that Julius Cæſar [e], in his diviſion of the Gauls into the Belgæ, Aquitani, and Celtæ, affirms, that they differed not only in their cuſtoms, but language. To which we may add what Strabo [f] and Ammianus Marcellinus [g] ſay of them, that they were not of one language, but differed a little from one another; or, as we take their meaning to be, uſed different dialects of the ſame language: for ſo it will appear plainly, to thoſe who ſhall take the pains to trace thoſe antient dialects to their true origin, as it was brought from the Gauls into our iſle, and is ſtill retained in its priſtine purity, in that part of it called North Wales, and compare it with thoſe alterations which it did, in time, undergo, in thoſe parts of Europe where it is ſtill preſerved, though nothing ſo pure and unmixed, ſuch as are South Wales, Cornwal, Ireland, the iſles of Man and Angleſey, and ſome parts of the highlands of Scotland amongſt us, and in Britany, Biſcay, and ſome other parts of the continent: ſuch a ſcrutiny will eaſily diſcover, not only the true original mother from her ſpurious offspring,

[c] Vol. v. p. 410. [d] Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. l. i. c. 15.
vol. v. ibid. [e] Comment. l. i. c. 1. [f] L. iv. [g] L. xv.

offspring, but the different chanels by which this odd and corrupt mixture conveyed itſelf into the latter. We formerly obſerved, that not only moſt of the modern European languages were manifeſtly dialects, more or leſs diſtant, of this old Celtic or Gomerian, but that even the Greek and Latin, and other antient ones, had ſuch a ſurpriſing affinity with it, as if they had ſplit themſelves from the ſame block, and that very many of them plainly appeared to be of Celtic extract (L).

(L) Of this we have interſperſed ſome inſtances, in a former volume (29); but ſhall, for the ſatisfaction of our Engliſh readers, add a few more, and place them ſo, that they may have ſo much of them at one view, as will clearly make out what we have ſaid; and refer them, for a more copious number, to the authors quoted in the margin (30).

Tir terra	Mur murus	Calav calamus
Mor mare	Marw mori	Arva arma
Engil ignis	Trev tribus	Gayau hyems
Awyr aer	Offrail offertorium	Llyvr liber
Aur aurum	Anival animal	Nyver numerus
Avon amnis	Tirva turma	Geveil gemelli
Ghwydr. vitrum	Terwin terminus	Priv primus
Ffynnon fons

The ſame may be ſaid, alſo, of the heathen gods, whom we have ſhewed, under a former article, to have been of Celtic extract, as well as their names, which are thus etymologized:

Jupiter, Jovis,	Jeuanc, Juvenis princeps, the youngeſt of Saturn's ſons (31)
Tonans,	Taran, thunderer
Mars, Mavors,	Mawr ruyſk, warlike, powerful; whence, probably, Maurice
Neptune,	Nofddyfn, ſwimming on the waves
Mercury,	Merk wr, a merchant; or March wr, a ſwift runner, or meſſenger

Talamon,

(29) Vol. v. p. 422. & ſeq. (30) Pezron. antiq. nat. Celt. ad fin. Mona antiq. paſſ. præfert. p. 43, & ſeq. 252, 308, 315, & ſeq. Hickes's theſ. ling. ſeptentr. Lluyd's lexic. Keyſler. antiq. ſeptentr. in addend. Edward's ſpecim. ling. Celtic. & Hebr.
(31) Vol. v. p. 428, (P).

We may add what Quintilian obſerves of the antient Latin, that till about the middle of the conſular government it was very barbarous and rude in its expreſſions, having in it a multitude of words and idioms of other languages, moſt of them Gauliſh [h]; ſo that if thoſe which have been ſince loſt, or changed, were to be added to thoſe which ſtill remain, the conformity would appear ſtill greater. And if thoſe Gauls which were afterwards conquered by the Romans, had not, partly out of neceſſity (M), partly out of mere complaiſance, adopted [h] L. i. c. 5.

Talamon, al. Atlas,	Telmon, a tall man, ſuch as he is feigned to have been
Hermes,	Armes, diviner; in which art he is ſaid to have excelled all the reſt
Teutat,	Duw taith, the traveller's god; or from teu tat, the father of the people
Hercules,	Erchyl, horrid, dreadful, whether on account of his deeds, or that attitude in which he was repreſented
Vulcan,	Wael gin, or ginta, the inventor of ſteel, or ſteel armour
Apollo,	Ap haul, ap heulin, the ſon of the ſun
Titan,	Ti taan, the houſe of fire
Triton,	Trwydon, a wanderer on the waters
Rhea, Jove's mother,	Rheys, a princeſs, or lady
Juno,	Jevanc, a young princeſs; or from Ghuin, fair
Venus,	Ghuin, white, fair
Diana,	Di anaf, ſpotleſs, chaſte, untouched
Minerva,	Min arfau, the temperer of ſharp tools and weapons

(M) There is another proof of the antientneſs of this old Gomerian, or Celtic, viz. its ſimplicity, and near reſemblance to the Hebrew, and other primitive tongues, of which we have formerly ſpoken (32), and to which we ſhall only add an inſtance, to ſhew by

(32) See before, vol. v. p. 410. (B).

adopted a great number of words and idioms from their conquerors, we might ſtill behold a much greater nearneſs between the Low Briton, Biſcayaneer, Iriſh, &c. and the pure North Welſh. So that the only reaſon why theſe laſt have retained it in ſuch purity, muſt be attributed to their never having been conquered, and thereby keeping themſelves from intermixture with other nations. Thus we find the Iſraelites, during their long abode in Egypt, preſerving their original Hebrew, which they ſuffered to be greatly corrupted, and, amongſt a great part of them, almoſt loſt in a ſeventy years captivity. Now as it is univerſally allowed, that moſt of the Aſiatic tongues, ſuch as the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, &c. borrowed moſt of their radical or primitive words from the Hebrew, ſo this old Celtic, or Gomerian, which was the language of Gomer and his deſcendents, who firſt inhabited Europe, was the mother of moſt of the European languages, at leaſt as far as Scythia and Sarmatia, which were peopled by Gog and Magog, two other branches of Japhet's offspring: and as there is ſuch a vaſt affinity between thoſe two mother-tongues, we mean the Hebrew and Gomerian [i], or antient Celtic, it is not to be wondered, if we find the ſame reſemblance diffuſing itſelf through all their derivatives; ſuch as the High and Low Dutch, the Latin and by what ſteps they came to adopt words of other languages to ſupply the poverty of theirs.

[i] Vide Edward's ſpecimen. Lluyd's grammar. Pezron. antiq. nat. Celt. Hickes's theſaur. Mona antiqua, p. 278, & ſeq.

The antient Celtes, as well as their deſcendents the Gauls, were, as we have had frequent occaſion to ſhew (33), excellent horſemen and charioteers; and yet the North Welſh, among whom the language is preſerved in its antient purity, had not, neither have they to this day, proper names for a bridle, ſaddle, ſtirrup, or ſpur, becauſe they antiently deſpiſed the uſe of them; but are forced to expreſs them by circumlocution: as a leading and a covering leather, for a bridle and ſaddle; a mounting and pricking iron, for a ſtirrup and ſpur. Theſe, and many more ſuch deficiencies there are in that language, which their neighbours the South Welſh, as well as the Britons, &c. have ſupplied by Greek or Latin words: ſuch as that of ffruyn, frænum, for a bridle, &c. which the others would never adopt; though, in other points, they are now grown very remiſs in preſerving that antient tongue: and, if they go on in the ſame neglect much longer, it is much to be feared, will ſuffer it to be entirely loſt.

(33) Ibid.

Greek, the Arabic, Perſian, &c. and, particularly, between the Greek, Roman, and old Celtic, as the authors laſt quoted have ſufficiently ſhewed, as well as accounted for.

The notion of their ſpeaking Greek, exploded.

We have been the more particular on this ſubject, becauſe ſeveral learned men have maintained, that the Gauls commonly uſed the Greek tongue [k]. Nothing can be more wild, or more contrary to all that we meet with in antient authors concerning the Gauliſh language, than ſuch an aſſumption, which may be eaſily overthrown, by one or two expreſs paſſages we meet with in Julius Cæſar. The one is, that in a conference which he had with Divitiacus, an Æduan or Gauliſh lord, he was obliged to make uſe of an interpreter; and yet Cæſar was a perfect maſter of the Greek [l]. The other, which is ſtill more expreſs, is, that when that conqueror found himſelf under a neceſſity to write to Quintus Cicero, who was then beſieged in his camp, he made uſe of the Greek tongue, leſt his letter ſhould fall into the hands of ſome of the Gauls, and diſcover his deſigns to them [m]; a precaution which would have been quite ridiculous, if that had been the common language of that nation. Strabo doth indeed tell us, that the Maſſilians cultivated all ſorts of polite literature, and, particularly, that of the Greek, to ſuch a degree, that the reſt of the Gauls were, by their example, become great admirers of that tongue, inſomuch that they began to write their contracts and bargains in it [n]. But then it is plain, firſt, that he only ſpeaks of thoſe Gauls who were neighbours to Marſeilles, many of whom, not only private men, but whole cities, invited ſeveral learned men out of that famed city to inſtruct their youth, or ſent their children to be educated there: ſecondly, If the reſt of the Gauls did afterwards follow their example, it is plain they had originally another language of their own: and, thirdly, That this faſhion of learning and uſing the Greek tongue did not begin till Strabo's time. Accordingly, St. Jerom tells us, upon the authority of a paſſage which he has preſerved out of Varro, that the Maſſilians ſpoke three ſorts of languages, the Greek, Latin, and Gauliſh [o]. Hence we may conclude, that the Greek tongue was only introduced among the learned, but was not the original language of the Gauls. We might further confirm this from a number of antient monuments, and [k] Vide Hottoman. Franco-gallia, cap. ii. [l] Comment. l. i. c. 19. [m] L. v. c. 12. [n] L. iv. [o] Hieron. opera, tom. ix. p. 135. Vide Hottoman. ubi ſupra, & Pelloutier. ii. c. 10.

and eſpecially from the antient names of provinces, cantons, rivers, cities, mountains, &c. but we think the caſe ſufficiently plain, without any ſuch further proofs. The Greek characters, indeed, were in uſe among them in Cæſar's time, as we ſhall hint under the next head; but as for their tongue, it plainly appears to have been brought into uſe much later ſtill, and that only among the learned and polite (N). As to the preſent language of that country, thoſe who are ever ſo little skilled in antient ones, may eaſily perceive it to be a medly of other tongues, the greater half of which is taken from the Latin, as the Romans were very induſtrious to propagate it, and cultivate it, in all their conquered dominions (O). The reſt is plainly a mixture of the old Celtic, of the Frank or German, as this did afterwards greatly deviate from

(N) There is, indeed, one paſſage in Cæſar's commentaries, from which ſome authors pretend to prove the contrary. It is that where he affirms, that in all other public and private concerns, Græcis utuntur literis (34); which, compared with the explication which Strabo, who wrote after him, gives of it (35), ſeems to imply, that they made uſe not of their characters, but of their language. But to this it is anſwered, by two learned critics (36), that the word Græcis has been foiſted into Cæſar's text. And, indeed, it plainly appears, that Cæſar meant no more in this place, than that the druids did not ſuffer any of their doctrines or principles to be committed to writing, though, in other matters, they allowed them to write letters, accounts, and the like; which they did, accordingly, in the Greek character, as we ſhall prove by-and-by.

But whether the phraſe, "uti literis," properly ſignifies to uſe the letters, or character, as it often doth among Latin authors; or, as others would have it, to uſe the language, as it may ſometimes do, though in a kind of figurative ſenſe; yet, in this place, if the word Græcis be really part of the text, it can only be meant of the character; elſe it would be abſurd in our hiſtorian, after he had ſaid, a little higher, that the Gauls were unskilled in the Greek, to ſay, that all their public and private accounts, tranſactions, &c. were written in that tongue.

(O) This plainly appears, from what Valerius Maximus, Tacitus, and Auſonius, tell us, of their ſetting up ſchools at Autun, Lyons, Beſançon, and other places of that kingdom, as faſt as they conquered them. And we need not doubt, but, according to their wonted lordlineſs over all their vaſſals, they uſed all proper means to encourage and oblige them to learn it.

(34) L. vi. c. 14. (35) L. iv. (36) Joſ. Scalig. epiſt. l. i. epiſt. 16. Hottoman. Franco-gall. c. 2.

its original; and the reſt ſeems to be of Greek extraction. For it has been obſerved, by judicious men of that nation, that many Greek words have been adopted by them into common uſe, which were not borrowed from the academies of the druids, who, for aught that appears, knew little of it, but from the ſchools of the Maſſilians we have lately ſpoken of.

The genius of their ſtile and language.

BEFORE we diſmiſs this article of the Gauliſh language, it will not be amiſs to make a ſhort remark on its pretended rudeneſs and harſhneſs, againſt which both Greek and Roman authors have raiſed ſuch an unanimous outcry. According to them, it was enough to hear a Celte or Gaul ſpeak, to make one judge of their natural ferocity; and the greateſt part of their words, eſpecially of their proper names of men, women, towns, rivers, &c. were ſo very harſh, that they could not be pronounced by ſtrangers, or written in other languages, without great difficulty; neither could they be inſerted in a poem, without murdering the verſe [p]. A foreigner could hardly hear them ſpoke without having his ears grated, or almoſt flayed with it [q]. The emperor Julian ſays, that it reſembled the croaking of a raven, or the growling of ſome wild beaſt [r]. There muſt needs be allowed to be ſome exaggeration in theſe expreſſions, conſidering how uncouth and barbarous any language appears, to thoſe who are unaccuſtomed to, or ignorant of it. It is not to be queſtioned, but even the French and Italian, emaſculated as they have been of late, do appear ſo at firſt hearing: it muſt, however, be confeſſed, that, with reſpect to the German, there is leſs of the hyperbole; and perhaps the antient Gauliſh might originally have a great deal of that kind of harſhneſs, which guttural and ſome other hard conſonants, as well as too great a colluvies of them, will naturally cauſe, unleſs ſoftened by the interpoſition of vowels. We do not, therefore, pretend wholly to diſculpate the latter, but would only obſerve, that there is a vaſt difference between thoſe two languages in this reſpect; and that the true Celtic, or North Welſh, though ſeemingly crouded with a number of conſonants, has yet a peculiar ſweetneſs, and is much more adapted for muſic and poetry, than we are apt generally to imagine: and, for proof of this, we ſhall refer our readers to what has been ſaid in a former volume [s]. And here it will not be amiſs to remind them, that their cuſtom of couching and preſerving all all their laws, records, hiſtory, &c. in verſe, inured them to a ſtyle more ſwoln, figurative, and emphatic, than that of other nations (P); on the other hand, their fierce and warlike diſpoſition might, in all probability, make them fonder both of that, and of their ſonorous and maſculine language, than of the ſmoother Greek and Roman proſe. To which we may add, that their natural averſion for the Roman nation might not contribute a little to this oppoſition, eſpecially as they had reaſon to conſider all their ſweetneſs of language, ſtyle, and behaviour, as ſo many ſnares to entrap people out of their liberty. If we may believe Diodorus Siculus [t], their ſtile was not only ſwollen, conciſe, and Laconic, but intricate and obſcure, full of ſynecdoches and hyperboles; which the reader will find, perhaps, better accounted for by what we ſhall ſay, in the ſequel, concerning their manners and cuſtoms; in which, as well as their loftineſs and pompouſneſs of ſtyle and language, they ſeem to have been more cloſely imitated by the Spaniards, than any other European nation.

[p] Plin. jun. l. viii. epiſt. 4. [q] Diod. Sicul. l. v. Ovid. de triſtib. eleg. xii. ver. 55. [r] Miſopog. [s] Vol v. p. 410. (B)

Their writings and chacters.

THE Gauls had originally no characters of their own, but adopted, in proceſs of time, the Greek ones; yet, as we have already hinted, they did not do it till very late, and till their commerce with other nations obliged them to it; their contempt of foreign learning was a great obſtacle to it, and their druids or bards, whoſe intereſt it was to keep their own from the people, did all they could to improve this their prejudice againſt committing any thing of moment to writing, under pretence that it rather tended to deſtroy, than preſerve the memory of them, as it was likely to be a kind of diſcouragement to learn them by heart out of their poetical compoſitions; whereas this laſt, they pretended, was the moſt effectual means of preſerving them, both from oblivion, and from falling into the hands of ſtrangers [u]: ſo that it was looked upon as a diſhonour for any of them to learn to read or write (Q). And even after they begun

[t] L. v. [u] Comment. l. vi. c. 14.

(P) Hence the German poetry, which preſerves ſtill its antient roughneſs, is judiciouſly enough compared to thoſe cataracts of the Nile, whoſe ſounding falls are rather apt to inſpire one with dread, than to afford pleaſure to the hearers; and their ſwoln ſtyle to that of men that are ever mounted upon ſtilts.

(Q) Elian has preſerved us a paſſage out of Andretion, to this purpoſe (37), that the antient Thracians, and, in general, all the barbarian began to introduce the uſe of letters, in their contracts, bargains, and the like civil concerns, the druids never ſuffered them to commit any thing relating to their hiſtory, laws, and much leſs of their religion, to writing [w]. Hence Origen might well tell his antagoniſt [x], that he never heard of any of their writings; and hence that ſcarcity of materials we meet with, with relation to their hiſtory, ſince they committed all their learning, laws, religion, and tranſactions, to thoſe ſongs and verſes which they carefully kept from ſtrangers; and periſhed, in all likelihood, with their liberty, or, at leaſt, with their old heatheniſh religion, upon their embracing chriſtianity (R). It were to be wiſhed, that the chriſtian prieſts and monks had not imitated, ſo cloſely, this druidiſh policy, of confining all learning to their own order and monaſteries; eſpecially in Gaul and barbarian nations, ſettled in Europe, were not only quite ignorant of letters, but had a ſingular contempt for them, though they were commonly uſed by thoſe that ſettled themſelves in Aſia. The ſame is affirmed of the Huns, by Procopius (38); and this humour ſeems to have been ſo deeply rooted among them, that even Theodoric, king of Italy, could never be prevailed on to learn to write his own name, though he had ſpent a conſiderable part of his younger days among the Romans; but it is reported, whenever he was obliged to ſign an edict, to have only made uſe of a golden plate, that had the four initial letters of it, Teod, engraven upon it, and which he traced with his pen (39).

(37) Var. hiſt. l. viii. c. 6.

[w] Idem ibid. Strab. l. iv. [x] Con. Celſ. l. i.

(R) It is probable, indeed, that upon their converſion to the goſpel they might, by degrees, be ſo far ſhamed out of their ſuperſtitious fondneſs for conceealing their laws, hiſtory, &c. that they might ſuffer them to be committed to writing from thenceforward, but as for thoſe hymns, and poetic compoſitions, which we are ſpeaking of, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that they were ever preſerved, ſeeing both parties, that is, both the new converts, and thoſe who remained in their antient idolatry, were equally concerned to ſuppreſs them; the latter out of their natural zeal to conceal them, and the former on account of thoſe praiſes that were ſung in them, to their falſe deities, heroes, &c. and of thoſe abominable and inhuman rites that were performed in the worſhip of them. Jornandes tells us, indeed, that thoſe which were in uſe among the Goths, were ſtill extant in his time. If they were, it is plain they have ſince periſhed, and, moſt probably, for the very reaſon juſt now aſſigned.

(38) Goth. l. iv. c. 18. (39) Excerpt, auct. incog. ap. Valeſium, ad calc. Ammian. Marcel.

and Germany: for they ſeem to have ſo well cultivated this prejudice againſt it, amongſt the laity, that they were forced to have recourſe to them whenever any will, grant, or public act, was to be made; and then both the perſons concerned in it, and the witneſſes, ſet their own marks, and the ſcrivener their name to it. But, with reſpect to the mercantile part, among whom there was a kind of abſolute kind of neceſſity to make uſe of writing, the Greek character ſeems to have been that which was in uſe amongſt them, according to Cæſar, Strabo, Pliny, and others, above quoted (S): and was brought among them from Marſeilles, which was a colony of the Greeks, or Gallogreeks. How their conqueſt, and intercourſe among the Romans, did afterwards introduce their character amongſt them, is obvious to every one, and we need not dwell any longer upon it.

The probable origin of their poetry.

As to their poetry, it is altogether loſt, we can ſay little of it; yet it will not be amiſs to mention an ingenious conjecture of a modern hiſtorian [y], who thinks that the want of learning and characters, or, as he expreſſes it, the reigning ignorance, and contempt of letters, gave birth to thoſe poetical compoſitions, at leaſt in Europe. This was, indeed, the moſt effectual method to preſerve the memory of ſuch momentous [y] Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. l. ii. c. 10.

(S) We have obſerved, a little higher, that this paſſage is controverted by ſome learned men (40) who think that the word Græcis is interpolated in the place there quoted: however, as they do not ſubſtitute any other character to it, and ſome other paſſages ſeem expreſs, ſuch as the muſter-rolls, and ſome other public writings which were found amongſt them, we make no doubt but the Greek were the firſt and chief letters in uſe amongſt them.

This carries ſuch an evidence with it, that the author of the religion of the Gauls, who makes theſe to have come originally out of Phœnice, and to have brought their own character from Aſia into Europe; doth yet allow it undeniable, that they likewiſe uſed the Greek amongſt them: and to the authorities above quoted adds ſome others, taken from antient medals, and, particularly, an antique inſcription, whoſe legends are in the Gauliſh tongue, and Greek characters (41). So that if theſe be really as old, and as authentic, as he, and the authors from whom he has taken them, do ſuppoſe (42), there is not the leaſt room to doubt of thoſe letters having been in common uſe among the Gauls.

(40) Sup. not. (N). (41) Relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 4. p. 39, & ſeq. (42) Bouteroue, p. 43, 62, & ſeq. 191. Roma ſubterran. Mobillon. ap. eund. ibid.

mentous truths and facts as they either could not, or cared not to commit to writing, and which, by this means, were not only eaſily learned, and remembered, but, likewiſe, concealed from other nations (T). And ſuch fondneſs did both Gauls and Germans conceive for theſe kind of performances, eſpecially as they were ſet to proper tunes, that they ſeemed to reliſh nothing elſe, and ſhewed a natural contempt for thoſe of the proſaic ſort. And this humour did ſtill prevail ſo ſtrongly, even ſo low as the ninth century, that when Lewis the Debonnaire undertook to have the Saxons inſtructed in the holy ſcriptures, he was obliged to employ one of their poets to put them into Saxon verſe [z]. The ſame was done by Ottofridus, with reſpect to the four goſpels, which he cauſed to be tranſlated into German, and put into verſe: for as they could neither read, nor care to learn, they conſented to learn them by heart, provided they were put into verſe, and ſet to muſic for them, and they permitted to ſing them on proper occaſions. Some ſuch compoſitions Charles the Great is ſaid to have found amongſt them, which were very antient and rude, and contained the wars and exploits of their antient kings, and which he cauſed, likewiſe, to be tranſcribed, for the ſame end [a]. We have already hinted, more than once, what were the chief ſubjects of thoſe antient poetic compoſitions; as to their metre, and [z] Vide Du Chene rer. Francar. tom. ii. ap. Pelloutier, ubi ſupra. [a] Eginhard in vit. Carol. magn. c. 29.

(T) This remark, however, is far from being deſigned to derogate from that purer and nobler origin, which pious chriſtians have given to this excellent art, viz. the love of the Supreme Being, and the contemplation of his attributes and works. But, however true this laſt may be, with relation to the people of God, who ſo early, and ſo much, excelled all other nations in it, as we have fully ſhewn in a former volume (43), it can never be imagined to have been the caſe of the fierce Gauls and Germans, whoſe religion and genius was quite oppoſite to ſuch a ſuppoſition. As for thoſe who make Bacchus and Venus the parents of poetry, if they will but add Mars to it, they may be well enough allowed to have gueſſed righter, with reſpect to the nations we are here ſpeaking of; and though their compoſitions have not reached our times, we find reaſon enough to gueſs, from their temper and diſpoſitions, their banquets and drunken revels, of which we ſhall ſpeak in its proper place, that great part of thoſe ſongs and poetic compoſitions owed their riſe to them.

(43) Vide ſup. vol. iii. p. 421, & ſeq.

and other particulars relating to them, we are wholly in the dark, unleſs we gueſs at them by ſome of a more modern date; ſuch as thoſe which the author of Mona Antiqua has given us [b] out of Talieſin, who was poet laureat to Maelgwyn, about the time of Auſtin the monk's coming into England. But neither from theſe, nor from the character which antient authors have given us of the old Gauliſh language, can we conclude them to have been either ſmooth or elegant, except with reſpect to the loftineſs of their expreſſions and figures: yet would it not be fair to conclude, that they were all of the ſame kind; and we ſhould have framed but a very wrong idea of the Greek poetry, if we had had no other poems to judge by than thoſe of a Pindar, Lycophron, and ſome others of their bards.

Arts and ſciences.

WE need not here repeat what we obſerved, in the laſt ſection, concerning their ſkill in aſtronomy and geometry, from which we may juſtly infer, that if they were maſters of thoſe two ſciences, they muſt, of courſe, have cultivated many others, eſpecially ſuch as are depending on, or leading to them; but to what a number, or degree, cannot be eaſily determined, any more than what new ones thoſe were which they afterwards learned from the Maſſilian ſages. As for arts, next to the military, which, though their great favourite, was but indifferently cultivated among them, as we have ſhewed above, eloquence was that wherein they prided themſelves moſt, and which, indeed, was moſt natural to them. They received, from their infancy, moſt of their inſtructions from thoſe poems which were compoſed by the bards and druids; they heard them, upon all public occaſions, either read, or ſung; and as the greateſt part of them were of the heroic kind, ſo it inured them to a pompous and high-flown ſtyle. We have ſeen, that they repreſented Mercury, the god of eloquence, with the ſymbols of Hercules, to ſhew what vaſt power that art had over them, above all others. Theſe emblems they ſeem to have taken from the Romans (V); and though they were ſo far from imitating them

[b] P. 150.

(V) It is known, that the Romans, in all places of their public exerciſes, placed Mercury and Hercules in full view. The Greeks uſually ſet a Cupid between them, to ſhew, that love hath its origin from the other two, i. e. from ſtrength and eloquence (44); and we read, that the Megapolitans had but one temple for thoſe

(44) Euſtat. in Odyſſ. θ.

them in their long-winded periods, flow and pompoſity of words and figures, but affected, in the main, a conciſe and nervous ſtyle, yet they could not forbear being taken with ſuch artful declamations and pieces of oratory. This is, at leaſt, what Cerealis, a Roman general, upbraided them with in Veſpaſian's time [c]; and Cato the cenſor tells us, that the Gauls made this eloquence, and exerciſe of arms, their chief ſtudy. And, indeed, nothing could be more natural, or neceſſary, in ſuch a country as this, where every little kingdom and commonwealth had its particular council, before which all matters relating to peace and war, and every matter, both public and private, was debated by the parties concerned, beſides the grand council of the whole nation, where the rights, privileges, pretenſions, and other concerns of every private ſtate, were to be debated, and finally determined, as we have ſeen above. But, after all, we would not venture to affirm, that this art was equally cultivated all over Gaul; it is more likely, that theſe countries, which remained ſtill unconquered by the Romans, retained ſtill ſomething of their natural ferocity, and contempt for ſuch arts and ſciences as were moſt admired among foreign nations: and we may very well ſuppoſe, that the druids, wherever they ſtill bore any ſway, did all they could to cheriſh this antipathy. And it is, perhaps, in order to leſſen this averſion, as well as to inſpire thoſe that were ſubdued, with a greater love of this art, that ſeveral emperors thought fit to found academies in ſeveral parts of Gaul, with conſiderable rewards and honours to thoſe who gained the prize of it. We are told, that that of Autun had, in Tiberius's time, 40000 ſtudents [d]: we read, beſides, that other public ſchools were erected at Lyons, Bourdeaux, Toulouſe, Narbonne, and other places, beſides that ſo famed one of Marſeilles, of which we have already ſpoken [e]. Hence we need not wonder, that this country has been ſince ſo celebrated for the great number of its rhetoricians and orators [f]; and if it has thoſe two deities (45), or even repreſented them under one and the ſame emblem (46).

[c] Tacit. hiſt. l. iv. c. 73. [d] Idem, ann. l. iii. c. 43. [e] Sueton. in Calig. c. 20. Juven. ſatir. l. i. c. 6. & Auſon. profeſſor. [f] Hieron. adv. Vigilant. & epiſt. ad Ruſtic. Juvenal. ſat. xv. ver. 3.

(45) Pauſan. in Arcad. (46) Ariſtid. orat. in Hercul.

has not been equally famous for their excellency in this kind, as for the number of them, it is becauſe it has happened here, as it doth every-where, and in moſt other ſtudies, many labour hard at them, but few are qualified for them [g].

Commerce. WE have already taken notice, from the great regard they paid to the god Mercury, as he was the god of traffick, that they drove as great a commerce as any other nation. This is, moreover, proved from a great number of antient inſcriptions, and, particularly, a famous one ſet up by the Paris merchants, and dedicated to Jupiter the good. The reader will ſee it in the margin (W) together with a hint or two of ſome curious conjectures, which a modern author has drawn from [g] Pelloutier. hiſt. des Celt. l. ii. c. 10, ad fin.

(W) The inſcription runs thus: TIB. CAESARE AVG. IOVI OPTVM. MAXVM M. NAVTAE PARISIACI POSVERVNT. From the diſpoſition of ſome of the letters, which, for want of room at the end of the line, are put juſt under it, inſtead of beginning the next, our author ſuppoſes the Gauls to have had the antient way, which is aſcribed alſo to the Greeks, of writing βυσροφηδὸν, that is, as the oxen ploughed, backwards and forwards (47). He endeavours to confirm his notion by ſome antient coins, whoſe legend runs, in ſome, from the right to the left; and, in others, from the left to the right: we do not, however, mention it here, as if we were ſatisfied, that he has fully proved it from either, but only to excite our curious antiquaries to a fuller enquiry into it from ſuch old coins and monuments as may fall into their way.

Our author further pretends, that the Celtes, or antient Gauls, brought the Greek letters with them from Phenice (48), contrary to the general conſent of antient authors, who affirm, that they borrowed them from the Greeks. As his arguments for it ſeem very far from concluſive to us, we have followed the current opinion, until ſomething more evident ſtrikes out from thoſe hints he has given us; which is far from being impoſſible, conſidering the difficulty there is to imagine how it was poſſible for the druids to retain in their heads ſuch a vaſt variety of the moſt copious and important ſubjects, by dint of memory, and without having ſome kind of books, or writings, to refreſh it, or to have recourſe to, when that failed; and how eaſily might they conceal ſuch a help, if any ſuch they had, as they did ſo many other things, from the reſt of the world?

(47) Pauſan. l. v. Vide Relig. des Gaul. l. iii. c. 14.
(48) Ibid. l. i. c. 4.

from it, which would be too long for us to dwell upon. The whole country ſeems to have been divided into three eſtates, viz. the druids, with their underlings, the bards, &c. the nobles, and the mercantile part, which was, by far, the greateſt. The two former had their revenue partly from the latter, and partly from their own lands, and the ſpoils of war; and were ſo opulent, that riches ſeemed to flow upon them on all ſides, ſo that their chief buſineſs, eſpecially in time of peace, was to encourage arts and ſciences, as the beſt means to preſerve, if not to encreaſe, their opulence. What ſeems moſt ſurpriſing, if what an antient author tells us may be depended upon, is, that ſome of the Gauliſh nations interdicted the uſe of gold and ſilver, which was to be all dedicated to Mars, and ſo become ſacred and inviolable; and allowed of no coin, but that which was made of copper and braſs [h]. The paſſage is too curious to be wholly omitted, eſpecially as it will convince the reader, that the war which the Gauls waged againſt the temples of other nations, was not owing to their greedineſs after thoſe treaſures that were ſtored up in them, but from the averſion they had, in common with the Perſees, ſpoken of in a former volume, againſt all ſuch buildings, they being looked upon by both as derogatory to the Supreme Being, which cannot be confined within walls, but fills, with his preſence, both heaven and earth. We ſhall give the ſubſtance of this paſſage in the next note (X). But it is too likely, that this contempt of theſe two ſuperior

[h] Athenæus, l. vi. c. 5.

(X) "Among the Gauls," ſays that author (49), "the Cordiſti" (he means the Scordiſci, of whom we have ſpoken in a former volume (50), as is plain, by the ſequel) "do not ſuffer "to this day, any gold to be brought into their country, though "they make no ſcruple to ravage other nations. They are a "remnant of thoſe who went to beſiege the temple of Delphos, "under the conduct of Brennus. Bathanatius cauſed them to be "ſtopped on the banks of the Danube, and forced them to ſettle "in that neighbourhood; and, from his name, they have called "that voyage Bathanatia, and his deſcendents Bathanates. The "Scordiſci conſecrate all their gold, and ſuffer none to uſe it in "their country: but they would do much better to proſcribe "their ſacrileges, inſtead of that metal; for it can be no credit "to

(49) Athen. l. vi. c. 5

(50) See vol. xii p. 428.

ſuperior metals did vaniſh away, upon their becoming more acquainted with other nations, eſpecially upon their becoming ſubject to that of the Romans; who, as we obſerved before, made no ſcruple to rifle thoſe treaſures [i], which, before that time, lay expoſed to the wide world untouched, and, perhaps, to corrupt them into ſlavery with it, as Herodian reports them, and eſpecially Severus, to have done by the German nation.

THE Gauls, as well as all the other northern people, made hunting a conſiderable diverſion; and, indeed, conſidering the vaſt foreſts which the country abounded with, and which bred vaſt multitudes of wild beaſts, ſuch as bears, wolves, wild boars, foxes, &c. (Y), if they had not made it their buſineſs Hunting, and other exerciſes.

[i] Sueton. in Cæſar.

" to forbid the uſe of it, whilſt they commit ſo many unjuſt rob-
" beries to procure iron and copper; for if they chance to be in " want of theſe, they take up arms, and lay them not down till
" they have got a ſufficient ſupply."

Thus far Athenæus. And though he only mentions one nation of the Gauls, yet, if we remember what hath been ſaid of their leaving their treaſures of gold and ſilver, when conſecrated to Mars, expoſed in the open fields, eſpecially thoſe vaſt ones which were thrown into the lake of Tholouſe, and which conſiſted in ingots, and rich utenſils of thoſe metals; and that, according to Poſidonius and Strabo, thoſe treaſures remained ſacred and untouched: and if we add, to all this, what another author ſays, that the Gauls never ſhut to their doors (51); we may ſafely conclude, that all the reſt of the Gauls ſuffered no other uſe to be made of thoſe metals, but to dedicate them to their deities, at leaſt till ſuch a time as the Romans, coming to plunder theſe aſyla, as Cepio did that of Tholouſe (52), uſed thoſe metals againſt them, leſſened their veneration for the one, and made them ſet a greater value upon the other.

(Y) Cæſar (53), Pliny, and other authors (54), mention ſeveral other wild beaſts which uſed to be hunted by the Gauls, of which we know nothing now but the names; and ſome of them, by the deſcription there given us, ſeem to have been of a very ſtrange kind, if there ever were any ſuch in being: ſuch are the alces, the bonaſſus, the wild aſs, &c. The alces, according to Cæſar,

(51) Strab. l. iv. N. Damaſc. in excerpt. ex Valeſ. (52) See before, vol. xii. p. 475. (53) Comm. l. vi. (54) N. H. l. viii. Pauſan. in Bœot.

buſineſs to hunt and deſtroy them, they muſt, in time, have been over-run with them. But, beſides theſe, they hunted the elk, the deer, hare, and other harmleſs animals: they made, likewiſe, fowling a diverſion, and were, it ſeems, ſo dextrous at it, that they killed them flying, with a dart [k] thrown by hand; though they are likewiſe ſaid to have uſed the ſling, and the bow and arrow. We have, in a former ſection, taken notice of a way they had of poiſoning thoſe darts and arrows which they uſed in hunting, with the juice of a plant which they called, in their language, lineum, or limeum [k] Strabo, l. iv.

Cæſar, had no joints in his legs, and was forced to ſleep leaning againſt a tree. The ſame animal is mentioned by Pliny and Solinus, without that particularity. The bonaſſus, according to ſome authors (55), had a horſe's face, and the reſt reſembled a bull, its horns bending ſo far back, that there was no riding upon it.

Much the ſame wonders they relate of ſome of their birds, one ſort of which caſt ſuch a bright light from their feathers (56), that travellers made uſe of them to ſee their way in the darkeſt nights: but enough of theſe fictitious animals.

The real ones, not mentioned above, were, the wild bull, called urus, and which, Cæſar ſays (57), was a little leſs than the elephant, though it was not much bigger than a common bull; the elk, which was generally caught in traps, and, being tamed, could be taught to draw a chariot, or ſledge (58); the wild goat, of which there were then great quantities, and divers kinds; beſides badgers, otters, and other ſuch not worth mentioning.

For all theſe kind of creatures they had a breed of proper hounds, which they trained up to the ſport, and generally hunted on horſeback, unleſs it be ſome of thoſe creatures which chiefly lived among the rocks, and which they were forced to hunt on foot (59). So fond were they of their hounds, that the antient Burgundian laws obliged a man, publickly convicted of ſtealing one of them, to pay five ſhillings, one half to the owner, and the other to the public treaſury; and, if inſolvent, he was obliged to kiſs the dog's poſteriors (60).

(55) Ariſtot. hiſt. animal. l. ix. c. 45. Plin. ubi ſupra. (56) Solin. polyhiſt. c. 32. Vide & Strab. l. iv. (57) L. vi. c. 28. (58) Martial. epigr. l. i. Paul. Diacon. hiſt. Longobard. (59) Arrian. de venat. & al. (60) Vide Pelloutier. ubi. ſupra, l. ii. c. 12.

limeum [l], which ſome have taken for ellebore [m], ſome the nightſhade. Strabo ſays, it was a kind of wild fig-tree, whoſe fruit, he had ſomewhere read, reſembled the Corinthian chapiter. The wound failed not, it ſeems, to kill the creature, and make its fleſh more ſweet and tender; but they took care to cut off that piece, and throw it away. The profeſſed huntſmen held a feaſt every year to Diana, and, among other offerings, each of them preſented her with a purſe, in which was a certain ſum for every beaſt they had taken during that year; ſuch as a farthing for every hare, a drachm for every fox, and ſo proportionally for the reſt. Their devotions being ended, they adjourned to a ſumptuous entertainment, and concluded the day with it [n]. Other exerciſes, of the manly kind, they were, likewiſe, very fond of. We have often obſerved, what excellent horſemen and charioteers they are ſaid to have been, above all other nations in Europe, which ſkill could not be attained but by dint of practice. Accordingly, we find, they had their hippodromes, horſe and chariot races, tilts and tournaments; at all which the bards aſſiſted, and, with their poems, ſongs, and muſical inſtruments, in which they celebrated the praiſes of thoſe who had formerly won the prize, inſpired the new candidates with a noble ardor to ſignalize themſelves upon all ſuch occaſions. And happy were they looked upon, who could obtain a place in thoſe records of fame. All their exerciſes in general tended to render them lighter, ſtronger, hardier, and long-winded; and we are told, that the youth were obliged to keep their belly within the compaſs of a girdle of a certain ſize, either by faſting, running, riding, ſwimming, or any other laborious diverſion: for if they grew fat enough to exceed the bounds of it, it was not only a diſgrace to them, but they were, likewiſe, fined for it [o]. Swimming was alſo an excellent expedient, not only to harden their bodies, but to fit them for paſſing the wideſt and rapideſt rivers; in which they were ſo very expert, and famed, that they could croſs the Rhine, Danube, and Rhoſne, without breaking their ranks [p].

THESE may be looked upon as ſome of their laudable and beneficial diverſions; but they had a moſt predominant one, Feaſtings.

[l] Aul. Gel. noct. Att. l. xvii. c. 15. Plin. ubi ſupra, l. xxv. c. 5. Geogr. l. iv. [m] Arrian. de venat. [n] Ephor. ap, Strab. l. iv. Damaſcen. ap. Stob. ſerm. xxxvii. [o] Cæſar ubi ſupra. Mela de ſit. orb. l. iii. Amm. Marcel. l. xxv. & al. [p] Tacit. Germ. c. 14, & ſeq.

which can ſcarcely be ranked in that claſs, and yet ſeemed generally to accompany all the other public ones, or, rather, the others ſerved only to introduce this; we mean their feaſtings, in which they were generally very profuſe, though very negligent in the order and decorum of them [q]. All their public aſſemblies and exerciſes, all their feaſts, birthdays, weddings, burials, and anniverſaries of them, were always accompanied with ſuch ſumptuous banquets, in which they intermixed with their good chear both vocal and inſtrumental muſic. The nobles, eſpecially, were moſt fond of them, becauſe their greatneſs and intereſt conſiſting chiefly in the number of their clients, vaſſals, and ſolduri, there was not a more effectual way, either to ſecure the old, or procure new ones, than ſuch kind of entertainments: for the Gauls, as well as the Germans, and other northern nations, were ſuch exceſſive lovers of good eating and drinking, that nothing won their hearts more than theſe kind of feaſts: and to what height theſe were carried, may be ſeen by ſome few inſtances we ſhall give in the margin (Z). At theſe feaſts, thoſe who were moſt famed for valour and wiſdom were always reckoned the chiefeſt gueſts, becauſe their example did bear the greateſt ſway in all ſuch elections. The reader may not be diſpleaſed, perhaps,

[q] Vide Xenoph. exped. Cy. l. vii. Athen. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. ſympoſ. vii. c. 9. Varro, & al.

(Z) We read of the famed Luernius, king of the Auvernians, and father of Bituitus, who was afterwards defeated by Fabius Maximus, that he made an encloſure of twelve furlongs ſquare, in which he entertained all comers, during ſeveral days, with all manner of exquiſite meats and liquors (61); and of one Ariamnes, who cauſed lodges to be erected upon the high roads, each of which could entertain four hundred perſons, and treated them in the ſame ſumptuous manner a whole year (62). Neither ſuffered they any ſtrangers, who happened to be at the place at the times of theſe feaſts, or were travelling that way, to paſs by without being invited, or even compelled to come, and take ſhare of them; and, if their time could not permit them to ſtay, they obliged them to drink a glaſs or two (63).

The following is a remarkable inſtance of their fondneſs for theſe entertainments: The ſame Luernius having given another ſuch feaſt, and invited a famed bard to come and ſing his praiſes, as it was uſual for them to do; the bard coming juſt at the latter end

(61) Tacit. ubi ſupra, c. 21. (62) Poſidon. ap. Athen. l. iv. c. 12. (63) Idem ibid.

perhaps, to ſee a ſhort deſcription of theſe feaſts of the antient Gauls, out of Poſidonius, who had himſelf been in that country: we ſhall give it in the margin (A). It was likewiſe cuſtomary, to drink hard at theſe kinds of feaſts; yet it ſeems, according to the ſame author, that the coryphee, or head-gueſt, always began firſt, and put the cup, or rather pitcher, about to his next neighbour, till it had gone round: for, it ſeems, they all drank out of the ſame veſſel, and no man could drink till it came to his turn, nor refuſe when it did. And hence, in all probability, the cuſtom of drinking to one another, which was, it ſeems, common to the Perſians, Greeks, and Romans [r], as well as to the Scythians, Gauls, and northern people. The misfortune was, that at theſe feaſts they uſed to begin to talk of affairs as ſoon as the cups went round; and as they generally ſat at them till the next end of it, was ſo deeply affected at the diſappointment, that he tried, in vain, to ſing out his deſigned panegyric: he was, at length, conſtrained to change it into deep lamentations, for being forced to take up with the reliques of ſo ſumptuous a banquet (64).

[r] Diod. Sicul. l. v. Vide & Polyb. l. ii.

(A) According to him, their tables were very low; they eat but little bread, which was baked flat and hard, and eaſy to break into pieces; but devoured a great deal of fleſh, boiled, roaſted, and broiled, which they did in a very ſlovenly manner, holding the piece in their hands, and tearing it with their teeth. What they could not part by this way, they cut off with a little knife, which they carried in their girdle. When the company was numerous, the coryphee, or chief of the feaſt, who was either one of the richeſt, or nobleſt, or braveſt, ſat in the middle, with the maſter of the houſe on his ſide: the reſt took their places next, each according to their rank, having their ſervants behind them, holding their ſhields. The guards had their table over-againſt them, and after their maſters had done, the ſervants were, likewiſe, regaled. He adds, that no one was allowed to eat of a diſh, till the coryphee had taſted of it (65).

Diodorus Siculus ſays, that the Gauls uſed to eat ſitting upon the ground, which was covered with skins of wolves and dogs; and the diſhes were brought by the children of the family, or by other boys and girls. He adds, that near every table there was a ſtove, or fire-place, which abounded with ſpits, pots, pans, and other ſuch kitchen-furniture (66).

(64) Idem ibid. Appian. in Celt. (65) Athen. l. iv. c. 13.
(66) L. v.

morning, they ſo heated themſelves with liquor, and wranglings, that they ſeldom ended without duels, the Gauls, ſays our author, ſetting ſo little value upon their lives. If the feaſt proved a peaceable one, it was generally accompanied not only with muſic and ſongs, as we obſerved above, but with dances, likewiſe, in which the dancers were armed cap-à-pé, and beat the meaſure with their ſwords, upon their ſhields. On certain feſtivals, likewiſe, ſuch as that of Mithras, they uſed to dreſs themſelves in the ſkins of ſuch beaſts as were dedicated to him, and accompany the proceſſions that were made on that day: others dreſſed themſelves in maſquerade habits, ſome of them very indecent, and played ſeveral antic and immodeſt tricks; and this cuſtom was retained ſo long among them, even ſince their converſion to chriſtianity, that ſome of their councils and biſhops not only cenſured and condemned them, but appointed faſts, and proper prayers, to be uſed on thoſe days [s], to divert them from that heatheniſh cuſtom.

Contempt of agriculture, &c.

THEIR chief liquors were, beer and wine, the former the moſt common of the two; for they did not begin to cultivate the latter till very late. Strabo obſerves of the Luſitanians, that one ſuch feaſt as thoſe we have ſpoken of, uſed to exhauſt all the vintage of that year [t]; but, by degrees, they came to like it better, and left the beer to the Germans, and northern nations, and made wine their chief liquor. Their martial temper inſpired them originally with ſuch contempt for agriculture, that they committed the care of it, at firſt, to their wives, old men, and ſlaves. The Germans and they are juſtly blamed for it by the Romans, and a great piece of pride and folly it was in them, to chuſe to purchaſe the conveniencies of life at the expence of blood and wounds, rather than by the ſweat of their brow [u]. But the ſame may be ſaid of all handicraft trades, which they looked upon as vaſtly below the care of a warlike nation; but one may ſay, in general, that when the Romans came to pour their conquering armies upon them, they forced them, by degrees, to procure thoſe things by their labour, which they were formerly wont to get, either by the ſword, or by commerce: neceſſity ſoon made them feel the ſweet of encouraging agriculture, and all other kinds of trades; and by degrees, likewiſe, of the liberal arts and ſciences; in both which branches they became, in time, as expert and famed as any other nation.

[s] Relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c. 34. & ſeq. [t] L. iii. [u] German. c. 14, & 23.

nation. So that one may ſafely look upon their conqueſt by the Romans to have been the mother of all theſe.

Their vices.

WE ſhall conclude this ſection with a ſhort review of the other vices and virtues which are recorded as being peculiar to the antient Gauls. As for their vices, they are reducible to theſe three, which are attributed to them by the generality of antient writers, viz. drunkenneſs, lazineſs, and fierceneſs; all which we ſhall have the leſs occaſion to dwell upon, becauſe we have occaſionally given ſo many pregnant inſtances, in the courſe of their hiſtory. As for their drunkenneſs, we have given ſome inſtances of it in ſpeaking of their feaſtings; but we cannot ſee why that vice ſhould be reckoned more peculiar to them, than to their neighbours the Germans, who vaſtly exceeded them in it. Beſides theſe, Plato has given us a liſt of other people who were equally guilty of it, viz. the Lydians, Perſians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Scythians, and Spaniards[x]; and we need not direct our readers where to look for ſome others, who may juſtly come under the ſame cenſure. But the Gauls were more envied for their bravery, both by Greeks and Romans, and were, therefore, made oftener the ſubject of their reflections. Accordingly Livy and Plutarch[y] pretend to have it from antient authors, that thoſe Gauls who lived near the Alps, having once taſted the Italian wine, became ſo enamoured with it, that they immediately reſolved to go and conquer that country. And Diodorus Siculus tells us, that they were ſo fond of that liquor, that they would give a man, that is, one of their ſlaves, for a gallon of wine[z]; which made the merchants very ready to furniſh ſuch cuſtomers with that beloved commodity, both from Greece and Italy. It is likewiſe pretended, that they were more than ordinary greedy of it, on account that it made them fight more courageouſly, or rather furiouſly, and more apt to deſpiſe all manner of dangers and fatigues; and yet, in fact, nothing is plainer, than that, if thoſe authors have not exaggerated their accounts, the Gauls could not encounter a worſe enemy than wine proved to them, upon all occaſions, ſince, according to them, it ſeldom failed throwing whole armies of them into diſorder and confuſion; and, which was ſtill worſe, by baiting them with ſome large quantities of that liquor, it either ſo overcame them, that they fell down dead-drunk, and expoſed, as it were, naked and defenceleſs, to their enemies, by which means they have been all cut in Drunkenneſs.

[x] De leg. l. i. Vide & Athen. l. x. Clem. Alex. pæd. l. ii.
[y] Hiſt. l. v. Plut. in Camil. [z] L. v.

pieces; or, as it often happened, it set them a fighting one against another, so that they became an easier prey to them [a]. One would, therefore, be apt to think, that, after they had so oft and severely smarted for their greediness after that destructive liquor, their kings and generals would have made some wholsome prohibitions against so dangerous a custom: and what may incline us to believe they did so, is, that though the Greek and Roman authors charge the whole Gallish people, in the lump, with this vice, yet the instances they give are but few, and happened sometimes to one nation, sometimes to another of them (B). However, though this abuse has been somewhat exaggerated, yet we own, that there must have been some foundation for it, since Charles the great was forced to make some severe laws against it; one of which obliged the judges on the bench, and the pleaders, to continue fasting; others, which forbad the forcing of any one to drink more than he cared for; others, which forbad the soldiers, whilst in the field, to invite any man whatever to drink, under pain of excommunication, and being condemned to drink water till they had been sufficiently punished for their fault [b]. This vice, it seems, was so universal, that even the Mysians, a kind of monkish tribe among the Scythians, who were obliged to abstain from all flesh, wine, and strong liquors, had yet a way amongst them of intoxicating themselves by the smoak of some odoriferous weeds, something, perhaps, of the nature of our tobacco, which made them exceeding chearful and merry, though without being attended

[a] Vide Justin. ex Trog. l. xxiv. c. 7, & seq. Appian. Celtic. Plutarch. Livy ubi supra, & al. [b] Vide addition Carol. Mag. ad leg. Salic. an. 803. & Pelloutier. ubi supra, l. ii. c. ult.

(B) Thus, for instance, we are told, that those Gauls who took the city of Rome, and those who ravaged Greece, were mostly cut off in their drunken revels (67). The same fate, we are told, overtook the Goths in Thrace (68); one sort were defeated by Cyrus, in the same manner; and another by the Romans (69). But these are hardly more than single instances, that happened to one tribe or other of them.

(67) Appian. Celt. Plutarch in Camil. Justin. l. xxiv. (68) Zosim. l. iv. c. 23, & seq. (69) Justin. l. i. c. 8. Livy, l. xli. c. 4.

attended with the ill effects which are commonly cauſed by exceſs of wine, &c. [c] (C).

THE lazineſs, imputed likewiſe to them, appears, by what we have ſaid a little higher, to have been rather owing to their pride, than to any diſlike they had to labour, under an honourable title: for it is plain, that in their exerciſes, as well as their wars, they accuſtomed themſelves to hardſhips and fatigues of any kind; ſo that if they neglected agriculture, and handicraft trades, it was rather becauſe they looked upon them as a kind of ſlavery unbecoming their martial genius. And it was upon this account that they ſo readily ruſhed upon any deſperate death, to avoid being taken priſoners eſpecially by the Romans, who, they knew, were wont to make ſlaves of them, and condemn them to the hardeſt and meaneſt employments And though, after their conqueſt, we have ſeen them take up with a laborious life, cultivate their lands, vineyards, and uſeful trades; yet the ſame ſpirit reigns ſtill among their gentry and nobility both in Gaul and Germany, where they retain ſtill a contempt for all the laborious and mercantile part, and chuſe rather to live in a ſhameful ſloth, and even poverty, than ſupport themſelves, and families, by any other way than that of arms. They even carry this punctilio of honour ſo far, as to look upon it as diſhonourable to the laſt degree, for a nobleman, in how low circumſtances ſoever, to marry the daughter of a mechanic, or even merchant, though her fortune was ever ſo large, and capable of enriching him, and his family.

As to their laſt vice, viz. their ferocity and cruelty, there will be the leſs occaſion to wonder at it, if we conſider, that they were brought up with a peculiar contempt of death: for how can it be expected they ſhould be tender of other peoples lives, that were ſo careleſs, and even laviſh of their own? Ferocity.

[c] Poſidon. ap. Strab. l. vii. Vide & Caſaubon. in loc. & Peloutier. ubi ſupra. [d] Diod. Sicul. l. v.

(C) The ſame, we are told, was practiſed by the Scythians and Thracians, who had no wine (70). The men and women, it ſeems, ſat round a good fire, into which they threw theſe weeds: ſome call it a grain, or ſeed (71), the ſmoak of which they ſucked up in ſuch large draughts, that, in a little time, it ſet them all a laughing, dancing, and ſinging.

(70) Herodot. l. i. Mela, l. ii. Max. Tyr. l. xi. Plutarch. de fluv. (71) Solin. c. 15. Mela, ubi ſupra.

own? And if ſlavery appeared ſo terrible to them, that they preferred any death to it, might they not deem it a mercy in them to maſſacre their priſoners of war, or ſacrifice them to their gods, rather than to make ſlaves of them? But we obſerved before, that this exceſſive love of liberty had made them look long ago upon other people, eſpecially upon the Romans, not onlywith a jealous eye, but inſpired them with an invincible hatred againſt them, and all whom they obſerved, like them, diligent and ſucceſsful in enſlaving other nations And this might not add a little to their native fierceneſs, and to that cruelty with which they thought the ought to treat ſuch open invaders of public liberty, as well as thoſe who baſely aſſiſted them in it. This will appear leſs improbable, if we come now to examine ſome of thoſe ſocial virtues for which they were famed, even by the confeſſion of their enemies, ſuch as their hoſpitality, frugality, juſtice, and fidelity.

Their virtues and hoſpitality.

It will, doubtleſs, be thought ſtrange that a nation, ſo cruel to their enemies, and ſo touchy and fierce among themſelves as to have recourſe to ſingle combat upon every trifling affront, ſhould yet be ſo famed for their hoſpitality and humanity, not only to ſtrangers, but to ſuch as refuged themſelves among them; and yet they are highly cried up for this admirable virtue, both by Greek and Roman authors. It was, it ſeems, a conſtant cuſtom among them, to invite their ſtrangers to all their feaſts and, after it was over, to enquire who they were, and wherein they might be ſerved [d]. This was practiſed, according to the ſame author, by the very Celtiberians, who were looked upon as ſome of the cruelleſt among the Gauls, inſomuch that they came in crouds to invite a traveller to their houſes; and happy was he thought whom he choſe for his hoſt: if he pitched upon one whoſe circumſtances would nor permit him to afford a very long entertainment, (for they generally treated them very ſumptuouſly) he always took care to turn him over to another that could do it. If any Gaul was convicted of having refuſed this courteſy to a ſtranger, he was not only looked upon with abhorrence by all his acquaintance, but fined by the magiſtrate: witneſs that law which was enacted among the Burgundians, which laid a fine of three crowns on all ſuch inhoſpitable delinquents; and one of double that ſum to any Burgundian that ſhould direct a ſtranger to the houſe of a Roman. In ſome other places they added a corporal puniſhment to the fine; and Tacitus

[d] Diod. Sicul. l. v.

Tacitus doth that juſtice even to the German nation, as to give ſeveral inſtances of their tender regard to ſtrangers [g]: and Cæſar adds, that they eſteemed all ſuch perſons as ſacred and inviolable, and to whom every houſe was to be opened, and every table free [h]. They even conducted them from one territory to another, and puniſhed thoſe upon the ſpot, from whom they had received any damage, or ill treatment [i]. They even puniſhed the murder of a ſtranger more ſeverely than that of one of their own nation, viz. the former by death, and the latter by baniſhment. As for thoſe who took refuge amongſt the Gauls, and a more ſafe and ſtedfaſt ſanctuary they could not meet with in any other nation, they were ſure to be protected and maintained, according to their rank. Hence that great number of diſtreſſed kings, princes, and others, who fled thither preferably to any other country, for refuge and defence, of which we have already had occaſion to ſpeak in ſome former ſections of this hiſtory; and with what faithfulneſs they were protected by them, may, out of many more inſtances, be inferred, from that which we ſhall give our readers in the margin (D), to avoid dwelling too long upon ſo known a ſubject.

THESE inſtances are no leſs an argument of their juſtice and fidelity: the confidence which the emperors, princes, and Fidelity and juſtice.

common-

[g] German. c. 21. [h] Comment. l. vi. [i] Ariſtot. de mir. Auq. N. Damaſc. ap. Strab. ſerm. 165.

(D) Toriſin, king of the Gepidæ, had a noble refugee at his court, named Ildiſgus, who had a lawful right to the crown of Lombardy, but had been excluded from it, after the death of king Vaces, by Aduin, who ſeized upon it. This laſt cauſed Ildiſgus to be demanded of the Gepidæ, and procured his demand to be backed by the emperor Juſtinian's embaſſadors. Toriſin, who had juſt concluded a peace with the Romans and Lombards, called a council of all his nobles, and acquainted them with Aduin's requeſt, and the danger he was in if he refuſed. Upon this, that truly auguſt aſſembly unanimouſly agreed, that it were better that their whole nation, men, women, and children ſhould periſh, than to give way to ſuch a ſacrilegious demand (72).

Even among the ruder Slavonians, who lived on the other ſide the Elbe, it was permitted to ſet any man's houſe on fire, who refuſed ſanctuary to a ſtranger; and, in ſuch caſes, every one ſtrove to puniſh the violation of hoſpitality (73).

(72) Procop. hiſt. Gothor. l. iii. c. 35. l. iv. c. 27. (73) Helmold. chron. Slavon. c. 82. Pelloutier. l. ii. c. 16.

commowealths, placed in them, not only in courting their alliance and friendſhip, and in hiring great numbers of them as auxiliaries, but likewiſe in the former chuſing them for their life-guards, is another proof of it. And if they could be thus faithful to even the Roman emperors, ſuch as Auguſtus, Tiberius, Caligula, Nero, Claudius, and others; we need not doubt of their being ſo to other nations, to whoſe ſervice they had not ſuch a natural reluctance: though it muſt be owned, that the Germans gained, in time, a greater degree of confidence in thoſe monarchs than the Gauls had done; and perhaps, on this very account, that they did not ſhew ſuch natural averſion to the Roman yoke as the Gauls did, who took all opportunities that offered to ſhake it off. But before even the time of Auguſtus, we find the Gauls and Spaniards in great credit and truſt with Juba, king of Mauritania [l], with Herod, king of Judea [m], with Cleopatra [n], and with moſt princes far and near; an account of which hath been given in every proper place of this work. They have, indeed, been branded with the reverſe vice, by ſeveral Greek and Roman hiſtorians [o]; and it muſt be owned, that they have ſometimes receded from their fidelity, notwithſtanding their valuing themſelves ſo much upon it, above all other nations; and we have formerly given ſeveral inſtances of it, though, for want of knowing what motives induced them to it, we have been obliged to condemn them for actions, which, if thoſe authors had rightly informed us of the true ſprings of, might have paſſed uncenſured. Neither Greeks, Carthaginians, nor Romans, were famed for their ſtrict adherence to their treaties, any more than ſcrupulous about the means of obtaining them: and Cæſar, for inſtance, has laid the blame on the Gauliſh perfidy, which Cato has bravely retorted upon him [p]. And who knows what provocations they may have had, whenever they have departed from their uſual fidelity and juſtice? But not to dwell too long upon uncertainties, we may affirm, that, in the main, they long enjoyed that noble character, however their conqueſts afterwards, and ſince them their unmeaſurable ambition have hurried them into the quite oppoſite extreme.

Of

[l] Cæſar. Com. l. ii. c. 40. [m] Joſeph. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 21. [n] Idem ibid. c. 5. [o] Cæſar ubi ſupra, l. iv. c. 11. Polyb. l. ii. Livy, l. xxv. c. 33. Vide Paterc. & al. [p] Vide Sueton. in Jul. Cæſ. c. 24. Plutarch. in eund. Cato Min. Dio Caſſ. & al.

Of their frugality we have likewiſe given ſeveral inſtances, ſuch as their contempt of gold and ſilver, of trades and manufactures, and the like; the antient plainneſs of their diet, dreſs, houſes, &c. Their cloathing was a kind of veſt and breeches, light and neat; they wore their hair long, had a collar about their neck, and bracelets about their wriſts, and above the elbow. Thoſe who were raiſed to dignities, wore them of gold, the reſt of braſs. The druids were always cloathed in white when they officiated, and the freemen, on all public occaſions, appeared with their arms [q]. We know little of their marriages, except that they do not ſeem to have allowed polygamy, and that they had power of life and death over their wives: at leaſt this laſt plainly appears, from a paſſage of Pomponius Mela, who, being a Spaniard, muſt underſtand the Gauliſh laws and cuſtoms better than any Greek or Roman author that has written of them. We ſhall give the ſubſtance of it in the margin; firſt, becauſe it contains ſome curious particulars about the Gauliſh funerals, with which we ſhall cloſe this ſection: and, ſecondly, becauſe the author doth therein clear that nation from having entertained the Pythagorean doctrine of the tranſmigration of ſouls, which other writers have abſurdly charged them with, and which we promiſed, in a former ſection, to diſprove (E). Their burning of the dead bodies, we have ſeen, in a former ſection, by thoſe urns which contained their bones and aſhes, with ſome other trinkets which they mingled with them, of more or leſs value, according, as may be ſuppoſed, to the condition of the deceaſed; but that they likewiſe buried without burning, may be alſo gathered from thoſe entire bodies which have been found, eſpecially in the mounds of Saliſbury plain, of which we have given an account: for as the Gauls received their religious laws and cuſtoms from the Britiſh druids, we make no doubt they exactly agreed in them, in both countries.

Frugality.

SECT.

[q] Strabo, l. iv. Pliny, l. xvi. c. 24. De diis Germ. & al.

(E) Among other tenets which the druids hold, ſays that author (74), there is one, which they endeavour to inculcate into every Gaul, in order to inſpire them with greater bravery; namely, that of the immortality of the ſoul, and a future life. Accordingly, ſays he, when they burn the bodies of their dead, and bury their aſhes, they bury, likewiſe, with them, their books of accounts, and the notes of hand of the moneys they had lent whilſt alive, that

(74) De ſit. orb. l. iii.

SECT. V.

The hiſtory of the antient Gauls, from the Roman invaſion, and their conqueſt by Julius Cæſar, to the irruption of the Franks.

WE ſhall have the leſs room to enlarge upon this ſubject, firſt, becauſe we have little or no account of this nation before they were viſited by the Romans, but what we have given an account of in ſome part or other of this chapter: and, ſecondly, becauſe what happened to them from that time to the irruption of the Franks, has been fully ſpoken of in the Roman hiſtory. However, that we may not leave this part too imperfect and ſhort, for the ſake of avoiding repetitions, and that we may ſave our readers the trouble of collecting the particulars of it out of our former volumes, by having recourſe to every index, we ſhall give them here a ſummary of them in one view, and in as ſuccinct a method as we can, with proper references in the margin, of that they may be of ſervice to them in the other world. Sometimes, likewiſe, their near relations and friends have flung themſelves into the funeral pile, to go and live with them there. Hath this doctrine of a future life any thing in common with the Pythagorean tranſmigration? Could theſe account-books, receipts, and notes, be of any ſervice to ſouls which paſs into other bodies, either of men, or brutes? Can thoſe, who affirm it, imagine that ſouls, thus tranſmigrated, into whatever body it be, could be ſtill the ſame perſons whom thoſe accounts concerned? And would thoſe friends have been ſuch fools, as to chuſe to die with them, for the ſake of living with them hereafter, had they had the leaſt notion of ſuch a tranſmigration? How could they ever expect that happineſs, if they really believed that, upon their going out of this world, their ſouls were to enter into freſh bodies, of either men, women, brutes, or vegetables, the one, perhaps, in one corner of the world, and the other in another? What likelihood is there, that the Gauls, ſo jealous of their liberty as they were, would, by thus ruſhing into immediate death, run the riſque of paſſing into the bodies, I won't ſay of either plants or beaſts, but even into thoſe of ſlaves, or even of women, over whom they had the power of life and death?

of the places where thoſe facts have been more fully diſcuſſed, and add to it an account of ſuch other tranſactions as have not yet, or have been but ſlightly touched upon. All which we ſhall endeavour to couch, as well as it can be done, in a chronological order, and near as we can to its epocha, according to ſuch of our chronologers as may be beſt depended upon: we ſhall only add here, that the Gauls, being a ſtrong and hardy people, and multiplying ſo faſt, that their country could not contain them, was one conſtant cauſe of their excurſions into other countries far and near, and in ſuch vaſt multitudes, that they ſpread terror where-ever they came. It often happened, likewiſe, that theſe colonies, thus ſettled in a foreign country, were ſo moleſted by their neighbours, that, to prevent their being diſpoſſeſſed, they ſent into their native country for freſh aſſiſtance, and eaſily obtained it, the Gauls being always ready to pour out their numerous ſwarms, upon all ſuch occaſions, to prevent any of their old colonies being driven back unto them. Hence their vaſt multitudes, their known valour, natural fierceneſs, and cruelty to thoſe who fell into their hands, joined to an unavoidable neceſſity, upon all ſuch expeditions, either to conquer or ſtarve, added not a little to the dread of their name. We ſhall paſs by thoſe which they antiently made out of Europe into ſeveral parts of Aſia, where they ſettled themſelves in ſeveral fine countries, and under different names, and for which we ſhall refer our readers to the Celtic hiſtory in a former volume [a].

THEIR earlieſt, and moſt conſiderable ſally we have recorded, is that which they made into Italy, under their famous leader Belloveſus (A), who, croſſing the Rhoſne, and the Alps, ſettled himſelf in that part of Italy called Piedmont and Lombardy, then inhabited by the Hetrurians, about the year of Rome 160 [b]. Year of the flood 2377. Before Chriſt 622.

THE

[a] See vol. v. p. 383, & ſeq. [b] See vol. xi. p. 576.

(A) Ambigatus, then king of Celtogallia, finding his kingdom overſtocked, ſent his two nephews, Belloveſus and Segoveſus, each at the head of a numerous army, to go and ſeek ſome new ſettlements. The firſt croſſed the Alps, the latter the Rhine and Hercynian foreſt, and ſettled in that part of Germany ſince then called Boiemia and Bohemia, from the Boii, who accompanied him in that expedition (1), as ſhall be further ſhewn in the next chapter.

(1) See before, vol. iv. p. 561.

THE Cœnomani, who dwelt between the rivers Seine and Loire, made the ſecond grand expedition under their general Elitonis, and ſettled in the Breſciano, Cremoneſe, Mantuan, Carniola, and Venetian [c]; the time of this and the next is uncertain.

THE third was made by the Læves and Ananes, the former of whom ſettled in Novara, on one ſide of the Po; and the latter in Piacentia, on the oppoſite ſide.

IN a fourth, the Boii and Lingones, having paſſed the Pennine Alps, ſettled on the ſouth ſide of the Po, between Ravenna and Bologna.

IN the fifth, which happened about two hundred years after that of Belloveſus, the Senones, ſeated between Paris and Meaux, were invited into Italy by an Hetrurian lord, and ſettled themſelves in Umbria. Brennus, who was their king, had laid ſiege to Cluſium, and here it was that he gave that noble anſwer to the three Fabii, who were ſent from Rome to expoſtulate with him, of which we have had occaſion to take notice in a former ſection. We have ſeen, in the volume laſt quoted [d], that the treachery of the Fabii, in entering and defending that city, and of the Romans in countenancing, inſtead of puniſhing it, did ſo exaſperate the Gauliſh general, that, raiſing the ſiege of the place, he immediately turned all his force againſt the latter, and, having defeated them, marched directly to Rome, whoſe inhabitants were ſtruck with ſuch terror at his approach, that they abandoned it to his mercy. When Brennus entered the place, which appeared to him like a very deſert, he ſecured all the avenues round the capitol, and then gave up that metropolis to be plundered by his men, who preſently after reduced it to aſhes, and all its ſtately temples and palaces into an heap of rubbiſh. Finding the capitol too ſtrong for him he turned the ſiege of it into a blockade, and marched againſt Ardea, where he was eaſily defeated by Camillus, who had been a refugee there about two years: for the Gauls were, by this time, ſo intoxicated with their ſucceſs at Rome, and with the wine of that country, that they kept neither order nor diſcipline; ſo that Camillus, at the head of the Ardeates, made a terrible ſlaughter of them. His next attempt was, to ſurpriſe the capitol, and would, in all likelihood, have ſucceeded in it, had not the noiſe of ſome geeſe awaked the brave Manlius, who ſounded the alarm, and gave them ſuch a fierce repulſe, that moſt of the Gauls flung themſelves headlong down the ſteep ſteep rock; and loſt their lives. However, the beſieged in the capitol were reduced to ſuch ſtreights on the one hand, and the Gauls on the other, who were themſelves beſieged in the city by Camillus, now choſen dictator, that the ſenate thought fit to ſend Sulpitius, a tribune, to treat with Brennus; and between theſe it was agreed, that the Romans ſhould pay him a thouſand pounds weight of gold, and he depart out of the Roman territories. But when the money came to be paid, and Brennus had brought falſe weights with him, Camillus ordered the gold to be carried back, and told the Gaul, that Rome ſhould be ranſomed by the ſword, and not with money. He proved as good as his word; for a dreadful conteſt enſuing upon it, between the two armies, the Gauls were ſo diſheartened on the ſudden, that they made a running fight of it; but being purſued by the dictator, were all cut off, it ſeems, to one man, not one of them being left to carry the news into their own country [e]. The Gauls all cut off.

Brennus enters and plunders Rome.

Burns and deſtroys it. Year of the flood 2614. Before Chriſt 385.

[c] Ibid. [d] See vol. xi. p. 577.

THE next expedition was ſtill more unfortunate; for thoſe Gauls who had ſettled themſelves in thoſe parts of Italy we have lately ſpoken of, led but an uneaſy life there, being continually harraſſed by the Romans; upon which, they ſent into Gaul for freſh reinforcements; but theſe came in ſuch vaſt numbers to their aſſiſtance, that they became more dreadful to them than the Romans: ſo that they made no ſcruple to turn their arms againſt them, and, having killed their two leaders, eaſily put the whole army to flight. The Romans, however, were in no ſmall dread of them, when they found how active they were in Italy, and what vaſt armies they could draw out of Gaul; and it was to diſſipate that fear, that they perpetrated that horrid piece of ſuperſtition at Rome which we formerly mentioned, of burying a Greek and a Gauliſh man and woman alive in the ox-market. But they did not truſt to this ſo far as not to make vaſt preparations, when they heard that the Gæſatæ, another brave Gauliſh nation, were invited, by their Italian countrymen, to their aſſiſtance. Theſe were of a fiercer nature than any of the reſt; they ſcorned all kind of defenſive armour as mean and cowardly, and generally choſe to fight naked. Had but their martial ſkill been as great as their courage (B), it is likely they [e] Vol. xi. p. 585, & ſeq.

(B) We have purpoſely omitted ſeveral other defeats which they met with in ſome other expeditions, and which the reader will find they might, at that juncture, have disabled the Romans from ever conquering any more nations: for their approach had spread such a terror all over the Roman territories, that they raised one of the vastest armies that ever had been known amongst them. If we may believe Polybius [f], it consisted of no less than 800000 men, horse and foot. The Gauls, however, nothing terrified at it, though they had but 50000 foot, and 2000 horse, forced their way through them, and entered their territories; but being as inferior to them in military discipline, as they were in number, they met with a total defeat: 40000 of them were killed on the spot, and 10000 taken prisoners, and amongst them Concolitanus, one of their kings; whilst the other, named Aneroestus, and by far the most experienced warrior, only escaped to a neighbouring village, and there killed himself, as did most of the officers who followed him, according to the Gaulish maxim, of preferring death to slavery.

The Gæsatæ defeated.

NOTWITHSTANDING all these successes, the Romans had no small reason to fear, that the Gauls would, at length, be made sensible, by their frequent defeats, of their own want of martial discipline and policy, and by their example, and that of other nations, become, in time, as expert soldiers as they (C); in which case, they could not but become find in the places of the Roman history quoted in the margin (z); where he will find, that the Romans were by that time so well apprised of their superiority to them in this point, that they generally trusted to it, and with good success, since it appears, by all these instances, that it was by that that they gave them such frequent and surprising defeats.

[f] L. ii. c. 22.

They fought much after the same undisciplined manner, in single combat; witness that gigantic Gaul, who, by his golden collar, seems to have been one of their generals, and, Goliah like, challenged any of the Romans to fight with him, and was, like him, overcome by a brave stripling (3). For the Gaul, trusting to his superior strength, began the fight by discharging a great blow on his antagonist, whilst the dexterous youth, rushing under his shield, stabbed him to death with his sword (4).

(C) We are told (5), that their very weapons, especially their swords, were so wretchedly tempered, that, upon the very first onset,

(2) See vol. xi. p. 618, 634, 642, & vol. xii. p. 62. (3) Vol. xi. p. 634. (4) Livy, l. viii. c. 9. (5) Polyb. ubi supra. Plutarch. in Marcel. Oros. & al.

come a very formidable enemy to their nation, conſidering their hatred to it, their hardineſs, intrepidity, and readineſs to join every foe againſt them. The aſſiſtance they gave Hannibal, as he was croſſing their country, and over the Alps, of which we have given an account elſewhere [h]; and, after him, to Mago, and the Carthaginians, during their war [i]; their being ſo frequently hired as auxiliaries, by other ſtates and kingdoms, moſt of them at war with Rome, and among which they were ſure to perfect themſelves more and more in the martial trade, whilſt they themſelves could not venture to take them into their pay without manifeſt danger (D); theſe conſiderations obliged them, at laſt, to retaliate upon them, and invade their country, upon the firſt favourable opportunity, and before they were become too expert in the art of war for them: but before we come to ſpeak of onſet, in which they conſtantly charged with incredible fury, they uſed either to break, bend, or be ſo blunted, againſt the Roman javelins, as to become uſeleſs; ſo that before they could have time to ſharpen or ſtraiten them, the enemy preſently cloſed in upon them, and, throwing by the javelin, and ſhortening their ſwords upon them, ſtabbed them, like ſo many ſheep.

[h] Vol. xi. 188, &c. [i] Ibid. p. 276.

(D) They gave a dreadful inſtance of it from the beginning, when Scipio, after the defeat which the Carthaginians had given him, on the banks of the Ticinus, retired to Placentia, to cure his own, and his ſoldiers wounds; for here about 2000 foot, and 200 horſe, of thoſe Gauls which the conſul had in his pay, upon ſome diſcontent, roſe up in the dead of the night, and, whilſt the Romans were aſleep, entered their camp, ſlew a great number of them, cut off their heads, and carried them to Hannibal, who gave them a kind reception, and invited them, with vaſt promiſes, into his ſervice.

This treachery ſo diſheartened the conſul, that, fearing leſt the reſt of their countrymen, that were left in his army, ſhould follow their example, and make the miſchief ſtill greater, he wiſely choſe to give them the ſlip, and lead his own troops to a place of more ſafety. The Carthaginians, finding the Roman camp cleared, plundered and ſet it on fire, whilſt the Gauls flocked, in great numbers, to their general, and liſted in his ſervice (6); an action, one would think, ſufficient to deter the Romans from ever truſting a Gaul again.

(6) Polyb. l. iii, c. 66, & ſeq.

this, it will be neceſſary to ſay ſomething of their other expeditions and exploits, in Aſia, Macedonia, and other countries.

Year of the flood 2720. Before Chriſt 279.

THE firſt of this kind was in the year after Pyrrhus paſſed into Italy [k], when the Gauls, finding themſelves again overſtocked at home, ſent out three vaſt colonies to ſeek new habitations. Brennus (perhaps a deſcendent of him who had ſome two centuries before made that dreadful irruption into Italy we have lately mentioned) was the chief adviſer of this expedition, and head of one of the Gauliſh armies; Cerethrius commanded the ſecond, and marched into Thrace; and the third, under the command of Belgius, marched into Illyricum and Macedonia: as for Brennus, he was entered into Pannonia, or Hungary, a poor country in compariſon to thoſe which Belgius had invaded, and wherein he had enriched himſelf with immenſe plunder; ſo that envying his ſucceſs, he reſolved to join him, and ſhare it with him. Belgius being ſoon after defeated to ſuch a degree that we hear no more of him, or his men, he haſtened thither, under pretence of revenging and aſſiſting him; and it is not improbable, that the remainder of Belgius's army liſted themſelves under him. The army with which he entered into thoſe two provinces, conſiſted of 150000 foot, and 15000 horſe; but a revolt happened in it, in which Leonorius and Lutarius, the two chief leaders of it, carried off 20000 men, and marched into Thrace, and, joining themſelves to Cerethrius, ſeized on Byzantium, and the weſtern coaſts of Propontis, and there ſettled, and made the adjacent parts tributary to them.

To retrieve this loſs, Brennus ſent for freſh ſupplies from Gallia, inliſted ſome Illyrians, and, with a new army of 150000 foot, and above 60000 horſe, entered Macedonia, defeated Soſthenes, and ravaged the whole country. He next marched towards the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, with an intent to invade Greece, but was ſtopped by the forces which were ſent to defend that paſs againſt him. This obliged him to get him ſome guides over thoſe mountains, over which Xerxes had paſſed his forces before; upon which, the guards retired, to avoid being ſurrounded by him. He then ordered Acichorius, the next to him in this expedition, to follow him at a diſtance with part of the army, and with the bulk of it marched ſtrait towards Delphos, with a deſign, as is ſuppoſed, to plunder that rich city and temple; but met, it it ſeems, with a terrible repulſe, from a violent ſtorm of thunder, lightning, and hail, which deſtroyed a great number of his men; and from a dreadful earthquake, which overwhelmed another part of his army: ſo that the remainder, being ſeized with a panic fury, fell upon, and murdered each other, all that night. The next morning they found their miſtake, and near one half of their army deſtroyed, and the Greek forces pouring in upon them from all parts, and in ſuch numbers, that though Acichorius joined him in the nick of time, yet were they not able to make head againſt the Greeks, but were defeated, with a terrible ſlaughter. Brennus himſelf was deſperately wounded, and ſo diſheartened at his miſcarriage, that he aſſembled all his chiefs, and having adviſed them to ſlay all that were wounded and diſabled, and to make as good a retreat as they could, he put an end to his life. Acichorius, immediately after, led the remainder of his ſhattered army back, as well as he could; but their long marches through enemies countries, the oppoſitions and hardſhips they met with from them, and the grievous calamities which accompanied them, did, it ſeems, ſo thoroughly exhauſt them, that not one of them returned from that expedition [m]: a juſt judgment, indeed, upon them, if they really went with that ſacrilegious deſign which is charged upon them by the Greek and Roman authors, and in which we make no doubt but they have as much exaggerated their puniſhment in their above-mentioned defeat, as they have their guilt, as the reader may ſee, by what is added in the margin (E).

[k] Polyb. l. i. c. 6. Vide Pauſan. Phoc. Juſtin. l. xxiv. & ſeq.

Their dreadful defeat, and end.

[m] Iidem ibid. Vide & Memnon. excerpt. ap. Phoc. c. 19, & ſeq. Eclog. Diod. Sicul. l. xxii. Livy, l. xxxviii. Callimach. hymn. in Delum. Suid. in voc. Galatai.

(E) We promiſed, in a former ſection, to explode the virulent charge which Cicero lays againſt the Gauls, and their religion, founded chiefly on this action of their plundering the Delphic temple, and that of their beſieging the capitol, and, as he adds, (to aggravate it the more) the great Jupiter in it; from which he infers, that their religion conſiſted only in a diametrical oppoſition to all others, and in waging war againſt the gods of other nations, &c. and that the Gauls were a moſt irreligious, wicked, and dangerous people, not fit to live; and much more to that purpoſe.

Now if it be true, that the Gauls, before their conqueſt, did worſhip the one Supreme Being, and, like the Perſes, Brachmans, and

WHILST this expedition was carrying on in Greece, the other colonies under Leonorius and Lutarius, parting from the others who were ſettled in the Propontis, marched into the Helleſpont, and made themſelves maſters of Lyſimachia, and the Thracian Cherſoneſus. Here ſome great miſunderſtanding happening and other antient nations and philoſophers, thought it an indignity to confine him in temples, or repreſent him by idols of any kind, as we have formerly ſhewed they did, then will their deſtroying thoſe temples and idols, or even plundering them of their treaſures, if they had really done ſo by this of Delphos, ſtand juſtified, and rather deſerve commendation, than ſuch a black reproof. The plunder of ſuch ſuperſtitious treaſures, to men of theſe principles, and for the ſupport of a numerous army that ſtands in need of it, will be juſtly deemed applying them to a better uſe.

But it plainly appears, from the majority of thoſe authors quoted above, that they did not plunder the Delphic oracle, but that they were ſcared from it by a ſtorm and earthquake, which threw them into ſuch a panic, as made them be eaſily overcome by thoſe Greek forces, which came, with great fury, to defend their country and oracle againſt them; upon which it is ſuppoſed, that all theſe diſaſters befel them as a juſt judgment for their ſacrilegious deſign againſt that temple and treaſure: but this laſt is at beſt but a ſurmiſe, founded on a wrong, though common notion, that ſuch diſaſters always argued ſome atrocious crimes in the ſufferers; all which is here dreſſed up, by authors who were profeſſed enemies to the Gauliſh nation, and have, doubtleſs, exaggerated both at their pleaſure, though without any real foundation.

Juſtin, and after him Cicero, indeed, accuſe them of having plundered the Delphic treaſure; and the laſt adds, that they carried it home too; but being grievouſly plagued for their ſacrilege, they were advised to throw their ill-got pelf into the lake of Thoulouſe. This, though plainly oppoſite to all thoſe authors who have written of that expedition, ſeems to us only an invidious improvement on the account they have given of it, in order to bring a ſcandal on that vaſt treaſure which was conſecrated and repoſited in that lake, and which Strabo and Athenæus, on the authority of Poſidonius, tell us was (ſo far from being fetched from Delphos) dug up out of ſome rich mines in that neighbourhood, as we have already had occaſion to obſerve in the laſt ſection. If any thing, therefore, could be objected, with any ſeeming juſtice, againſt the Gauls, it was their ſending ſuch powerful colonies to invade other nations; but neither Greeks nor Romans could have any pretence to find fault with that which was their own practice, as well as that of all other nations.

pening between thoſe two chiefs, they parted their forces; the former returned to Byzantium, and the latter ſtayed where he was. They did, however, rejoin their forces ſome time after, and paſſed into Aſia, being invited thither by Nicomedes, whom they aſſiſted againſt his brother, and fixed him in all his father's dominions; in acknowledgment of which, he aſſigned them that part of Leſſer Aſia which we deſcribed at the beginning of this chapter, and which was, from them, called Gallogræcia, and Galatia. Thither came, Some ſettled alſo, a great number of thoſe other Gauls who had ſettled in in Galatia. Thrace, and who were driven from thence by Antigonus Gonatus, who had ſeized the kingdom of Macedon upon the death of Soſthenes. A greater number of them diſperſed themſelves about in other countries, and either periſhed, or ſo intermingled themſelves, as not to be heard of any more; ſo that of this great and threatening Gauliſh army, none remained but thoſe who ſettled in Galatia [n]. Theſe, likewiſe, in time, encreaſing in number, and being ſtreightened in their territories, endeavoured, according to cuſtom, to enlarge them where they could, and to ſend their colonies and auxiliary armies abroad (F), which did not a little annoy and [n] Idem ibid.

(F) Juſtin tells us, that all Aſia ſwarmed with them, and that there was hardly an eaſtern prince at war that did not hire them as mercenaries (7). This was, in particular, the caſe of Antiochus Hierax, in his war againſt Seleucus, whom he defeated at Ancyra (8), by the help of the Gauliſh auxiliaries. But his victory had like to have coſt him dear: for theſe, having heard a rumour, that Seleucus had been ſlain, formed, it ſeems, a project to murder him, and ſeize upon his kingdom; ſo that he found no better way of ſaving himſelf, than by giving them all the treaſure he had (9).

The ſcene of war between the two contending brothers being at length removed to Meſopotamia, it is not improbable, that the battle of Babylonia happened between the Babyloniſh Jews and the Gauls, in which 8000 of the former defeated and killed 120000 of the latter (10): for Babylon was then a province of Meſopotamia, and Antiochus, then in confederacy with the Gauls, who were then very numerous there, and all over Aſia, as we mentioned out of Juſtin, was totally defeated by Seleu-

cus

(7) L. xxv. c. 2. (8) Idem ibid. (9) Idem, l. xxvii. c. 2. (10) 2 Maccab. viii. 20.

alarm all their neighbours; but they were at length suppressed by the proconsul of Asia, Corn. Manlius Vulso, who gave them several defeats, and obliged them to live quietly, and keep within their old limits [o]. They are, however, affirmed by some authors to have been subdued about fifty-three years before, by Attalus, king of Pergamos [p]; and if so, they must have found out some means of recovering their liberty, to have been so powerful in Manlius's time; unless we suppose these authors to have confounded the Gauls with the Galatians. However that be, these last were still, above 130 years after, governed by their own tetrarchs, one of whom, named Deiotarus, was, for his services done to Pompey the great, created king by him (G), and had the Lesser Armenia, and some other territories, added to his own [q]. Thus much may suffice for the Gaulish expeditions abroad. It is time now to return to those at home, and to give an account of their conquest by the Romans.

Year of the flood 2811, Before Christ 188.

Marcius subdues part of Gaul.

We hinted a little higher, that the Romans were grown so fearful of the Gauls, that they thought it proper, in order to humble them, to lead their armies into their country. After many attempts, not worth mentioning, the person that opened the most effectual way into Gaul was the great consul Q. Marcius, surnamed Rex, to whose lot this province was fallen, as well as the supreme power, by the death of his collegue in Numidia. Marcius, the better to carry on his design, opened a way between the Alps and the Pyrenees, a work of immense labour, in which he was stoutly opposed by the Gauls, especially the Stœni, who lived at the foot of the Alps [r], and who, finding themselves overpowered by him, cus (11). But whether these were the Galatians of Asia minor, or troops sent out of Gaul, is not easy to guess, from either Justin, or the book of Maccabees, as we hinted at the beginning of this chapter.

[o] Livy, l. xxxviii. [p] Ibid. l. xxxiii. Strabo, l. xiii. Suid. Polyæn, &c. [q] Strabo, l. xii. Eutrop. l. vi. [r] Steph. de urb.

(G) This is the same Deiotarus that soon after dispossessed the other three tetrarchs, and seized upon all Galatia. For this he was summoned before Julius Cæsar, upon which occasion Cicero made a speech in his behalf, which is still extant, under the name of Oratio pro rege Deiotaro.

(11) Justin, ubi supra. Polyæn. l. iv. c. 19.

by him, ſet fire to their houſes, killed their wives and children, and threw them and themſelves into the flames. Marcius, having accompliſhed his work, planted a colony, for the ſecurity of it, in the country of the Volſcæ Tectoſagi, between the Pyrenees and the city of Tholouſe; and built a city in it, and called it Narbo Marcius, ſince Narbonne, which became the capital of that province. The reduction of ſuch a conſiderable part of Gaul, and the opening and ſecuring ſuch a way between the Alps and Pyrenees, as laid the foundation for the conqueſt of the whole country, was thought ſo conſiderable a ſervice to Rome, that the ſenate ordered him a triumph for it [s]. His ſucceſſor, Scaurus, not only conquered ſome other nations of the Gauls, as the Gentiſci and Carni (H), but, to facilitate the ſending of troops from Italy thither, he made ſome excellent roads between them, which before were almoſt impaſſable [t], and was likewiſe honoured with a triumph.

The ſacred treaſure of Tholouſe plundered, Year of the flood 2893, Before Chriſt 101.

In the mean time, the Cimbri and Teutones, taking the alarm at theſe ſucceſſes, took up arms againſt them, and gave them ſeveral conſiderable overthrows; in one of which the Tigurini (I), having ſurpriſed them, made them, and their general Popilius, paſs under the yoke [u]. The Cimbri, in particular, had retaken ſome parts of Gaul from the Romans, and, in particular, the famed city of Tholouſe; upon which, Cepio marching his army to retake it, it opened its gates to him; notwithſtanding which, he not only gave it up to be plundered by them, but carried off all that vaſt treaſure that had been conſecrated there by the Gauls, and of which we have lately given an account, to the amount of 100000 pounds weight of gold, and the ſame of ſilver, even according to the moſt moderate accounts of it; and, in ſpite of his treachery, avarice, and ſacrilege, was continued proconſul of the Narbonneſe Gaul. This vile action ſo exaſperated the Gauls, that they joined with the Cimbri, and, taking the advantage of the ſquabble that was between the general and his collegue Manlius, they fell upon them ſo furiouſly, that they gave them ſuch an overthrow as they had

[s] Faſt. capit. Cicer. pro Fronteio. See before, vol. xii. p. 426.
[t] See before, vol. xii. [u] Ibid. p. 459.

(H) Theſe inhabited part of Noricum, and the name of the latter is ſtill retained in the province of Carniola.

(I) The two former are only different names for the Germans, as we ſhall ſee in the next chapter; as to the Tigurini, they inhabited that part of Switzerland called Zurich.

had ſcarcely ever met with, killing 80000 men, beſides 40000 ſervants and ſutlers, in one day; only ten men, of their whole army, eſcaped with the two generals, and among the former the brave Sertorius, who ſaved himſelf by ſwimming over the Rhine. The Gauls, who, according to cuſtom on ſuch occaſions, had devoted all the ſpoil, threw all the ſilver and gold into the Rhoſne, drowned all the horſes, and murdered all the priſoners they had taken. What conſternation this loſs threw the city of Rome into, and what puniſhment was inflicted on the ſacrilegious Cepio, we have elſewhere ſhewn [w]. As to the victorious allies, they held a general council, whether to march immediately into Italy, or reduce thoſe provinces which the Romans held in Gaul: they agreed, however, to conſult the brave Æmilius Scaurus, whom they had taken priſoner in a preceding action, and who, Roman like, ſtrove to deter them from invading the territories of that republic, but was, for his bold ſpeech, ſtabbed to death by Boiorix, king of the Cimbri.

The Roman ſenate, expecting nothing leſs than a freſh irruption of the Gauls and Cimbri, thought fit to recal Marius from his ſucceſsful expedition againſt Jugurtha; and, having honoured him with a triumph for it, appointed him general againſt the enemy, and Sylla to ſerve under him. They both ſet out accordingly, and Sylla gained ſeveral advantages againſt the Tectoſagi, and took Copillus, one of their kings, priſoner, whilſt Marius reſolved not to engage ſuch a numerous army as appeared againſt him, till he had received ſufficient reinforcements to his own. In the mean time, the Marſi, another people of Germany, had joined the Cimbri, with a deſign to enter Italy with them, and Sylla was ſent to oppoſe them; but he, inſtead of engaging them, found means to gain the former over to the Roman intereſt. The Cimbri, enraged at this, ceaſed not to infeſt the Roman general till they forced him to remove to Aquæ Sextiæ, now Aix in Provence, and in his way was briskly attacked by the brave Ambrones, now the canton of Bern, to whoſe valour had been chiefly owing the dreadful blow they gave Cepio and his collegue. They fought with the utmoſt fury and intrepidity, indeed, but wanted diſcipline; ſo that, not being able to ſtand the ſhock of ſuch regular troops as they engaged, ſo dreadful a ſlaughter was made of them, that the next river ran ſtained with their blood. Here the Ambronian women did likewiſe ſignalize themſelves, ran with their axes againſt the the purſuing Romans, and made a ſtout oppoſition. But being at length overpowered, and offering to ſurrender upon honourable conditions, which were denied them by the enemy (K), they murdered all their children, and themſelves; ſo that not one of them was found alive [x].

[w] Ibid. p. 476---478, & (I).

AFTER this defeat, the Gauls ſeem to have been quiet for ſome time, whether too much ſuppreſſed by the Romans, or that they left it to the Germans to harraſs them, as they in fact did, and gave the conſul much trouble, though to very little effect, they being conſtantly overcome, as often as they engaged him; but he met, ſoon after, with a more dreadful enemy in Sylla, and Rome was ſo rent, and in ſuch conſternation, on account of thoſe two factions, as we have ſeen in the Roman hiſtory, that they rather ſought the friendſhip of the Gauls, than their reduction. But Sylla found means, by his addreſs, to draw them to his ſide [y]. Hence it is likely, that he ſuffered them to live in peace during the whole time of his dictatorſhip; for we hear nothing relating to them during that time, nor for ſome ſpace after his death, though the ſcene of war was by this time removed into Spain and Portugal by Sertorius, and where he had very great ſucceſs againſt Pompey, who was ſent againſt him [z]. This war was no ſooner ended there, than a new one began in the heart of Italy under Spartacus, who was at the head of an army conſiſting chiefly of Gauliſh ſlaves, and whom he deſigned, after ſome notable ſucceſs againſt the two conſuls, to have led back over the Alps into their own country. But this they ſtifly refuſed, and were ſoon after totally defeated by Craſſus, who was ſent againſt them, and Spartacus himſelf ſlain, after having fought with incredible bravery, and ſacrificed heaps of Romans round about him: 40000 of the Gauls were killed on the ſpot, the reſt Gauliſh ſlaves defeated.

[x] Ibid. p. 497. [y] Ibid. p. 520. &c. [z] Ibid. p. 573. &c.

(K) Theſe conditions were, as we hinted in a former ſection, that their honour ſhould be preſerved; that they ſhould not be ſold into ſlavery; and that they ſhould be employed in the ſervice of the veſtals. Theſe conditions being denied, they would have contented themſelves with the firſt; but that being inhumanly refuſed, their love of chaſtity made them prefer ſuch an honourable death, as could not but caſt a more ſhameful brand on thoſe who ſtyled them barbarians, and yet uſed ſuch brave matrons in ſo inhuman a manner (12).

(12) Vide Plutarch. in Mario. Valer. Max. l. vi. c. 1. Frontin. ſtratag. l. iv. & v.

reſt fled into Luſitania, where they were ſoon after cut off by Pompey [a]. Whether the Tranſalpine Gauls had any hand in this rebellion, doth not appear. In that famed conſpiracy of Catiline they were indeed invited into it by ſome of his partiſans, in hopes of drawing ſome conſiderable helps from thence; but the embaſſadors of the Allobroges (L), then at Rome, who had been alſo tampered with, made ſuch a full diſcovery of the whole deſign to their protector Q. Fab. Sanga, and he to the conſuls, that it was happily prevented and diſconcerted [b].

Cæſar's ſwift entrance into Gaul.

FROM all this it ſeems as if the Gauls had lived all this long while in quiet and good friendſhip with Rome, whatever feuds there might be among them in the heart of their country: the Helvetii were they which kindled that freſh war which brought Cæſar over the Alps, and ended in the conqueſt of that brave and warlike nation. Orgetorix was the firſt cauſe of it, who, whether through want of room, or a deſire to exchange his inclement country for a better, or for ſome other cauſe not mentioned by any writer, had engaged a vaſt number of his countrymen to burn their towns and villages, and to go in ſearch of new conqueſts. Julius Cæſar, to whoſe lot the whole country of Gaul was fallen, made ſuch haſte to come and ſuppreſs them, that he was got to the Rhoſne in eight days, broke down the bridge of Geneva, and, in a few days more, finiſhed the famed wall between that city and mount Jura, now St. Claude, which extended ſeventeen miles in length, was ſixteen feet high, fortified with towers and caſtles at proper diſtances, and a ditch that ran the whole length of it (M). Whilſt this was doing, and the reinforcements he wanted were coming, he amuſed the Helvetii, who had ſent to demand a paſſage through the country of the Allobroges, till he had got his reinforcements, and then flatly refuſed

[a] Vol. xii. p. 619. [b] Ibid. p. 635.

(L) Theſe inhabited the regions at the foot of the Alps, known now by the names of Savoy, Dauphiné, and Piedmont.

(M) If his own account of it may be relied upon (13), he did not ſet out till the beginning of April, and yet this huge work was finiſhed by the ides or 13th of the month: ſo that ſubtracting the eight days he was a coming, it muſt have been all done in about five days: a prodigious work! conſidering he had but one legion there, or even though the whole country had given him a helping hand.

(13) Comment. l. 1. c. 1. & ſeq.

refuſed it to them; whereupon a dreadful battle enſued, in which they loſt 130000 men, in ſpite of their valour, beſides a number of priſoners, among whom was the wife and daughter of Orgetorix, the leader of this unfortunate expedition; the reſt ſubmitted, and begged they might be permitted to go and ſettle among the Ædui, from whom they originally ſprung; and, at the requeſt of theſe laſt, were permitted to go (N). This action and victory, joined to the policy and incredible diſpatch with which Cæſar had carried it againſt them, gained him ſuch reputation, and, at the ſame time, ſtruck the Gauls with ſuch a dread, that they ſtrove who ſhould pay him the firſt homage nnd congratulations, and procure his friendſhip. So that we may look upon it as the baſis of all his glory and conqueſts in this country. His ſucceſs.

We formerly took notice of the ſad divided ſtate he found them in at his firſt coming amongſt them, their vaſt variety of governments, their jealouſy over each other, the overgrown power of ſome, and the reduction of others into a ſtate of dependence next to ſlavery: Cæſar, who knew beſt how to make the moſt of theſe inteſtine broils, ſoon became the protector of the oppreſſed, a terror to the oppreſſor, and the umpire of all their contentions. Among thoſe who applied to him for help, were his allies the Ædui, againſt whom Arioviſtus, king of the Germans, joined with the Arverni (O), in their late wars, had taken the country of the Sequani from

(N) The Ædui were ſituate between the rivers Seine, Loire, and Saone, and were the only allies Cæſar then had. Theirs being a fruitful country, they had promiſed to ſupply him with corn, but made ſo many delays, that he began to ſuſpect their fidelity, and to find himſelf in great diſtreſs for want of it. Divitiacus, one of the lords of it, was then in his army, with Liſcus, one of their magiſtrates: Cæſar examined them both about it ſeparately, and the latter told him, that Dumnorix the younger, brother of Divitiacus, deſigning to ſeize upon the ſupreme power, had allied with the Helvetii, and ſent that corn to them which ſhould have been conveyed to him. Divitiacus confirmed what Liſcus had ſaid, but without naming his brother; and when Cæſar would have puniſhed him for his perfidy, generouſly interceded for him, and obtained his pardon (14).

(O) The Arverni were ſeated on the Loire, and were ſo called from their metropolis, Arvernum, now Clermont, the capital of the Guiennois. They were once the moſt powerful people of the Gauls, (14) Ibid. Vide ſupra, vol. xiii. p. 12.

from them, and obliged them to send hostages to him. Cæsar forthwith sent to demand the restitution of both, and, in an interview which he soon after obtained of that haughty and treacherous prince, was like to have fallen a sacrifice to his perfidy; upon which, he bent his whole power against him, forced him, against his will (P), out of his strong intrenchments, and gave him a total overthrow. Arioviſtus escaped, with difficulty, over the Rhine; but his two wives, and a daughter, with a great number of Germans of distinction, fell into the conqueror's hand. Cæsar, after this signal victory, put his army into winter-quarters, whilst he went over the Alps to make the necessary preparations for the next campaign [c]. By this time all the Belgæ in general were so terrified at his success, that they entered into a confederacy against the Romans, as their common enemy, of which Labienus, who had been left in Gaul, sent him word; upon which, he immediately left Rome, and made such dispatch, that he arrived upon their confines in about fifteen days. Upon his arrival, the Rhemi submitted to him, but the rest appointing Galba, king of the Suessones, general of all their forces, which amounted to 150000 men, marched directly against him. Cæsar, who had seized on the bridge of the Axona, now Aisne, led his light horse and infantry over it, and whilst the others were incumbered in crossing that river, made such a terrible slaughter of them, that the river was filled with their dead, insomuch that their bodies served for a bridge to those who escaped. This new victory struck such terror into the rest, that they dispersed themselves; immediately after which, the Arioviſtus defeated.

The Belgæ subdued.

[c] Comment. l. i. c. 1, & seq. See before, vol. xiii. p. 13, & seq.

Gauls, their territories are said to have reached from the ocean to the Rhine, on one side, and the Pyrenees on the other (15).

The Sequani were neighbours to the Ædui, and inhabited that part of Gallia Belgica called Upper Burgundy, now Franche Comté.

(P) Cæsar, who lost no advantage he could get on an enemy, had intelligence that some German propheteſſes, and such were in high esteem among them, had foretold, that they could not be victorious till after the new moon; or rather, he knew that was a superstitious notion common among them, and all the Gauls; and this it was made him so eager, and Arioviſtus so averse, to come to blows before that time.

(15) Strabo, l. iv.

the Sueſſones, Bellovaci, Ambiones, and ſome others, ſubmitted to him. The Nervii, indeed, joined with the Atrebates and Veromandui againſt him, and, having firſt ſecured their wives and children, made a ſtout reſiſtance for ſome time, but were, at length, defeated, and the greateſt part of them ſlain; the reſt, with their wives and old men, ſurrendered themſelves, and were allowed to live in their own cities and towns, as formerly. The Aduatici were next ſubdued, and, for their treachery to the conqueror (Q), were ſold for ſlaves, to the number of 50000. Young Craſſus, the ſon of the triumvir, ſubdued likewiſe ſeven other nations, and took poſſeſſion of their cities; which not only completed the conqueſt of the Belgæ, but brought ſeveral nations from beyond the Rhine to ſubmit to the conqueror. The Veneti, or antient inhabitants of Vannes in Britany, who had been likewiſe obliged to ſend hoſtages to the conqueror, were, in the mean time, making great preparations, by ſea and land, to recover their liberty. Cæſar, then in Illyricum, was forced to equip a fleet on the Loire, and, having given the command of it to Brutus, he went and defeated them by land, as Brutus did by ſea; and, having put their chief men to death, ſold the reſt for ſlaves. The Unelli, with Veridorix, their chief, together with the Lexovii, and Aulerci, were, about the ſame time, ſubdued by Sabinus, and the Aquitani by Craſſus, with the loſs of 30000 men. There remained nothing but the countries of the Morini and Menapii (R) to be conquered, of all Gaul. Cæſar marched himſelf againſt them, but found them ſo well entrenched in their inacceſſible fortreſſes, that he contented himſelf with burning and ravaging their country; and, having put his troops into winter-quarters, paſſed again over the Alps, to have a more watchful eye over ſome of his rivals there

Veneti ſubdued.

(Q) Theſe were the remains of thoſe Cimbri whom Marius had defeated in Italy, and had been left on the banks of the Rhine to guard the baggage. They made a ſham ſubmiſſion to Cæſar, and ſurrendered their arms to him, but had concealed a third part of them, with which they fell foul on the Romans in the night: upon which, he broke down the gates of their city, put many of them to the ſword, and ſold the reſt for ſlaves (16).

(R) Theſe are the territories, now called Ferouennes, Cleves, Gelder, and Juliers. Thoſe of the Aulerci and Lexovii are now the Evreux and Liſieux. As to the Unelli, their abode is differently gueſſed at, but without any certainty.

(16) Comm. l. ii. c. 1, & ſeq.

there [d]; but he was ſoon after obliged to come and defend his Gauliſh conqueſts againſt ſome nations of the Germans, who were coming to ſettle there, to the number of 400000, and whom he totally defeated, and then reſolved to carry his conquering arms into Germany. As this laid the foundation for that bloody war which he afterwards carried againſt them, it will be more properly ſeen in the ſubſequent chapters, as well as his ſeveral expeditions into this iſle in that which immediately follows, and to which we ſhall refer our readers.

UPON his return into Gaul, he found it labouring under a great famine, which had cauſed a kind of univerſal revolt. Cotta and Sabinus, who were left in the country of the Eburones, now Liege, were betrayed into an ambuſh by Ambiorix, one of their chiefs, and had moſt of their men cut off. The Aduatici were fallen upon Q. Cicero, who was left there with one legion, and had reduced him to great ſtreights: at the ſame time Labienus, with his legion, was attacked by Indutiomarus, at the head of the Rheni and Senones; but had better luck than the reſt, and, by one bold ſally upon them, put them to flight, and killed their general. Cæſar acquired no ſmall credit by quelling all theſe revolts, but each victory loſt the lives of ſo many of his troops, that he was forced to have recourſe to Pompey for a freſh ſupply, who readily granted him two of his own legions to ſecure his Gauliſh conqueſts [e].

Cæſar repaſſes into Gaul.

BUT it was not long before they, ever reſtleſs under a foreign yoke, raiſed up a new revolt, and obliged him to return thither. His fear leſt Pompey ſhould gain the affections of the Roman people, had obliged him to ſtrip the Gauls of their gold and ſilver, to bribe them over to his intereſt: and this gave no ſmall handle to theſe frequent revolts which happened during his abſence. He did, however, ſoon reduce the Nervii, Aduatici, Menapii, and Treviri, the laſt of which had raiſed the revolt, under the command of Ambiorix; but he ſoon found the flame ſpread much farther, even to the greateſt part of the Gauls, who had choſen the brave Vercingetorix their generaliſſimo. Cæſar was forced to leave Inſubria, whither he had retired to watch the motions of Pompey, and, in the midſt of winter and ſnow, repaſs the Alps, into the province of Narbonne, where he gathered all his ſcattered troops with all poſſible ſpeed, and, in ſpite of the hard weather, beſieged and took Noviodunum, now Noyons;

[d] Ibid. p. 16--20. [e] Ibid. p. 25.

Noyons; and defeated Vercingetorix, who was come to the relief of that place. He next took the city of Avaricum, now Bourges, one of the ſtrongeſt in Gaul, and which had a garriſon of 40000 men, of whom he made ſuch a dreadful ſlaughter, that hardly 800 eſcaped. Whilſt he was beſieging Gergovia, the capital of the Arverni, he was informed that the Nitiobriges, or Agenois, were in arms, and that the Ædui were ſending to Vercingetorix 10000 men, which they were to have ſent to reinforce him. Upon this news, he left Fabius to carry on the ſiege, and marched againſt the Ædui. Theſe, upon his approach, ſubmitted, in appearance, and were pardoned; but ſoon after that whole nation roſe up in arms, and murdered all the Italian troops in their capital. Cæſar, at this, was in great ſtreights what meaſures to take, but reſolved, at length, to raiſe the ſiege of Gergovia, and at once attack the enemy's camp, which he did with ſome ſucceſs; but when he thought to have gone to Noviodunum, or Noyons, where his baggage, military cheſt, &c. were left, he heard that the Ædui had carried it off, and burnt the place. Labienus, juſtly thinking that Cæſar would want his aſſiſtance in the condition he now was, went to join him, and in his way defeated a Gauliſh general, named Camulogena, who came to oppoſe his march; but this did not hinder the revolt from ſpreading itſelf all over Celtic Gaul, whither Vercingetorix had ſent for freſh ſupplies, and, in the mean time, attacked Cæſar, but was defeated, and forced to retire to Aleſia, a ſtrong place, now Aliſe in Burgundy, as is ſuppoſed. Hither Cæſar haſtened, and beſieged him, and, having drawn a double circumvallation, with a deſign to ſtarve him in it, as he was likely to have done, upon that account refuſed all offers of a ſurrender from him. At length, the long-expected reinforcement came, conſiſting of 160000 men, under four generals: theſe made ſeveral fruitleſs attacks on Cæſar's trenches, but were defeated in three ſeveral battles, which, at length, obliged Vercingetorix to ſurrender at diſcretion. Cæſar uſed all his priſoners with great ſeverity, except the Ædui and Arverni, by whoſe means he hoped to gain their nations, which were the two moſt potent of Celtic Gaul, as he actually did; for both of them ſubmitted to him, and the former received him into their capital, where he ſpent the winter, after he had put his army into winter-quarters. This campaign, as it proved one of the hardeſt he ever had, ſo he gained more glory by it than any Roman general had done before [f] : yet could not all this procure him from the ſervile ſenate, now wholly dedicated to his rival, a prolongation of his proconſulſhip ; upon which, he is reported to have laid his hand upon his ſword, and ſaid, that that ſhould do it [g]. He was as good as his word, and the Gauls, upon their former ill ſucceſs, reſolving to have as many ſeparate armies as provinces, in order to embarraſs him the more, Cæſar, and his generals Labienus and Fabius, were forced to fight them one after another, which they did, however, with ſuch ſucceſs, that, notwithſtanding the hardneſs of the ſeaſon, they ſubdued the Bituriges, Carnuti, Rhemi, and the Bellovaci, with their general Correus, by which he at once quieted all the Belgic provinces bordering on Celtic Gaul. The next who followed were the Treviri, the Eburones, and the Andes, under their general Dunmarus. The laſt place which held out againſt him was Uxellodunum, which was defended by the two laſt acting generals of the Gauls, Drapes the Sennonian, and Luterius the Cadurcean. The place being ſtrong, and well garriſoned, Cæſar was obliged to march thither from the furtheſt part of Belgic Gaul, and ſoon after reduced it, for want of water. Here, again, he cauſed the right-hands of all that were fit to bear arms, to be cut off, to deter the reſt from revolting afreſh. Thus was the conqueſt of Gaul finiſhed from the Alps and Pyrenees to the Rhine, all which vaſt tract was now reduced to a Roman province under the government of a prætor. The ſum of all the provinces, cities, and priſoners taken, if not exaggerated by that conqueror and Plutarch, the reader may ſee in the Roman hiſtory above quoted [h].

Suppreſſes the revolted Gauls.

Reduces it into a Roman province.

Thus ended, in a great meaſure, the liberty of that once famed and warlike nation, and with it their ſingular valour, as Tacitus obſerves, in the life of Agricola. Some cities, or commonwealths, however, we are told [i], were permitted to remain free ; ſuch as the Nervii, Ulbaneſes, Sueſſones, and Leuci ; and others retained the title of confederates to Rome, viz. the Ædui, Lingones, Rhemi, and Carnutes : as to the reſt, who were reduced into the form of a Roman province, we may gueſs at their miſerable condition, by what Critognatus the Arvernian, as quoted by Cæſar [k], tells us of it. "If, ſays he, you would know after what manner diſtant "nations are uſed by the Romans, you need but look at our "neigh-

[f] Ibid. 126, & ſeq. [g] Cicer. ad Attic. l. v. epiſt. 15, & ſeq. Vide & Plutarch. in Cicer. & Cæſar. [h] Vol. xiii. p. 29, 30, &c. [i] Plin. hiſt. l. iv. c. 11. [k] Comment. l. vii.

" neighbouring Gaul, now reduced into a province, which " having its laws and cuſtoms changed, and being brought " under the power of the axes, is oppreſſed with perpetual " ſlavery." To underſtand rightly the difference of theſe three conditions, or, more properly, degrees of ſlavery; the firſt was, the having a number of ſoldiers quartered upon them, to keep them in awe (S); the next was, when the province was laid under tribute, in which caſe they were compelled to endure a vaſt number of tax-gatherers, which, like ſo many leaches, or harpyes, ſucked out the very vitals of the country (T). The third was, when they were deprived of the privilege of being governed by their own laws and magiſtrates, but had governors ſet over them, with full power and authority (cum imperio & ſecuribus) over their lives and eſtates, and ſent to them from Rome. It was on account of this threefold tyranny that they ſo often revolted; for, as Tacitus himſelf obſerves, in the reign of Tiberius the continuance of thoſe taxes, the extortions of uſurers, and inſolence of the ſoldiers, were become ſo intolerable, that it drove the Gauliſh cities into a freſh rebellion. And Suetonius, in the life of Nero, tells us, that the world, having for near thirteen years groaned under his tyranny, did at length ſhake it off, the Gauls ſetting the firſt example to all the reſt.

GAUL was ſoon after divided into ſixteen provinces, the names of which the reader will find in the margin (V), each of Gallia divided into 16 provinces.

(S) In which caſe, if theſe provinces continued quiet and peaceable, they had, it ſeems, no great armies quartered in them, ſince Joſephus tells us (17), that, in Titus's time, they had no more than 1200 ſoldiers in garriſon in all Gaul, although, adds he, they had fought for their liberty againſt the Romans above 800 years, and had near as many cities as theſe had then ſoldiers there.

(T) We are told, accordingly, that, after Julius Cæſar had finiſhed the conqueſt of Gaul, he laid it under a tax, or tribute of HS. quadringenties (18), that is, about a million of Engliſh crowns. How much heavier they were taxed in ſubſequent reigns, may be eaſily gueſſed, by their frequent revolts, and continual complaints againſt thoſe extortions and oppreſſions, ſome inſtances of which we ſhall have occaſion to mention by-and-by.

(V) Viennenſis, Narbonenſis prima, Narbonenſis ſecunda, Aquitania prima & ſecunda, Novempopulana, Alpes maritimæ, Belgica

(17) Antiq. l. ii. (18) Eutrop. l. vi.

of which groaned now, more or less, under the Roman tyranny, according as they were more or less favoured by the emperors, or by the prætors sent thither to rule them. However, neither under Cæsar, whilst he lived, nor even under his successor Augustus, do we read of any considerable revolt; on the contrary, though the latter did, in a manner, begin his reign with making them undergo a census, which is the first we read of made out of Italy, and which could not but be galling to them, they seem to have submitted to it patiently. Some years after, indeed, when Drusus was sent thither to stop the incursions which the Germans were frequently making upon them (W), and had there begun a second, and perhaps a more

Year of the flood 2977. Before Christ 22.

Belgica prima & secunda, Germania prima & secunda, Lugdunensis prima, secunda, & tertia, Maxima Sequanorum, & Alpes Græcæ; of all which, the reader may see a further account in the authors hereunder quoted (19).

This division, however, was not made by Julius Cæsar, since we find it still under the three distinctions in which he left them, when Augustus caused the first census to be made in it (20); but was begun towards the latter end of this last's reign, and finished by some of his successors.

(W) It is hardly to be doubted but the Gauls, who did so grievously brook the plundering and insolences of the Romans, and found themselves too weak now to make head against them, did, by some private means, either invite the Germans as friends, or hire them as auxiliaries to their assistance; and this seems to have been the first beginning of the colonies of the Franks. For those Germans, whether defeated by the Romans, or, which is more likely, bought off by them, began, by little and little, to settle on the borders of Gallia. For we are told, that Augustus transplanted the Suevi and Sicambri, who submitted to him, into Gallia, and assigned them lands along the Rhine (21). And of Tiberius we read, that he brought 40000 of those that surrendered themselves, in the German war, over into Gallia, and settled them on the banks of the Rhine (22).

To this we may add, what another author tells us of the emperor Probus, in whose reign above sixty cities had revolted from the Romans, and made a bold push for the recovery of their liberty. This prince, says he (23), marched with a vast army into Gaul, which, after Posthumius's death, was all in commotion, a more ſtrict one, taking a particular account of each perſon's eſtate, in order to tax them according to it; they then began to expreſs an univerſal diſcontent, and an inclination to take up arms, and regain their liberties. Druſus, however, without ſeeming to ſuſpect any thing like it of them, ſummoned all the Gauliſh chiefs to aſſiſt at the conſecration of the temple which the Lugdunenſes had built in honour of Julius Cæſar, and, upon their coming, behaved with ſuch addreſs and complaiſance to them, that they not only dropped their intended revolt, but agreed to build an altar to Auguſtus, and to pay him divine honours, even during his life. Sixty Gauliſh nations, it ſeems, contributed to the rearing and adorning of this magnificent altar, which was conſecrated on the 1ſt of Auguſt, and games were, at the ſame time, inſtituted, in honour of this new kind of deity, not unlike the Iſthmians and Nemeans of Greece [l].

(19) Anton. itiner. S. Ruf. Ammian. Marcel. l. xv. (20) See before, vol. xiii. p. 374. (21) Sueton. in vit. Aug. (22) Idem in Tiber. (23) Vopis. in vit. Prob. Hottoman. Francogal. c. 3.

This fulſome flattery to that monarch, which might, probably, be owing to the preſence of Druſus, did not, however, divert them long from their favourite view of regaining their liberty, whenever fortune ſhould favour them with a proper opportunity. The druids, on the contrary, ſeem, upon this occaſion, to have exerted themſelves to cheriſh that noble deſign in them, to prevent any further defection from their antient religion; and hence, moſt likely, aroſe thoſe frequent revolts, as well as threatening edicts, that came out againſt them in the ſucceeding reigns, and of which we have had occaſion to ſpeak in a former ſection: however that be, the violent extortions, and horrid butcheries which they underwent under Caligula [m], were of themſelves ſufficient to have ſpirited up a leſs warlike nation; though that reign was not long enough to ripen their deſign, and under the next they either enjoyed more reſpite, or, which is as likely, were more narrowly obſerved. But in that of Nero, under whom they were more cruelly treated than ever, the brave and tion, and, when Aurelian was killed, was, in a manner, poſſeſſed by the Germans. There he gained ſo many victories, that he recovered from the barbarians ſixty of the moſt noble cities of Gallia; and whereas they had overſpread all Gaul without controul, he ſlew near 400000 of thoſe who had ſeated themſelves within the Roman territories, and tranſplanted the remainder of them beyond the rivers Neckar and Elb: but of this we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more fully in the ſubſequent chapters.

[l] Vide Strabo, l. iv. Sueton. in Auguſt. Livy, &c. & ſupra, vol. xiii. p. 416.

[m] See vol. xiv. p. 74.

Vindex's revolt in Gaul.

noble Julius Vindex (X), at that time governor of Celtic Gaul, declared his resolution to free his country from slavery, and the empire from that bloody tyrant. As soon as his design was known, the Gauls, harrassed and reduced to beggary by intolerable imposts, flocked to him from all parts to assist him in it; so that, though he had no Romans under his command, yet he soon saw himself at the head of 100000 armed men. When Nero heard the news of this revolt, he appeared quite glad at it, as it would afford him occasion for fresh extortions and cruelties. What he seemed most affected with was, that Vindex, in some of his edicts against him, among other contemptuous language he had given him, did call him a bungling harper; so that instead of making proper preparations to oppose him, he only strove to display his skill in music, to wipe off the scandal, as he thought it, that was thrown upon him. But when messengers came to him thick and threefold, and acquainted him with the progress Vindex had made in Gaul, and with Galba's revolt in Spain, he left Naples, in a fright, and repaired to Rome: however, a frivolous, but lucky omen, as he imagined it, having dispelled his fears, he returned again to his musical amusement, without taking one step to suppress either revolt. We shall not need repeat here the unworthy behaviour, and dreadful end of that emperor, of which a full account has been given in a former volume [n]: all that needs be recapitulated here concerning the ill success of our Gaulish general is, that his army, having been surprised by that of Rufus Virginius, who was marched against him, whether by treachery or accident, is not agreed, the Gauls were defeated, with the loss of 22000, who were killed on the spot; upon which, Vindex, in a fit of rage and despair, laid violent hands upon himself, and the rest dispersed themselves for want of a leader. Galba had much better success, and was soon after raised to the empire [o]; but the Gauls were so heavily oppressed by him, and so loaded

His ill success and death.

[n] Ibid. p. 274, & seq. [o] Ibid. p. 297, & seq.

(X) He was descended from the antient kings of Aquitain, and bore a natural aversion to all tyrants. Upon his first resolution of revolting, he sent to persuade Galba, then in Spain, to do the same, who neither followed his advice, nor betrayed his design, though some other governors, to whom he wrote on the same subject, sent his letters to Nero: but Galba, upon receiving a second letter from him, actually raised a revolt there (24).

(24) Plutarch. in Galb. Dio, l. lxiii. Sueton. in Ner. Tacit. l. i. c.

loaded with taxes, that they dared not undertake any thing againſt him. In the great ſtruggle between his two ſucceſſors, Otho and Vitellius, though they heartily hated them both, yet they were forced to declare for the latter, by Fabius Valens, who, in his march through their territories towards Italy, whither he was leading a gallant army, committed the greateſt plunders and extortions. This threw the nation into ſuch a terror, that every province and city ſent their embaſſadors to meet him, and bribe him with large preſents, to prevent their towns from being either plundered or burnt (Y).

THEY did, however, recover themſelves ſo far, notwithſtanding all theſe oppreſſions, as to make ſeveral bold puſhes for their liberty, eſpecially in the reign of Veſpaſian. We have given an account of it in a former volume [p], as well as of the peace that emperor thought fit to clap up with them, rather than to exaſperate them to turn their arms againſt him at that juncture [q]. In Adrian's time this province was viſited by that emperor in his progreſs through the empire, and as it had been greatly oppreſſed and impoveriſhed during the former reigns, he left, where-ever he paſſed through it, ſome tokens of his pity and munificence to that nation, and built ſome ſtately edifices there, eſpecially a ſumptuous palace, in honour of Plotina, Trajan's widow. He forgot not, at the ſame time, to repair all the Roman towns and fortreſſes in that country, to keep them in ſubjection [r], as it actually did, no conſiderable revolt happening during his and ſome of the ſucceeding reigns. All this while they ſeem to have made no inconſidera-

[p] See vol. xiv. p. 423, & ſeq. [q] Ibid. p. 425. [r] Ibid. p. 617.

(Y) Amongſt thoſe that ſuffered the effects of his fury and avarice, was the city of Vienne, againſt which that of Lions had inſtigated him, as having aided the late noble Vindex in his revolt. They were therefore forced to buy their pardon from him by an immenſe ſum, beſides a donative of 300 ſeſterces, the ſurrender of all their arms, and furniſhing his army with proviſions.

As he drew nearer the Alps, he ordered the city of Lucus, a municipal town of the Vocontii now Dauphiné, to be ſet on fire, becauſe they expreſſed a backwardneſs to pay him the large ſum he had exacted from them; and thus he went on extorting all the way he paſſed, whilſt Cæcina did the ſame among the Helvetii, who, not having been appriſed of Galba's death, refuſed to acknowledge Vitellius; but, upon their ſubmiſſion, they were at length pardoned by him (25).

(25) Tacit. c. 60, & ſeq. ſee vol. xiv. p. 363, & ſeq.

ble figure, or bore a ſmall ſway, ſince, in that famous conteſt between Severus and his competitors, the Gauls having firſt ſaluted him emperor, their example was followed by almoſt all the provinces in Europe, and he was every-where acknowledged and received with the loudeſt acclamations [s]. He proved, however, very ungrateful to them, at leaſt to the chriſtians in this country, having raiſed a bloody perſecution againſt them, inſtigated thereto by his favourite Plautianus, who took occaſion of a ſoldier's refuſing to wear a crown as a donative, to ſeize on the eſtates of all the chriſtians of rank and quality, and to put a great number of them to death, and amongſt them Ireneus, the worthy biſhop of Lyons [t]. Gaul was again made the ſcene of war, in the famed conteſt between Gallienus and Poſthumius, the latter of whom had delivered this province from the dominion of the Germans, under which it had groaned for ſome time, and for which he had been acknowledged emperor both there, and in Spain and Britain, of which we have already given a full account in the Roman hiſtory [u]. The latter having been murdered by his ſoldiers, for debarring them from the plundering of Mentz [w], Lollianus got himſelf proclaimed emperor of that part of it which borders upon the Rhine; whilſt Victorinus, whom Poſthumius had taken for his collegue, governed over the reſt. Both theſe being ſoon after murdered, as we have there related, and the ſon of the latter, then an infant, being named his ſucceſſor, the Gauls murdered him likewiſe, and ſet up in his room one M. Aurelius Marius, formerly an armourer, but a man of extraordinary courage and ſtrength; but being likewiſe run through by a ſoldier who had been formerly his journeyman, and with a ſword, as himſelf told him, of his own making, P. Piveſius, or Peſuvius Tetricus, a man of ſenatorial and conſular dignity, was proclaimed in all this province, and ſoon after acknowledged in Spain and Britain. Tetricus did not long enjoy his dignity, before the conſtant jars and mutinies which happened in his army, as well as the approach of the emperor Aurelian, who had reſtored peace in all other parts of the empire, and was marching to reunite Gaul and Britain to it, made him wiſh to be fairly rid of it. There is even ſome reaſon to ſuſpect, that he invited him into Gaul; and though he made a faint oppoſition againſt him at the battle of Chalons, yet, upon the firſt onſet, he yielded himſelf to that emperor; ſo that the Gauliſh troops, for want of a leader, were Chriſtians in Gaul perſecuted.

[s] Vol. xv. p. 91, paſſ. p. 232, & ſeq. p. 246.
[t] Ibid. p. 111, & ſeq.
[u] Ibid.
[w] Ibid. & ſeq.

ANTIENT GERMANY.

MARE HYPERBOREUM
OR NORTHERN OCEAN

EAST BALTIC

SCANDIA alias SCANDINAVIA

SINUS CODANUS OR BALTIC SEA

Cimbrorum Reliquiæ

CHERSONESUS CIMBRICA

DENMARC

Teutoni

Teutoni

Cilipenus Sinus

SARMATIA

Aestii

PROPRIE SARMATIÆ

MARE SUEVICUM

Sinus Venedicus

Electrides Insulæ

Fosi qui et Saxones

Angli

Treva

Marionis

Marionis altera

Eudoses

Varini

Laciburgum

Aviones

Suardones

Lemovii qui et Heruli

Gothones

PART OF VENEDICUM SINUM

Venedi

Venedici Montes

Sciri

Mouth of the Ems

R. Weser

Mouth of the Ems

Amisia fl.

Flevum Statio

Castellum

Fletia Insula

Fretum

Frisii majores

Vetera Flu.

Amisia fl.

Chauci minores

Chauci sive Cauchi majores

Fabiranum

Attis Flu.

Reudigni

Rugii

Rugium

Sidini

Veritium

Lango bardi

Carini

Burgundione

Chamavi

Tecelia

Frisii

Marsaci

Vatialis

Angrivarii

Cherusci

Troperum

Drusi

Melibocus Mons

Sprea alius Suevicus fluvius

Suevi

Semnones

Albis Flu.

Calisia

Lugii

Lugii Seu Lugiones

Vistula flu. terminus Germaniæ

GERMANI

TRANSVISTULANI

Bructeri

Marli

Sicambri quorum

Teutoburgiensis Silva

Luppia Flu.

Luppia

Aliso

Castellum

Catto

Menapii

Mosa flu.

Toxandri

Usipii seu Usipetes

Tencteri

Luppia Flu.

Aliso Flu.

Castellum

Catto

Liseia Flu.

Hercynia Silva

Jalinæ

Ubii

Ulpia Noviomagus

Colonia Agrippina

Scaldis flu.

GALLIÆ BELGICÆ

Segedunum

Adrana Flu.

Sigus Flu.

CATTI

Mattium

Fulda Flu.

Mosa Flu.

Rhenus Flu.

Rhetico M.

Mattiaci

Castellum Germanici

Munimentum Trajani

Fontes Mattiaci

Salbis flu.

Confluentia

Taunus M.

Girabreta silva

Judith Montes

Marsingi

Carrodunum

Marcomannorum

Marabuduum

Luna Silva

Albis Flu.

Osi

Arduenna Silva

Mosella Flu.

Augusta Trevirorum

Nava fl.

Treveri

Vangiones

Borbetomagus

Moenus Flu.

Magontiacum

Nicer

Divodurum

Nemetes

Neomagus

Mediomatrici

Sedulii

Narisci

novæ sedes

BOIOHEMUM

Elburum

Eburodunum

Vistula Flu.

Carrodunum alterum

Vibantvarium

Decem Pagi

Argentoratum

Harudes

Marcomannorum antiqua sedes

Quadi

Gothini

Cusus flu.

Tyras Flu. hodie Niester

Clepidana

Mosa Flu.

Rhenus Flu.

Decumates agri

Mons Brisiacus

Abnoba Mons

Fons Danubii

Augusta Vindelicorum

Vindelicia

Danubius Flu.

Batava Castra

Limes Germaniæ magnæ

Carnuntum

Carpates Montes

Alpes Bastarnicæ

Iazyges

Hierasus flu. hodie Pruth

Tibiscus Flu

Augusta Rauracorum

Campodunum

Licus Flu.

Juvavia

Aenus flu.

Celtius Mons

Norici pars

Murus Flu.

Adpontem

Pannoniæ pars

Danubius Fl.

PARS

J. Wheatley Sculpt.

were entirely cut off, and this province again reduced to its former obedience [x]. This action quite compleated the conqueſt of Gaul, and Tetricus, whether to cover his treachery in abandoning his troops, or becauſe he did not make his ſubmiſſion ſoon enough, was led in triumph by that emperor; but was ſoon after advanced, and loaded with honours and titles by him, as we have formerly ſeen [y]. In Conſtantine's time, who is ſuppoſed to have been the perſon who firſt divided the whole empire into four parts, each containing a number of provinces, or, as they were then called, dioceſes, and each of theſe four parts put under the government of a diſtinct præfectus prætorio, which was before only under two, Gaul being made one of thoſe dioceſes, and had its provinces aſſigned to it; we have already had occaſion to mention them in this chapter, and in a former volume [z]; and ſhall not repeat it here, but only add, that the Gallic præfect had Gaul, Spain, and Britain under him.

We ſhould now come to the latter part of the Gauliſh hiſtory, and give an account of the horrid ravages this country ſince ſuffered from the Germans, the Huns, eſpecially under Attila, under the Vandals, and eſpecially under the Goths, or Viſigoths, and Burgundi, who formed themſelves into diſtinct kingdoms here, and held them, through a ſeries of princes, till diſpoſſeſſed of them by the Franks: but as theſe have already been ſpoken of in the courſe of the Roman hiſtory [a], and muſt be reſumed in that of thoſe northern invaders, in the chapters hereafter following, we ſhall refer our readers to them as they come in courſe, and proceed now to the hiſtory of the antient Germans.

[x] Vol. xv. p. 263, & ſeq. [y] P. 264, 265. [z] Ibid. p. 420, paſſ. [a] Ibid. p. 447, 582, 589, & ſeq. Vol. xvi. p. 245.

CHAP. XII.

The hiſtory of the antient Germans, to their breaking into the Roman empire, invaſion of Gaul, and expulſion out of it by the Franks.

Germans their origin.

IT is univerſally acknowledged, that the farther northward we move from antient Gaul, the more we are in the dark about the nations that inhabited the vaſt regions beyond the Rhine and the Danube, which, we have ſeen in the laſt chapter, chapter, were, in a great meaſure, the limits between the Gauls and them. Nothing is more uncertain than their origin, the countries they came from, and the territories they ſettled themſelves in: antient authors [a] commonly confound them under the names of Celtes, Scythians, and Celtoſcythians; and, among them, ſuch a great variety of people are comprehended, that it would be dangerous to apply that to the antient Germans, which they write of them under thoſe other names, without ſome concurring circumſtances to confirm it. Yet we may venture to affirm, after no ſmall number of modern [b], and ſome of the antient writers [c], that they were originally one and the ſame nation with the Celtes and Gauls, and both deſcended from the antient Gomerians, or deſcendents of Gomer, the eldeſt ſon of Japhet. Only the Germans were very much intermixed with the old Scythians and Sarmatians, on that ſide which joined with their territories, and particularly, as we hinted in the laſt chapter, between the two great rivers Rhine and Danube [d]: and theſe, no doubt, had adopted a great many of their cuſtoms among them, as well as intermingled ſome of their language with their own; but in all other parts of Germany we find ſuch an exact conformity in their religion, laws, cuſtoms, and (what may appear ſtill more ſurprizing to the generality of readers, but has been fully proved by ſome of the modern authors laſt quoted) in their very language [e], as leaves ſcarce any room to doubt but that they were deſcended from the ſame antient ſtock with the Celtes or Gauls, and came, by gradual migrations, from Aſia, as we have already ſhewn theſe did, both in a former volume, and at the entrance of the laſt chapter [f]. The truth is, as Pliny rightly obſerves [g], that the Germans were little known to the Romans, or, indeed, to any but their very neighbours, till a long time after the coming of M. Agrippa into thoſe parts; and many things which even Tacitus has written of them, pretendedly pretendedly from their own relation, are apparently fabulous: ſo that we muſt fetch our intelligence from another quarter, even from thoſe moderns who have with indefatigable pains endeavoured to ſtrike light out of darkneſs: among whom, beſides thoſe already mentioned, we may add two celebrated ones, viz Rener and Maſcov, whoſe curious diſcoveries, in many points, have added no ſmall evidence to thoſe who had written before them on this head. So that, abating the almoſt unavoidable fondneſs with which they have all of them endeavoured to give the preference to their own nation, in point of antiquity, into the merit of which it is not our buſineſs to enter, unleſs we could do it with greater certainty than the ſubject will poſſibly admit of; we may venture to follow them as ſure guides in other reſpects. If the evidence ſeems to lean on one ſide more than the other, we ſhould conclude it to be on that of the Gauls, not only as their origin can be more clearly traced from the antient Gomerians, as we have formerly ſeen; but as they are found ſeated in the beſt and nobleſt climate of the two, whilſt the Germans, as a younger branch, were, perhaps, forced to ſpread themſelves towards the more northern and inclement parts of Europe, till length of time gave them an opportunity of croſſing the Rhine, and poſſeſſing themſelves of the ſouthern provinces, as we have ſeen they did, at the cloſe of the laſt chapter, and ſhall further ſhew at the ſequel of this.

[a] Cæſar. Comment. Tacit. Plin. Strab. Juſtin. ex. Trog. & al. See alſo, vol. ii. p. 241, & ſeq. [b] Cluver. Bochart. Phaleg. Pezron. Antiq. Celt. Relig. des Gaul. Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. Calmet. Comment. in Geneſ. & al. [c] Joſeph. Antiq. l. i. c. 7. Euſtat. Antioch. in Hexamer. Hieron. tradit. Hebr. Joſ. Ben. Gor. ap. Bochart. Iſidor. Orig. Euſeb. Cæſar. Chronic. Zonar. & al. [d] See ch. xi. p. 400. [e] Pelloutier. Hiſt. Celt. l. i. c. 15. p. 165, & ſeq. Pezron. Antiq. Celt. Keyzler. Antiq. Septentr. paſſ. [f] See before, vol. v. p. 383. ſection 1. p. 1, & ſeq. [g] N. Hiſt. l. iv. c. 28.

Names.

How this country came to be called Germany, and its inhabitants Germans, is not eaſy to gueſs; the reader may ſee the various conjectures about its etymon in the following note (A); but it is plain, it was not their original name, but

(A) It is not eaſy to determine whether this word be of Celtic or Roman extract; if the latter, it muſt have been given by the Gauls, either on account of their nearneſs of kindred to them, or of that frequent aſſiſtance they called upon them for, againſt the domineering Romans, of which we have ſpoken in the concluſion of the laſt chapter. Tacitus, indeed, thinks they were called ſo by other nations, on account of their ſimilitude of religion, manners, &c. with the Gauls (1): but though this reſemblance was really true, in fact, yet the etymon itſelf ſeems too far fetched and ſtrained.

The other, which makes it of Celtic extract, is, indeed, much more natural, Ger and man, in that antient tongue, ſignifying a warlike

(1) Mor. Germ. ſub init.

but is of a more modern date, and seems to have had its rise on the other side of the Rhine, when the Condrusi, Eburones, Cæraſi, and Pæmani, crossed that river, after the example of some others of their countrymen, and went to settle in Gaul. These, it seems, were the first to whom the name of Germans was given, and which therefore extended no further than the Rhenish shore on the Gallic side, but soon after passed over to the other, and became common to other nations of the same original language and customs, till at length it became the general name of the whole nation, and the country called, from them, Germania, or Germany [h]. But whether it was given to them by the Gauls on their coming over to their assistance against the Romans, or by these on account of the affinity of their religion and customs, or, lastly, whether assumed by them on their settling themselves among the Gauls, and claiming by it a kindred to them, we will not venture to determine. One thing is plain, that it is not of Dutch extract; so that if they really called themselves by it, as Tacitus says they did, it is surprising it should not have been rather preserved by them, and handed to us in their own language. If we may be allowed to offer a conjecture as to their primitive and general name, both from what we have observed from their original descent from the antient Gomerians or Celtes, and from several monuments they have left in several parts of Germany, especially towards the north, such as Cimbrica Chersonesus, and such-like; it is not improbable, that they called themselves Cimri, or Cymbri, which is but a harsher pronunciation of the original Gomerai: for these Cimbri are allowed warlike or martial man, as, indeed, it is plain, that the Germans, as well as Gauls, did highly value themselves on that account. They were likewise known by another name, viz. that of Allemani, which, though supposed to have been given them, by the Gauls, or French, because only preserved by them, who still call them Alemans, and their country Alemanie, and Alemagne, and, as is pretended, on account of their intermixing, after Maroboduus's retreat, with strolers of all nations; yet to us that name appears to be rather of German extract, and signifies nearly the same as Ger-man, that is, altogether warlike: and this name may have been carried thither either by those Germans who went thither to assist the Gauls against the Romans, or by those who at length conquered that country, and are better known by the name of Franks, allowed to have been an antient, if not the antienteſt people of Germany, and inhabited a very conſiderable part of that country. We have already hinted, that they gave their name to the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, which was a kind of peninſula extending from the mouth of the river Elbe into the north ſea [i]: and if they really were the ſame, as they were antiently ſuppoſed, with the Cimmerians that inhabited the countries about the Palus Mæotis, and Poſidonius ſeems to confirm it, from the great likeneſs of their names [k], they muſt have ſpread themſelves vaſtly along that northern tract. We are, moreover, told, by Strabo and Livy, that the Cimbri alone penetrated into Noricum and Illyricum, and, about the 640th year of the Roman æra, defeated the conſul Papyrius Carbo near Noreia [l]. Some years after, they ſent an embaſſy to Rome, to deſire the ſenate to aſſign them lands to inhabit in, in conſideration of which they would ſerve them in their future wars. Their ſuit being denied, gave occaſion to a bitter war which they waged againſt them, in conjunction with the Tigurini, of which we ſhall have further occaſion to ſpeak, and which is only hinted here, to ſhew how powerful and numerous they were by this time, and how, probably, they were ſome branch of the old Gomerai, and the antienteſt inhabitants of Germany. We ſhall ſee, in the ſequel, their valour, and various fortunes, againſt the Romans, Gauls, and other nations. As for thoſe who remained in their native country, or returned thither after their defeat, they, in time, joining in their excurſions with the Saxons, who likewiſe inhabited ſome parts of the forementioned peninſula, it is ſuppoſed, that they became ſo blended with them, that their name was ſwallowed up in that of Saxon, ſo that nothing was retained of it but the denomination of Cimbrica, which was ſtill given both to their country, and to the ſea that ſurrounded it. The name of Allemans and Alemans, ſtill retained by the French, we have ſpoken of under the laſt note; that of Teutones, from which their preſent one of Teutſchen, or Dutch, is thought to be derived, is another by which they were antiently known, and is of a much older date than that of Germans, but the etymon of which is not eaſily gueſſed at, unleſs we fetch it from the Celtic Theut, as we ſhall ſhew further in the ſequel. Theſe, according to Mela [m], antiently inhabited the Cimbri probably the oldeſt inhabitants of Germany.

[h] Antiq. Germ. hist. Ant. Germ. Engl. by Lediard.

Teutones.

[i] Cæſ. Comm. l. ii. c. 4. Tacit. Germ. c. 2. See Maſcov. ubi ſupra, l. i. c. 6. [k] Vide Plutarch. in Mario, [l] Apud Strab. l. vii. [m] Liv. epit. Strabo, l. v.

the neighbouring coaſts and iſlands of the eaſt, or Baltic ſea; but growing too numerous for thoſe narrow territories, the moſt daring part went, with their wives and families, to ſeek new ſettlements in other countries; but when, and where, is not eaſy to gueſs (B). We ſhall ſee them, in the ſequel of this hiſtory, often joined with the Cimbri, Cimbrones, and others, and making excurſions into Gaul, Italy, and Spain, till at length a number of them, who were left to guard the heavy baggage along the Rhine, being greatly harraſſed on all ſides, fought their way quite to Belgic Gaul, where they ſettled, and became, in time, known by the name of Atuatici [n].

Atuatici in Belgia.

THUS much ſhall ſuffice for the moſt noted common names of the antient Germans. A vaſt variety of others they had, according to their particular tribes, cantons, kingdoms, and commonwealths, which being in a continual fluctuation, as they were continually either warring and joſtling each other out of their habitations, or were joſtled out of them by the Gauls, who were frequently throwing in new colonies over the Rhine, ſometimes penetrating as far as the Hercynian foreſt, at others ſpreading themſelves far and wide, along the ſides of it, and beyond; inſomuch that, as we obſerved in the laſt chapter, there was ſcarcely a country from that river to the eaſt ſea, or the moſt northern verge, but had ſome of that nation either intermixed with the Germans, or ſettled in ſome territories between them; it were labour loſt to endeavour to fix their different abodes, or even to offer any conjectures about them, or of their various governments, laws, and manner of life. They, like the Gauls, never committed any thing to writing concerning either that or their own hiſtory, and were ſtill more unknown than they, both to the Romans and Greeks, even in their very names, till the times that, by intercourſe with, or by their [n] L. iii.

(B) According to one author, they joined with the Cimbri, and, having croſſed the Rhine, invaded ſome of the Gauliſh territories (2); but we have ſeen, a little higher, out of Livy and Strabo, that the Cimbri had long enough before invaded ſome of thoſe provinces, then under the Roman yoke, and had ſettled themſelves in them: ſo that it is not eaſy to determine whether this Teutonic expedition fell upon Gaul, Italy, or any ſtill more diſtant regions.

(2) Vel. Patercul. l. ii. c. 8. Vide & Cæſar. comment. l. ii. c. 19.

their wars againſt the former, they became, by degrees, more and more known unto them, and their names, countries, and hiſtory, recorded by their writers. In our ſettling, therefore, the confines of Germany, and of thoſe cantons and territories which each different nation of that vaſt tract of ground poſſeſſed, we ſhall go no further back than the epocha in which they became fully known to them.

The extent and limits of Germany.

We took notice in the preceding chapter, that the Rhine, according to the Roman authors, divided the antient Gauls from the Germans on the weſt, and the Danube on the ſouth; the Hercynian foreſt, at that time reckoned impenetrable, confined them on the north, and the German and northern ocean on the north-weſt, and Scythia and Sarmatia on the eaſt, where they were as much intermixed with thoſe two nations, as they were on the weſt with the Gauls, and where it is ſtill more difficult to fix their boundaries, by reaſon of their conſtant fluctuation, and change of abode, as they ſo frequently invaded and drove each other out of them.

Of thoſe ſeveral nations which the Romans reckoned of German extract, we ſhall have the leſs to ſay in this chapter, becauſe we have given as full an account of them as could be extracted out of thoſe antient writers in a former volume, to which we ſhall refer, as we go on, in enumerating them, that the reader may readily find all that can be known of them, and the authorities there referred to for what is ſaid of them. We have already ſpoken of the Cimbri, and their neighbours the Saxons, who inhabited the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, on the other ſide the Elbe. On this ſide that river were the Chauci, upper and lower, who were divided from each other by the Viſurges, now the Weſer; their country contained what is now called Bremen and Lunenburg, Friezland and Groninghen; and the upper had the Cheruſci, and the lower the Chamavi on the ſouth-eaſt, and the German ocean on the north-weſt [o]. The Friſii, upper and lower, were divided from the lower Chauci by the river Amiſia, now Ems; and from each other by an arm of the Rhine [p]. Their country ſtill retains the name of Friezland, and is divided into eaſt and weſt; but the latter of the two is now diſmembered from Germany, and is one of the ſeven united provinces: from them were parted by the Iſela, now Iſel, the country of the Bructeri, ſince called Broekmorland, and the

The Chauci.

Friſii.

Bructeri, Marſi and Uſipii.

[o] Cæſar. Comm. l. ii. c. 29.

[p] See before, vol. xiii. P. 417, 521, note (H).

the Marſi, ſituate about the river Luppia, or Luppe, of whom we have alſo formerly given an account [q]. On the other ſide of that river were the Uſipii, or Uſipetes [r], but theſe were famed for often changing their habitation, and are therefore found in other territories; the Tencteri were next to them, and next to theſe the Juhones, or inhabitants of Juliers, between the the Maeſe and the Rhine: the Cotti, another antient warlike people, who inhabited part of Heſſe and Thuringia, from the Hartzian mountains to the Rhine and Weſer, and of whom we have formerly ſpoken [s]; among whom were comprehended the Mattiaci, whoſe capital was called from them Mattiacum, by ſome taken to be Marpurgh, and by others Baden, on account of its hot waters [t]. Next to them were the Seduſii, bordering upon Swabia; Nariſci, or antient inhabitants of Northgow, whoſe capital is the famed city of Nurembergh; and the Marcomani, whoſe country antiently reached from the Rhine to the head of the Danube, and to the Neckar: here were the famed Agri decumales, ſo called, among other reaſons, for their being taxed a tenth part of their produce by the Romans. The Marcomani afterwards went and ſettled in Bohemia and Moravia, under their general Maroboduus, and ſome of them in Gaul, whence they drove the Boii, who had ſeated themſelves there [u].

On this ſide the Rhine, between that river and the Moſa, or Maeſe, were the Ubii, who were brought over by Agrippa. Their metropolis was Colonia Agrippina, ſo called from the empreſs of that name, who founded it, and now Cologn [w]; and next to them the Tungri, which are ſuppoſed to be the ſame whom Cæſar calls Eburones and Condruſi, and whoſe metropolis, then called Attuatica, is ſince known by the name of Tongres [x]. Higher up from them, and on the other ſide of the Moſel, were the Treviri, whoſe capital was Auguſta Trevirorum, now Triers (C); next to them were the Tribocci, [q] Ibid. p. 539, note (C).

[r] Ibid. p. 528, note (Q).
[s] Ibid. p. 529, note (B).
[t] Ibid. p. 533, note (T).
[u] See Ibid. p. 535, note (W).
[w] Ibid. p. 404, note (E).
[x] Ibid. p. 516, note (D). & p. 520, note (F).

(C) As Germany came to be divided into Prima and Secunda, the former being that which was neareſt the Alps, the Treviri have been ſuppoſed to have belonged to it (3), as they boaſted themſelves of German extraction; but this is much queſtioned by

(3) Bucherius, Belg. Rom. l. i. c. 12.

bocci, Nemetes, and Vangiones; the former dwelt in Alsatia, and their metropolis was called Argentinæ, and Argentoratum, now Strasburgh. The others lived in the cities of Worms, Spire, and Moguntia, now Mentz. Those three, besides the Treviri mentioned in the last note, made the Germania prima; and those below them the Germania secunda, and reached as far as the Maes and lower Rhine, and was divided from Belgia by the Demer and Scheld, which latter has always divided the sees of Liege and Cambray. The Mediomatrici were situate along the Mosel, about the city of Metz in Lorrain; above them, on the same river Rhine, were seated the Raurici, called also Rauraci, and Rauriaci, another antient German nation, who inhabited that part of Helvetia, or Switzerland, about Basil: their capital was Rauracum, or Augusta Rauracorum [y].

BETWEEN the heads of the Rhine and of the Danube, were seated the antient kingdoms of Vindelicia, whose capital was called Augusta Vindelicorum, now Ausburgh [z]; and below it, along the banks of the same river, those of Noricum and Pannonia, the former of which was divided into Noricum Ripense and Mediterraneum, and contained a great part of the provinces of Austria, Stiria, Carinthia, Tyrol, Bavaria, and some others of less note [a]; and the latter the kingdom of Hungary, divided into upper and lower, and extending from Illyricum to the Danube and the mountains Cætii, in the neighbourhood of Vindebona, now Vienna, the metropolis of Austria [b]. On the other side of the Danube, which was more properly called Germany, and Germania magna, besides Vindelici.

[y] See Mascov. l. iii. c. 5. [z] See vol. xv. p. 461. [a] Vol. xii. p. 429, note (C). & vol. xiii. p. 404, note (E). [b] Ibid. p. 405. sub not.

by others, who rather think, that they, with some others who obtained their liberty, and are by Pliny (4) called liberæ civitates, were excluded from that division (5). The other cities mentioned by that author were those of the Nervii, Suessones, Sylvanectes, and Leuci; those on the other hand of the Rhemi and Lingones in Gaul, that is, of the provinces of Rheims and Champaigne, he there calls civitates fœderatæ.

The Treviri, however, became in time the principal nation of Belgica prima.

(4) Nat. Hist. l. iv. (5) Vide Mascov. l. iii. c. 5.

ſides the Marcomans (D), whom we have mentioned above as more properly ſituate between the Rhine and it, were the Hermunduri, whoſe country ran northwards from it, and extended itſelf along the Hercynian mountains quite up to the river Sala. Theſe poſſeſſed, particularly, the country now called Miſnia, in Upper Saxony, though ſome make their territories to have extended much farther, and to have reached quite to, and even beyond, the kingdom of Bohemia. On the other ſide thoſe mountains was the abovementioned kingdom of Boiohemum, now Bohemia [c], once one of the ſeats of the Boii; and beyond them, north of the Danube, was another ſeat of the Marcomani, along the river Albis, now Elbe; from which they ſpread themſelves into Bohemia, and drove the Boii out of it, as we hinted a little higher: we have ſpoken of theſe in a former volume, to which we refer the reader [d]. The Quadi were ſituate next to Bohemia: their territories extended from the Danube to Moravia, and the northern part of Auſtria [e]; theſe are likewiſe comprehended under the antient name of Suevi, part of whom forced their way into Spain, and ſettled a kingdom there, as hinted under the laſt note. The Baſtarnæ were ſituate eaſtward of the Quadi, and parted from them by the Granna, now Gran, a river that falls into the Danube, and by the ridge of the Carpatian mountains, called from them Baſtarnicæ Alpes: their country made, indeed, part of the European Sarmatia, and ſo was out of the limits of Germania propria; but they antiently lived on this ſide the Danube, were concerned with the Marcomans, Quadi, Hermunduri, Suevi, and a number of other German nations, in the famed war againſt M. Antoninus [f], and are accounted of German extract by Pliny [g]; and it was not till the reign of Probus that they were tranſplanted over the Danube thither by that emperor, to repeople thoſe countries which were become defolute by the wars and peſtilence.

Baſtarnæ.

[c] Ibid. p. 413, note (F). [d] Ibid. p. 404, note (E). [e] Ibid. p. 448, note (S). [f] Ibid. p. 583, note (O). [g] Jul. Capitol. in vit. Marc. c. 22.

(D) Theſe, the Quadi, and ſome others we ſhall have occaſion to mention, were of that tribe of antient Germans known by the name of Suevi: they antiently poſſeſſed a conſiderable part of Germany, that is the greateſt part of it from the Rhine to the Elbe; but, in proceſs of time, ſome of them removed more northward, and ſettled along the Danube, whilſt another part went into Spain, and formed a kingdom there, as we ſhall ſhew in a ſubſequent chapter.

peſtilence. Theſe ſoon conformed to the Roman laws, and became one nation with the other inhabitants of that country [h]. We have formerly taken notice of that colony of them which was ſettled in Tharce by Probus [i]; but where the original ſeat of them was before their removal, is not eaſy to gueſs; it has been, for that reaſon, much queſtioned whether they were of German or Sarmatian extract: we, however, quoted Pliny in favour of the former opinion, who in another place makes them one of the five principal tribes of the German nation [l]. We may add to his evidence that of Strabo, who plainly diſtinguiſhes them from the Sarmatians; and that of Tacitus, who ranks them among the former [m]. We read of their aſſiſting Perſeus and Mithridates againſt the Romans [n], but after their conqueſt by the latter, we hear no more of them by that name; probably the remainder of them united with the Goths, and as for thoſe who ſtayed in their native country, if any ſuch there were, they were, in all likelihood, blended with thoſe Piecinigi, or Patzinicæ, which we find mentioned in the Byzantine and Poliſh hiſtory, and which Strabo and Tacitus mention in the place above quoted with the Baſtarnæ and ſome other German tribes [o].

BETWEEN thoſe nations we have ſeen ſeated along the other ſide of the Danube, and the Hercynian foreſt, were ſeveral other antient nations, of whom we know little more than their names, and about whoſe exact ſituation we are quite in the dark: ſuch as the Martingi, Burii, Borades, Burii. Lygii, or Logiones, and ſome others, who are placed by our geographers along the foreſt abovementioned, between the Danube and the Viſtula. The Burii are reckoned the ſame with the Borades, and are mentioned as aſſiſtants to the Marcomani in their war againſt M. Antoninus; and the Lygii, or Logiones, as aſſiſting Vibillius, king of the Hermunduri, againſt the haughty Vannius, king of the Suevi: and their bordering one upon another is collected from a paſſage of Pliny which places the latter between the Danube and the foreſt abovementioned [p], but with no ſufficient exactneſs to lead us to the right ſituation of either: only the Sileſian hiſtorians affirm, that the Lygii, and part of the Quadi, remained ſtill in their own original country [q]. The laſt we ſhall mention on this ſide the Hercynian foreſt, were the famed Rhœtii, now Griſons, who were ſeated on the Alps: their country, which was antiently called Weſtern Illyricum, was divided into Rhœtia prima, or propria, and ſecunda, and was then of a much larger extent, ſpreading itſelf towards Swabia, Bavaria, and Auſtria. This country and that of Noricum, and others, became a Roman province, and belonged to the kingdom of the Oſtrogoths in Italy; but upon the declenſion of it they fell under the dominion of the Franks, about which time the name of Bavarians firſt became noted in hiſtory [r].

[h] Nat. hiſt. l. iv. c. 28. [i] Vopiſcus. in vit. Probi, c. 18. [l] Vol. xv. p. 281. p. 309. Nat. hiſt. l. ii. c. 4. [m] Georg. l. iii. p. 306. Mor. Ger. c. 46. [n] Vide Plutarch. in vit. Æmil. Appian. de bell. Mithrid. p. 365. [o] See Lediard, vol. ii. add. xxx. p. 389. [p] H. N. l. iv. c. 25.

Rhœtii.

Suevi. On the other ſide of the Hercynian foreſt were the antient ſeats of the Suevi, whom we have ſhewn above to have been an old tribe of Germans (E), and ſpread themſelves from the Viſtula to the Elbe, and beyond, though they in time did, at leaſt a great part of them, either penetrate through that foreſt, or wind themſelves about it, and came and ſettled in the more pleaſant ſouthern parts of Europe, ſuch as Belgium, Gaul, and even Spain, as ſhall be ſeen in the ſequel. The moſt famous of theſe were the Longobardi, ſo called, according to ſome, on account of their wearing long beards; but, according to others, on account of their conſiſting of two nations, viz. the Bardi and Lingones; theſe dwelt along the river Elbe, and bordered ſouthward on the Chauci, mentioned a little higher, and both theſe were reduced by Tiberius, as we have ſhewn in a former volume [s]. But the Longobardi,

[q] Vide inter al. Hankium de major. Sileſior. c. 21. Maſcov. l. xi. §. 21. [r] See before, vol. xiii. p. 404, & ſeq. and notes. [s] Ibid. 447, (R).

(E) At leaſt we find them ſo ſtyled by Pliny, and other antient authors: but we muſt here remind our readers of what has been heretofore occaſionally obſerved with reſpect to thoſe authors, that they ſo often confound the Celtes and Scythians, that it is not eaſy to gueſs whether thoſe antient Suevi or Germans, whom they allow to be of Celtic extract, were really ſo, or of Scythian breed. But from the nearer likeneſs of manners, language, &c. to the latter, one would be more apt to think they derived their original from them. However, the truth ſeems to be, that both Celtes and Scythians were in all theſe parts ſo intermixed and blended together, eſpecially from the Rhine eaſtward and northward, that all thoſe antient Germans bid fair to be the offspring of that mixture, rather than of either Scythic or Celtic original properly ſo called.

gobardi, having paſſed the Danube, invaded and defeated the Heruli [t], did afterwards croſs the Alps, and ſettle in Italy, where they founded the kingdom of Lombardy [u], and, in proceſs of time, quite forgot their antient German, and adopted that of Italy [w]. The Burgundi are the next of note. Pliny affirms them likewiſe of German extract, and ranks them with the Vindili, Varini, Carini, Guttones and Ingevones, which laſt he makes to have been a mixed people, partly Cimbric, partly Teutonic, and partly Chauci [x]. It were labour loſt to enquire after their original ſeat (F), but it is plain they were, like their other neighbours, enticed to exchange it for a better; and, having penetrated firſt into Germany, where they aſſiſted Valentinian againſt the Alemani [y], they afterwards croſſed the Rhine, and ſettled in Gaul, where they founded a kingdom in that province which ſtill retains the name of Burgundia, as we ſhall ſhew in ſome of the ſubſequent chapters. The Semnones, likewiſe, left their old habitation, and ſettled about the Lionnois in Gaul: we find them ſeated about the Elbe, in Tiberius's time, and, in conjunction with the Hermunduri and other Germans, bravely ſtriving to obſtruct his croſſing that river [z]; but at what time they paſſed from thence into Gaul, is not eaſy to gueſs: but they fell upon one of the moſt fruitful parts of that kingdom, and there grew ſo rich and conſiderable, that they are thought to have been called Sennones on that very account, it being an old Celtic word, which ſignifies opulent and venerable (G), as we have had occaſion to ſhew in the Burgundi.

Semnone.

[t] See before, vol. xvi. p. 36. [u] Ibid. 320. [w] Vide Giannon. hiſt. Neapol. p. 294. Maſcov. l. xv. c. 14. [x] Ubi ſupra, l. iv. c. 28. [y] Marcellin. l. xxviii. c. 5. [z] Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 106.

(F) Some have imagined the Burgundi and Burgundiones to have been two different people, but without any probability, ſince they are mentioned by ſome antient authors as the ſame nation, though under thoſe two different names; and that is, Marcellinus calls them Burgundi, whom St. Jerom and Oroſius call Burgundiones.

(G) Some have, indeed, ſought the etymon of this name from the Greek, and think they were ſo called from the word ξένος, ſtranger, new-comer; on account of their being ſome of the laſt German nations that came over the Rhine into Gaul (8). Accordingly, a Roman hiſtorian tells us (9), that they were the very

(8) Vide Flacc. feſt. (9) Tit. Liv. hiſtor. l. v. c. 35.

hiſtory of the Gauls [a]. Theſe three were the moſt noted nations on the other ſide the Hercynian foreſt, to which we ſhall only add the names of ſome others, though ſcarcely known to us by any thing elſe: ſuch are the Aviones, Reudigni, Eudoles, and Swardones, whom we find placed between the Elbe and the Suevus, or Viader, on the north of the Longobardi; the Rugii, Lemnovii, Heruli, Gothones, or Gothini, the Sidui Carini, between the laſt-mentioned river and the Viſtula: as for the Angli, Saxi, Goths, Hunns, &c. they will be ſpoken of in ſome of the following chapters. But before we paſs further, we muſt not omit the country of the Æſtii, an antient tribe of the Suevi, who inhabited along the coaſts of the eaſt ſea (H), ſo famed for the great plenty of Æſtii, and their amber trade.

[a] See before, p. 455.

very laſt of all the ſtrangers that came thither. Servius, indeed, thinks they were at firſt called ξένας, and afterwards ξένωνας, becauſe they received Bacchus into their country.

But if we muſt have recourſe to the Greek, would not the word Σεμνὸς afford us a better etymon, as it is more like the name of the antient Semnones than that of Senonas or Xenonas? We read of Semna myſteria, and Semnai theai, in which the word implies ſomething venerable or awful, and might be either taken up by the Semnonic tribe, or given them by their neighbours, either on account of their opulence, or the great ſway they bore above the reſt, all which doth well agree with their hiſtory. But we would rather chuſe to ſtick to the Celtic, which doth ſtill more cloſely ſquare to it than to the Greek, which, how like ſoever to it in moſt things, doth yet ſometimes deviate from the original deſign and meaning, eſpecially as to ſuch appellatives as this we are upon: and if we obſerve, that in ſeveral provinces of Gaul, even to this day, the natives never pronounce an m before an n, but like a nn, we may perhaps find out the moſt probable etymon for the word ſenex, ſenatus, ſenator, ſenior, ſenioratio, ſeneſchal, carta ſenica, and many others of the like import, in which the mn was gradually abſorbed into nn, and this laſt ſoftened into a ſingle one.

(H) So called, in all probability, from their inhabiting thoſe coaſts of the eaſt ſea, containing part of Pruſſia, Courland, and Livonia. Theſe, as well as their neighbours the Gothini, were not unknown to Tacitus, who has given us a ſuccinct deſcription of their religion, cuſtoms, and language; in all which they differed ſo little from the Celtes, or old Gauls, that we may take it as a further proof, that the antient Germans and they were but diſtinct branches of the ſame nation, as we obſerved at the beginning of amber that was found there, eſpecially along thoſe of Pruſſia, and for the vaſt quantity that was fetched from thence both by the Greeks and Romans, of which we find particular mention in moſt antient authors, ſuch as Herodotus [b], Diodorus Siculus [c], Pytheas Maſſilienſis, as quoted by Pliny [d], but eſpecially by Tacitus [e], who has given us a very curious deſcription of it, as well as of theſe Æſtii, who gathered and ſold it to them. Theſe, he ſays, worſhipped the mother of the gods, and placed ſuch confidence in her ſafeguard, that they ſcarcely knew the uſe of iron weapons, or any other ſort but cudgels. They were more induſtrious than the reſt of the Germans in cultivating their corn and other fields, and dived into the ſeas and rivers for amber, which is a commodity peculiar to them, and which was of little uſe to them, except to ſell it to ſtrangers, rough and unwrought, as they gathered it. He then goes on in deſcribing the nature of that wonderful gum, according to the notion they then had of it, which we need not here dwell upon, but from which, as well as from what other antient authors have writ of it, we may infer, that it was in very high eſteem in thoſe days. In Nero's reign, by which time the Romans had wholly ſet aſide the thoughts of conquering Germany, one of that emperor's favourites perſuaded him to ſend thither a kind of embaſſy to buy it there upon the ſpot, and at the firſt hand [f]. The thing was accordingly done, and the Roman knight, who was at the head of this expedition, ſetting out from Carnuntum, a fortreſs on the banks of the Danube (I), arrived at the place, ning of this and the laſt chapter. What is ſtill more obſervable is, that our author tells us, that their language differed but little from the old Britiſh, that is, from the old Celtic or Gomerian; the Britons, who were a branch of theſe, or rather the ſame nation, under a different name, that was given them on account of their painting their bodies, the word Brit, in the old Celtic, ſignifying the ſame as Pict or painted, and both Britons and Gomerians retaining the ſame tongue not only then, but even to this day, as we have had frequent occaſion to obſerve, both in the laſt chapter, and in the hiſtory of the antient Celtes (10).

[b] L. iii. c. 15. [c] Bibl. l. v. [d] N. H. l. xxxvii.
[e] Mor. Germ. c. 45. [f] See Pliny nat. hiſt. l. xxxvii. c. 3.

(I) Carnuntum was a fortreſs in Upper Pannonia, on the ſame ſide with Vienna, and was a kind of boundary between the frontiers and met with a kind reception from the Æſtii, from whom he bought and brought away, according to Solinus [g], 13000 pounds weight of that commodity, which was deſigned, it ſeems, by one of their kings, as a preſent to the emperor; and among it there was a piece which muſt have been of very great value, if it be true, what another author affirms, that it weighed alone thirteen pounds [h]. We find in Caſſiodorus, a letter ſent by Theodoric, king of the Goths, to the Æſtii, wherein he thanks them for a noble parcel they had ſent to him of the ſame precious drug [i], and wherein he promiſes them his friendſhip, which, it ſeems, they were endeavouring to obtain by this embaſſy, and valuable preſent. By this letter it ſhould ſeem, that the inhabitants were wholly ignorant whence it came, and how it was formed; for ſo their embaſſadors told that monarch; and added, that the ſea threw it upon their coaſts. Theſe Æſtii were ſtill famed among other German nations on the eaſt ſea, in the time of Charles the great [k]. We read of the Scirri, Hirri, Galindi, and Sudeni, in Ptolemy, which ſome have endeavoured to prove were to be reckoned among the Æſtii [l], or antient inhabitants of Pruſſia, but with very little likelihood: as for the name of Pruſſia, it is of much more recent date, as ſhall be ſeen in the modern part of this work. All that needs be added, with reſpect to the Æſtii, is, that they were at length conquered, with ſome other nations, by Ermanaric, king of the Goths [m].

(10) See before, p. 415, & ſeq. and vol. v. p. 410.

On

[g] Polyhiſt. c. 33. [h] Pliny ubi ſupra. [i] Varia, l. v. epiſt. 2. [k] Eginhard. in vit. Carol. Mag. c. 12. [l] Vide Hartknok. Pruſ. A. & M. part 1. c. 1. [m] Jornand. hiſt. Goth. l. iv.

tiers of the Germans and Pannonians (11). If, therefore, this embaſſy ſet out from thence, as our author affirms, and it be very unlikely they ſhould ſail up the Danube, and down the Rhine, in order to coaſt it round to the Pruſſian coaſts; it may be inferred, that the Hercynian foreſt muſt have had ſome paſſage cut acroſs, for them to go thither by land: and as we are told they paſſed through the country of the Guthiones, or Gothini, in their way thither, we may conclude it probable, that they ſailed down the Viſtula, at the very mouth of which were the Electridæ inſulæ, or Amber iſlands, ſo called from that commodity being either gathered upon thoſe coaſts, or brought thither as to a mart by the Æſtii.

(11) Vide itiner. Ant. Plin. l. iv. c. 12.

On this ſide the Æſtii, and, as is ſuppoſed, near the mouth of the Viſtula, now Weychſel, were the Gepidæ; and farther north, on the coaſts of the eaſt ſea, between theſe and the Æſtii, were the Chaiboni. It is not eaſy to determine whether theſe two were of German, Scythic, or Gothic extract: the Gepidæ are indeed affirmed to be Germans by ſome antient authors [n]; but we have had frequent occaſion to obſerve, that they frequently confound thoſe nations, ſo that we cannot readily depend upon them: were we allowed to offer a conjecture of our own, we ſhould rather think them of Celtic origin. We have already obſerved, in the Gauliſh hiſtory, that the Celtes had ſpread themſelves towards the fartheſt parts of the north, as the Cimbrians in the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, and the Teutones (K) in the iſlands adjacent: and Gepidæ, their extract, and kingdom.

[n] Vide Procop. de bell. Vind. l. i. c. 2. & Maſcov. l. x. c. 6. l. xi. c. 21.

(K) We have already hinted ſome conjectures concerning the etymon of that word, at the entrance of this chapter, and in a former volume, in ſpeaking of the Titans. The old Celtes boaſted themſelves ſprung from the god Theutat, or Mercury, whom Cæſar calls Dis (12), the name of that deity after his death, or apotheoſis, as we ſhewed in the laſt chapter, and Tacitus Twiſton (13); and upon that account did, in all probability, take the name of Teutates from him, which, by length of time, variety of dialects, and of hands, through which it paſſed, diverſified itſelf into Teutoni, Teutones, Teutonarii, Teutobodiaci, Teuctoſagi, Tauriſci, Tautantii, Teudeſci, and Teutcſhen, which two laſt names they ſtill retain in Germany and Italy.

That this name is very antient, and common to all the Celtes, we have ſhewn in the parts of their hiſtory above quoted, and we ſhall beg leave to add a pregnant teſtimony of it, which is as follows: Servius obſerves, that the city of Piſa had received its name from Piſus, a king of the Celtes, who founded it; and preſently after, upon the authority of Cato adds, that the Teutones were ſettled in that country long before the Hetruſci made themſelves maſters of it. The city itſelf, ſays he, was called Teuta, and the inhabitants Theutas (14).

As to the Tectoſagi, we find a tribe of them in the neighbourhood of Thouloufe in old Gaul, who were ſurnamed Volſci, of whom we ſpoke in the laſt chapter. Cæſar and Strabo mention another tribe, who were ſeated about the Hercynian foreſt, and make and, indeed, it seems as if those antient Gomerians were either elbowed by new-comers, farther and farther northwards, as our Welsh were here in England; or, if we suppose them to have been Celtic colonies, sent afterwards in search of new habitations, as they were often forced to do for want of room, that they found the more temperate parts already so well inhabited, that they were forced to take up with such climates as they found still uninhabited by reason of their extreme coldness. In either case the Cimbrians, Teutones, Gepidæ, Chaiboni, and Æstii, being found all in one line, and under the same climate, may, probably enough, have been all of the same extract, considering the conformity of their manners, language, &c. but we only offer this as a conjecture. Of the Chaiboni, indeed, we know but little, except what we read of their invading Gaul in the time of Diocletian[o], and of their being totally routed by Constantine the great [p]. The Gepidæ are famed in history for having reared themselves into an early kingdom, and extending their territories into Pannonia, and taking the famed city of Sirmium, or Sirmish, from the emperor Marcian (L);

(12) Comm. l. vi. c. 18. (13) German. c. 2. (14) Ad Æneid. x. Vide & Cluver. Ital. antiq. c. 7.

as

[o] Cl. Mamertin. panegyr. l. i. c. 4, & 5. [p] Nazar. int. panegyr. vet. ix. c. 18.

make them to be descended from the Gaulish (15). We find the Teutones and Teutonarii spread far and wide about the Baltic, and Scandinavia had scarcely any other inhabitants but Teutones, if we may believe Pliny and Mela (16). Among the Gallogreeks, or Galatians, we find two tribes, one of which had the name of Tectosagi, and the other Teutobodiaci, or Tolstobogi (17). The name of Tauriscі can hardly come from any other than Thaut-rich, the kingdom of Thaut, and that of Thaulantii from Thaut-lant, the land of Thaut. All these, put together, sufficiently shew that they were originally, or boasted themselves as such, descendents or subjects of Theut, or Mercury, once the famed monarch of the greatest part of Europe (18).

(L) It seems that emperor had suppressed the annual pension which he had engaged to pay to them; upon which, they, under the conduct of their king Ardaric, who had already conquered Dacia, passed the Danube, and added some part of Pannonia to their kingdom. As for Sirmium, it was the metropolis of Lower Pannonia; and though it was afterwards destroyed by lightning (19), and since then reduced to a mere village by the Turks, yet

it

(15) Comm. l. vi. c. 24. Geogr. l. xii. (16) N. H. l. iv. c. 14. De situ, l. iii. c. 3. Vide & Ptolem. l. ii. c. 2. (17) Strabo ubi supra. (18) See before, vol. v. p. 430, & seq. (19) See vol. xiii. p. 452.

as likewiſe for their wars with the Goths, Burgundians, and eſpecially the Romans [q], for their invaſion of Germany and Belgia, and for the terrible havock they made in both, in conjunction with the Quadi, Vandals, and other northern nations, of which St. Jerom gives us a particular and dreadful account [r], as may be ſeen by the abſtract in the margin (M). They kept themſelves in poſſeſſion of all Dacia, till the emperor Juſtin's reign, when, being left in the lurch by that prince, and Cunemund, their laſt king, being overthrown and killed by Alboin, king of the Longobards, there was a final end put to their kingdom. The Abares, who were allied with Alboin, took poſſeſſion of Dacia, and the whole Gepidæan nation was ſo thoroughly diſperſed [s], as never to recover itſelf again. Some of them we find accompanying that conqueror's expedition into Italy [t], and the reſt went and refuged themſelves where they could (N), as we ſhall ſee in a ſubſequent chapter.

The end of it, and them.

THUS much ſhall ſerve for the names and ſituation of the antient Germans, according to their different tribes and nations

[q] See vol. xv. p. 282. [r] Epiſt. ad Ager. de monogam. ep. 92. [s] Excerpt. ex Menand. [t] Vide Paul. Diac. hiſt. Longobard. l. ii. c. 26.

it was celebrated heretofore for two Arian councils held in it under Conſtantius, viz. an. 351, and 357, and for being the birthplace of Probus (20).

(M) Theſe barbarians broke down, like an inundation, not only on Upper and Lower Germany, but into Gaul likewiſe, and as far as even Spain. In the former they deſtroyed, among other cities, thoſe of Straſburgh, Spire, Worms, and Mentz; and in Belgia thoſe of Rheims, Amiens, Tournay, Arras, and Terouane; and carried the inhabitants captive into Germany. They likewiſe ravaged, in a woful manner, the provinces of Aquitania, Lugdunenſis, and Narbonenſis, and carried off an immenſe plunder. The reſt the reader may find in the letter above quoted.

(N) It is ſuppoſed, that the poor remains of the Gepidæ took refuge under the emperor Juſtinian, and that he took, upon that account, the title of Gepidicus, which we find afterwards added to the imperial ones, as appears by the preamble of ſome of his ſucceſſors letters, eſpecially that of Maurice, who ſtiles himſelf there, Alemanicus, Gothicus, Anticus, Vandalicus, Herulicus, Gepidicus, Africanus, &c. (21).

As

(20) See vol. xv. p. 611. (21) See Maſcov. l. xiv. c. 3, & 24.

tions at the time of the Romans firſt invaſion of them, as far as a ſubject ſo involved in darkneſs and confuſion can be brought into any tolerable light and order. In Auguſtus's reign it was divided into Germania Prima and Secunda, that is, Upper and Lower, as we hinted above, and guarded by eight legions of Roman forces, which were, according to cuſtom, employed in making high roads, new fortifications, and other uſeful works, whenever they were not engaged in the field [u]. This diviſion ſeems to have continued till about the time of the emperor Jovinus, when, though the conſtitution ſtill ſubſiſted with regard to Germania Prima, yet it was then, in all probability, loſt, with reſpect to Germania Secunda, which was by that time become, in a great meaſure, ſubject to the Franks: for in the Notitia Imperii, which is thought to have been written then about, though the ſtate of Belgica Prima and Secunda be there ſtill entire, yet there is no farther mention of Germania Secunda.

Germany, how divided.

As for the country of Germany itſelf, we have ſuch a dreadful account given us of it, both by Cæſar and Tacitus [w], even of thoſe parts of it which lie under a more temperate climate, that one would think it almoſt incredible, that ſuch a brave nation as that would have been contented to live in it, when they wanted neither ſtrength nor courage to have broken their way into others, more pleaſant and fruitful. Nor would one be able to know the worſt parts of it, as they are now, by the deſcription they give us of the beſt. According to them, it was barren, uncultivated, and frightful all over; and even its variety of ſoil and climate added

The natural clime, and produce.

[u] Bucher. Belg. Rom. l. c 12, 17, & 18. [w] M. Germ. c. 2. Comment. l. iii. c. 1.

As for the unfortunate Cunemund, the uſe which Alboin made of his body was, to make a drinking-cup of his ſcull, a cuſtom deſcended to them from their barbarous anceſtors, of which we have had occaſion to ſpeak, in the hiſtory of the Celtes and Scythians, and which, it appears by this, was ſtill rife among a vaſt many nations of their deſcendents, ſo many ages after their embracing chriſtianity. As to the Gepidæ, we have nothing to add, concerning them, but that they profeſſed Arianiſm in common with the Goths (22), as will be ſeen in ſome of the following chapters.

(22) Procop. bell. Vandal. l. i. c. 2.

added to the horror of it from the dreadful foreſts, ſtinking and unwholſome bogs, the inclemency of its winds, dampneſs of its ſeas, lakes, and rivers, and harſhneſs of its ſoil. But as, on the one hand, we muſt allow for exaggeration in hiſtorians, who plainly ſought in every thing to magnify their own courage and proweſs, by the difficulties and hardſhips they met with in the conqueſts of thoſe countries and nations; ſo we muſt grant, on the other, that the Romans proved the means of cultivating thoſe, till then, barren and inhoſpitable territories, by cutting down great numbers of foreſts, draining of wet and marſhy grounds, and other ſuch-like improvements as they were able to admit of. So that we need not now tell our readers, that this pretended barrenneſs and unhealthineſs was rather owing to the ſupineneſs of the inhabitants, than to any defect in its ſoil or climate, ſince we find it now capable of bearing all ſorts of grain, vines, fruit, and even foreign plants, in great abundance, and due maturity. And thus far may be owned, that the coming of the Romans into Germany, as well as into Gaul, contributed much to the fertiliſing and enriching of thoſe two countries, which, till then, had been wholly neglected by both nations, who, as we hinted in the laſt chapter, thought this, and every occupation, beſides the martial trade, too much below their fierce and warlike genius. We are told, in particular, that the emperor Probus was the firſt who permitted vines to be brought into Gaul and Germany, and to be planted along the Rhine and Moſel, and other parts [x] (O).

Vines, when firſt brought thither.

AMONG thoſe many woods and foreſts with which this country abounded, perhaps, more than any other on this ſide the Rhine, was that famed one called the Hercynian, and, by the Greeks, Orcinian foreſt, the longeſt and thickeſt Foreſts.

[x] Vopiſc. in vit. Prob. c. 18.

(O) An antient author compares this action of his to that of Hannibal, who cauſed olive-trees to be planted in Africa, in order to furniſh the ſoldiers with profitable employments in time of peace (23). But if Probus knew any thing of that natural propenſity which the German nation had to ſtrong liquors, one would be apt to think he had ſomething more in his view than the bare finding out proper employment for them, when he introduced the juice of the grape among them (24).

(23) Aur. Vict. in Cæſ. c. 37. (24) See the laſt chapter, p. 535.

eſt in Europe, and reckoned by Julius Cæſar to have extended ſixty days journey in length, and nine in breadth. We have given an account of it in a former volume, to which we refer [y]: all that we need to add is, that not only this, but all the foreſts, woods, and groves, in Germany, even the trees, boughs, and leaves of it, were reckoned ſacred; and this is the reaſon why the antient Germans made it a piece of their religion not to cut them down, unleſs it be ſome branches of the oak, and ſome other trees which they carried with them, on particular ſolemnities [z]; but ſince their conqueſt by the Romans, a good many were cut down, partly for conveniency, and partly out of a diſlike of thoſe ſuperſtitious and bloody rites, which were performed in them. Many more were deſtroyed, ſince their embracing of chriſtianity, upon the ſame account, and ſome are yet ſtill remaining; and, amongſt others, one which is known by the name of the black foreſt: the Bacenian is another famed one, which parted the Suevi from the Cheruſci, by ſome ſuppoſed to be that of Thuringia, and by others the black foreſt laſt mentioned. The Cæſian foreſt, or Cæſia Sylva, was likewiſe very famous: ſome ſuppoſe it to have likewiſe been a remnant of the Hercynian, and part of it remains ſtill in the dutchies of Cleves and Weſtphalia. Tacitus tells us of a famous one dedicated to Hercules, and called, from him, the Herculean foreſt [a]; but it doth not appear that they had, as yet, adopted either that, or any other Roman deities: ſo that if there was any ſuch foreſt of that name, it muſt have been called ſo upon ſome other account than a religious one. For, as we have obſerved in the laſt chapter, the Germans made a much longer ſtand againſt the Roman polytheiſm than the Gauls [b].

Rivers. RIVERS of note they had in abundance, of which we ſhall only mention the moſt conſiderable ones, and what is moſt remarkable in them. At the head of theſe may juſtly be

Danube. placed the Danube, now Iſter, by far the largeſt in Europe. It has its riſe in Swabia, and flowing through that province, and thoſe of Bavaria, Auſtria, Hungary, Servia, Bulgaria, Moldavia, Beſſerabia, and part of Tartary, and receiving about ſixty other rivers in its courſe, falls into the Euxine or Black Sea, in two arms. It was once the boundary between Sarmatia

[y] Vol xiii. p. 449, (T). 533, (T).

[z] Vide Claudian. in laud. Stilic. Lucan. l. iii. ver. 429. Agathias hiſt. l. i. Keyzler. antiq. ſeptentr. c. 4. § 7.

[a] L. ii. c. 12.

[b] See before, p. 428.

Sarmatia and Germany, but became afterwards ſubject to the Romans to its very ſource, under the emperor Trajan (P).

The Rhine, another famous river, which antiently divided Germany from Gaul, and ſprings from the Rhœtian Alps in the weſtern borders of Switzerland, and northern of the Griſons: as it riſes from two ſprings, which unite their waves near Chur, now Coire; ſo it divided itſelf into two ſtreams, one of which falls into the Maeſe, and the other into the German ocean: upon both accounts, perhaps, it is called, by Virgil, Rhenus bicornis, or bicorniger. It has now no paſſage into that ocean, but with the Maeſe above-mentioned, below Briel, unleſs that branch of the one part of it called the Yſſel, which empties itſelf into the Zuyder-Zee, may be ſaid to do it [c]. This mouth, which was antiently known to the Romans by the name of Flevum, and ſtill retains that of Vlie, or Flie, had a ſtrong caſtle built by it, to guard the paſſage out of the Zuyder, or ſouth, into the north ſea. As for the Rhine, it became afterwards a barrier between the Romans and the Germans, upon the overthrow of Varus by the latter, who unwiſely ſpent their time in deſtroying the fortreſſes of the former along that river, inſtead of purſuing the advantage of that ſignal victory; ſo that they only ſhortened the extent of the Roman territories, which before reached as far as the Weſer, if not beyond [d]. The ſame river did likewiſe part the Batavi from the other Germans, as has been formerly hinted [e]. Julius Cæſar, in one of his German triumphs, cauſed, among other pageantic figures, that of the Rhine to be carried; in imitation of which, it is judiciouſly obſerved, that his ſucceſſors did oftener triumph over, than conquer it [f]. Rhine.

The Viſtula, now Weichſel, was another conſiderable river, which divided Germany from the European Sarmatia, whence the latter was called Germania Tranſviſtulana. It had its riſe in the Carpatian mountains Viſtula.

in

[c] See Maſcov. German. & Lediard. ibid. ſub Ind. [d] See Florus, l. v. [e] Vol. xv. p. 302. [f] Florus, l. v. c. 2.

(P) We are told, that he eſtabliſhed at Zarmigeſothuſa, the capital of Sarmatia, the famed colony called Ulpia Trajana, having laid a bridge over the Danube, as appears from ſeveral antient medals, and, particularly, by the column erected in honour of him, and the explanation given us of it by the authors quoted in the margin (25).

(25) See Gruter's inſcriptions. Ciacon. Bellov. & Fabret.

in Higher Silesia, and, crossing the Hercynian forest, disembogued itself, by three streams, into the Baltic sea, not far from Dantzic. The Drave, or Draw, springs from the Alps in the Tyrolese, and, dividing Upper and Lower Hungary from Sclavonia, falls into the Danube near Esseck. The Moraw. Moraw rises in the confines of Bohemia, divides Moravia into two parts, and falls into the Danube not far from Vienna.
Nab. The Nab, in Nortgow, hath its source near that of the Main, and falls into the Danube a little above Ratisbon. The Neckar. Neckar, in Suabia, rises from the black forest, not far from the Danube, but takes a different course, and falls into the Regen. Rhine. Regen rises in Nortgow, on the borders of Bohemia, and empties itself into the Danube at Ratisbon, thence called Veser. Regenspurgh. The Veser, antiently Visurgis, descends from Franconia, and, passing by Bremen, falls into the German
Elb. ocean between the mouths of the Elbe and Ems. The former of these, called by the Romans Albus, and by the Germans Elve, Elbe, and now Elb, is a very large and considerable one, and hath its spring in the mountains called the Giant Mountains, Montes Heroum, in Silesia, on the confines of Bohemia, and, passing through it and Upper and Lower Saxony, falls into the above-mentioned sea at Ritzbuttel, twenty leagues below Hamburgh. The latter, viz.
Ems. Ems, antiently Amisia, rises in the bishoprick of Paderborn, and, passing by Embden, the metropolis of East Friezland, and through the bay of Dullert, falls into the same ocean a little above the mouth of the Visurgis, or Lippe. Veser. The Luppia, now Lippe, and Isala, or Yssel, fall, the one into the Rhine, below Cologn, and divided the Bructeri and Marsi from the Usipii; and the other into the Fossa Drusiana. The rest, being of less note, we shall pass by.

CITIES of any consideration the Germans did not begin to build till after the coming in of the Romans, but were divided into cantons and districts, like the Gauls, and lived in villages like them: even those famous large ones they now have, were either most of them built by the Romans, or inlarged, beautified, and enfranchised by them (Q). Such Cologn. were the city of Cologn, of which we have given an account

(Q) These new colonies were, it seems, endowed with most of the privileges of the city of Rome; and Cologn, we are told (26), was one of them.

(26) Paul. Diac. de cens. l. viii.

count in a former volume [g], and of its being called Agrippina. It was formerly called Colonia Ubiorum, and was their metropolis. It is commodiouſly ſituated on the Rhine, and in the circle of the lower Rhine, and is now the metropolis of the archbiſhopric of that name, an imperial city, and a famed univerſity. Colonia Trajana, another antient Roman colony, below the former, by ſome thought to be the preſent Keyſerſwaert. Colonia Ulpia, now Cleves, the capital of Cleveland in Lower Germany, ſuppoſed to have been built by Julius Cæſar, as well as that of Bonn, antiently Bonna Julia, ſituate above Cologn, and on the ſame river. This laſt is now the reſidence of the electors of Cologn. Auſburgh, i. e. Auguſtus-burgh, antiently called Auguſta Vindelicorum [h], now the capital of Suabia; this is likewiſe an imperial city, very populous and trading, ſituate on the Lech, not far from the Danube, and famed, among other things, for the Auguſtan confeſſion, or confeſſion of Auſburg, which is that of the Lutherans. Argentoratum, now Straſburgh in Alſatia, the antient capital of the Trebochi on the Rhine, is reckoned one of the antienteſt cities in Germany (R), and is now famed for its magnificent cathedral, and Auſburgh.

Strasburgh.

[g] Vol. xiv. p. 147.

[h] Vol. xiii. p. 404, & ſeq. (E).

(R) And well it may, if what ſome German antiquaries pretend be true, that it was built 33 years before Abraham. But it will be time enough to believe it when they give us ſome further proofs of it than they have hitherto.

This place, we are told, was chiefly famed, in antient times, for a living well, or ſpring, which was uſed for the waſhing and purifying of the victims which were offered up by their prieſts, and was from thence called Blotkeda, and Blotabrum, from the antient word blot, which ſignifies a bloody ſacrifice. Hence ſome infer, that human victims were thrown alive into the well; others, that they were firſt daſhed to death againſt the ſtones, and then flung into it (27). This well was, after the converſion of the Germans to chriſtianity, incloſed with a wall, and conſecrated, to ſerve for a baptiſmal font; and the waters of it became ſo famous, for ſome miraculous power attributed to them, that they were fetched or reſorted to from all parts: but ſince the reformation it hath been opened, for common uſe (28).

(27) Vide Keyzler. antiq. ſept. in fin. c. 3. (28) Vide Of. Schæd. deſcr. templ. argent. 1617. p. 35.

and the ſpire and curious clock of it, of which we ſhall ſay ſomething more in the ſequel; but, above all, for a living well, incloſed in that church, which was originally dedicated to ſuperſtitious and heatheniſh uſes, ſuch as we have mentioned in the laſt note. Triers, another antient city of Lower Germany, ſaid to have been built by Trebeſas, the brother of Ninus, 1496 years before Chriſt, and made a Roman colony in the time of Auguſtus. It became afterwards the moſt famed city of Gallia Belgica, and was, for ſome time, the ſeat of the weſtern empire, in the reign of Conſtantius [i]. Here Valentinian triumphed, in a magnificent manner, over the Alemani [k]. Triers had been formerly the ſeat of the Gallic perfects, or of the præfectura Galliarum [l], and obtained the right of coinage from the Romans [m]; at preſent it is only the metropolis of the eccleſiaſtic electorate of that name, though the biſhops of it were formerly ſtyled primate of thoſe of Gaul, on account of its having been once the ſeat of the prefects of it, which was afterwards removed to Arles, on occaſion of the former being deſtroyed by the Franks [n]. Ratiſbon, in the circle of Bavaria, ſaid to have been firſt built by Tiberius, and now famous for the diet of the empire being held there. Mentz, now famous for the invention of printing by John Fuſt, alias Fauſtus, a gentleman of that city [o], and for being the reſidence of one of the eccleſiaſtic electors, in the lower circle of the Rhine, and ſituate on the banks of it; was formerly inlarged and fortified by Druſus, with ſeveral others on that river; ſuch as Bonn Andernach, and many others on the ſame river, as well as upon the Maeſe, Elbe, and Weſer. He built, likewiſe, bridges over them, eſpecially at Mentz and Bonn, and kept a fleet, for the ſecurity of thoſe parts [p]: near the former of theſe was erected a monument, in form of a funeral pile, in memory of him, by thoſe legions which he had there commanded, ſome remains of which are ſtill to be ſeen, and are mentioned by ſeveral antient and modern authors [q], and deſcribed by Hutichius [r]. It is known by the name

Triers.

Ratisbon.

Mentz.

[i] Vide Cod. Theodoſ. & epiſt. ad pop. Alex. ap. Socrat. l. ii. c. 2. [k] Auſon. in laud. Moſel. v. 420. Vide Maſcov. l. vii. c. 5. [l] See Maſcov's liſt of them, l. v. c. 29. [m] Pollio ap. eund. [n] See Pagi annal. ad an. 332. ap. Maſcov. l. vi. c. 32. [o] Vide Malincrot & Palmer hiſt. typogr. [p] Flor l. iv. c. ult. [q] Dio, Sueton. in Claud. Otto Frig. chron. Serrar. rer. Mogunt. [r] Collect. antiq.

name of Eichelſtein, and ſtands in the now citadel-yard of the city above-named; but that this was the ſame that was erected for that prince, we muſt depend wholly upon tradition, as we muſt for a vaſt number of other ſuch ſtructures, with which this country abounds, but which retain neither inſcriptions nor any other indices, by which they may be fixed to their original deſign. As we metioned theſe cities only on account of their being either built, fortified, or celebrated by the Romans, we ſhall not take upon ourſelves to go any farther with the reſt, becauſe we confine our geography to the antient, and not to the modern Germany, which latter is too well known to our readers, to need our expatiating upon it.

SECT. II.

Of the religion, government, laws, and policy, of the antient Germans.

THIS ſubject hath been already ſo copiouſly handled in the laſt chapter, as it is ſo naturally knit and interwoven with it, that we hope we may ſave ourſelves the pains of a needleſs repetition. The Gauls and Germans, as nearly allied to each other originally, received their religion, laws, and cuſtoms, from the ſame hand, and both retained them, ſome few particulars excepted, during a long ſeries of ages, with an invincible tenaciouſneſs; and we have had occaſion to obſerve, that the latter continued much longer inflexible againſt introducing the Roman ſuperſtition, than the former: ſo that, with regard to their antient religion, they exactly agreed, in worſhipping the ſame ſupreme deity, under the name of Eſus, or Heſus, falſly ſaid, by Roman authors, to have been Mars, or Mercury. They worſhipped him under the emblem of an oak, conſecrated that tree more peculiarly to him, and had a great veneration not only for the tree itſelf, but for its leaves and fruit, eſpecially the miſleto, which they call, to this day, by the old name of guthyl, or gutheyl, and aſcribe extraordinary virtues to it, eſpecially in epileptic diſeaſes [a] (A). Their method of, and time for, gathering it,

The religion of the antient Germans almoſt the ſame with that of the Gauls.

[a] Vide Pliny, N. H. l. xvi. c. 44. Vide Cluver. Germ. Keyzler. ant. ſept. diſſert. de viſco paſſ. Colebatch and Douglas on the miſleto, & al.

(A) This name doth in the old German ſignify good heal, or good healer, as doth that of miſtella, or rather miſtel dha, in the Celtic;

was the same which was observed by the Gauls [b]. They held, like them, all other trees, likewise, as sacred, though not in the same degree with the oak; all woods, forests, and deserts, as well as groves, lakes, rivers, fountains, &c. in high veneration. The druids had the sole care and direction in all religious, and the greatest sway and authority in civil matters; only it may be here observed, that though both nations held some sort of women, whom they looked upon as propheteſſes, in great esteem; so the Germans seem to have exceeded the Gauls in this kind of superstition, and to have shewn and retained a much greater fondness and veneration for their pretended oracles (B). In other things they were, as far as can be

[b] See before, p. 33z, note (H).

Celtic; though some question whether the word mistel be of Celtic extract. Hence, that which we formerly mentioned out of Pliny, that they called it by a name which signified all heal. The inhabitants of some parts of Upper Germany, who still retain a great number of antient heathenish superstitions, are affirmed to retain the old druidish custom of rambling about, at certain seasons, from town to town, and from house to house, in great troops, rapping at every door and window with hammers, and crying out gutheyl, gutheyl, alluding to that verse falsly ascribed to Ovid,

Ad viscum druides, druides clamare solebant:

In some other parts, especially in Alsace, they give it the name of marentaken, or the bush or shrub of spectres; probably from those magical virtues which were attributed to it, not only by the Germans and Gauls, but much more by the more northern nations; concerning which, the reader may see some extravagant instances in the authors quoted in the margin (1). Among other virtues they attributed to it, that of driving off all shafts and offensive weapons from the person that wore it, or of effectually directing against the person or beast they intended to shoot, was so rife, that they never went even a hunting without it (2).

(B) It is not easy to guess whence this high esteem for those female soothsayers had its rise; but most antient authors agree, that the Germans never undertook any thing of importance without consulting them, and would even forbear fighting an enemy, let the advantage appear ever so great on their side, if these women be gathered from Cæſar and Tacitus, ſubject to, and obliged to receive their directions, like the Gauls, from that grand druid, who, as we hinted in the laſt chapter, had his reſidence in England, or ſome one of the Britiſh iſles. If there was any men diſapproved of it (3). They ſeem to have derived this cuſtom from the Celtes and Cimmerians, their anceſtors, who, as we have formerly obſerved, looked upon them as inſpired (4); and we have likewiſe mentioned ſome of them, who are reported to have foretold ſome very ſtrange events to ſome of the Roman emperors (5), enough to raiſe their reputation, not only among their own people, but likewiſe among the Romans and Greeks.

(1) Plin. Tacit. ubi supra. Keyzler, Colebatch, Douglas, & al. de visco. Islandorum mytholog. c. 43. (2) Vide Keyzler, ubi supra.

If we may, however, be premitted to offer a conjecture concerning the origin of this ſuperſtition, it ſeems to have had its riſe from this: The Germans, warlike, fierce, and active as they were, and conſtantly employed either in the martial or hunting trade, might, probably, have committed the care of their ſick and wounded to their women, who, having more time and leiſure upon their hands, began to ſtudy the virtues of herbs, plants, and other medicinal things. From this ſkill, which they generally intermixed with that of aſtrology, they might, in time, pretend to greater, and to be able to pry into futurity. The old ones might likewiſe naturally give into dreams, viſions, and other ſuperſtitious obſervations, ſuch as were then practiſed by almoſt all other nations; ſuch as the flight of birds, the running of rivers, and the colour of their waters; the entrails of victims, and ſuch-like kinds of ſortileges; till they, at length, raiſed themſelves to ſuch credit and admiration, that, if Tacitus may be credited, they were looked upon as a kind of goddeſſes: and, in particular, that famed one called Velleda, of whom he ſpeaks as of a perſon deified, and worſhipped by the whole German nation (6). Some others are mentioned of like high repute, viz. Aurinia (7), or Alruna, Ganna (8), Jettha, Sifa, Thrudur, &c. of which we ſhall ſay nothing more, ſeeing we are quite in the dark about them in every reſpect, but that of their being ſpoken of as famed propheteſſes among the Germans. The reader may, however, ſee all the different conjectures of the learned about them, in the authors quoted in the margin (9).

(3) Vide Tacit. German. c. 8. & hiſtor. l. v. Comment. l. i. c. 50. Strabo, l. vii. Plutarch. in Cæſar. Arrian. & Clem. Alexand. ſtrom. l. i. & al. (4) Vide Polyæn. ſtratag. l. vii. & vol. xv. p. 169---392. (5) See the laſt chapter, p. 485. (6) Hiſtor. l. iv. c. 61, 65. l. v. c. 22. & de mor. Germ. c. 8. (7) Idem ibid. (8) Suid. ſub. voc. Θεάδοσα. (9) Vorm. itinerar. & Keyzler deſſertat. de mulier. facd. c. 56, & ſeq.

any difference between the Gauls and Germans in point of religion, it conſiſted only in this, that the latter, being more fierce and untractable, were not only more full and tenacious of their ſuperſtitious rites, but likewiſe more cruel and inhuman in them. They not only offered the ſame expiatory human victims, and uſed them in their auguries, and other parts of their religion, but treated them much more cruelly than they. The Gauls, in ſome caſes, fattened them for one whole year with the fineſt dainties, put them to a quick death, and ſometimes ſtabbed them unexpectedly in the back: the Germans, on the contrary, made theirs undergo many grievous indignities and torments, before they diſpatched them, ſome inſtances of which we have given in the Gauliſh hiſtory [c], that will hardly bear repeating. Other victims they likewiſe offered of domeſtic animals, and of theſe the horſe was reckoned the moſt acceptable. The fleſh of them was, it ſeems, to be boiled, ſtewed, or dreſſed in ſome other way, in the heart of their groves; the fat and the fleſh was ſerved to the votaries, by way of feaſt, and the blood was ſprinkled upon the altar, trees, and by-ſtanders, by way of ablution: but though they did the ſame by that of human victims, it doth not appear, that they eat the fleſh of them. We have formerly obſerved, likewiſe, from Cæſar, Tacitus, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Athenæus, and other antient authors, that the Germans had no temples, but performed their religious rites in groves erected for that purpoſe, or in woods, foreſts, and deſart places; tho' this latter ſeems to have been practiſed after their conqueſt, and to avoid the penalties of thoſe ſevere edicts which the Roman emperors had iſſued out againſt the druids, and their inhuman ſacrifices: however that be, temples were not introduced in Germany till long after the Gauls had ſhewed them the way; and it is plain, that after the former had introduced the worſhip of Jupiter, Mars, &c. they dedicated ſtill oaks, groves, woods, and whole foreſts to them, and performed their ſuperſtitious rites in them a conſiderable while before they could be brought to erect temples to them.

The Germans had antiently no temples.

This is evident, from what Tacitus tells us of the goddeſs Hertha, one of their antient deities, whoſe idol was preſerved in a wood, or grove, Caſtum Nemus, upon a covered cart, and had but one prieſt to miniſter to her, and the only one who dared come near it. He adds, that whenever the deity had a mind to go out and air herſelf, or to take a view of mankind, that prieſt, who was her only confident, gave notice

The goddeſs Hertha.

[c] See before, p. 426.

tice of it to the whole nation; upon which, nothing was to be seen but feasting and jollity amongst them, whilst she was carried about in her covered car, drawn by two heifers, and attended by the priest above-mentioned. His chief business was to observe when she appeared satiated with rambling, and to convey her into her sacred grove again [d]. He doth indeed mention a temple which he there calls the temple of Tanfana [e] (C), and which, he says, the Romans levelled to the ground: but [d] Annal. l. v. c. 9. [e] Ibid. l. i. c. 51.

(C) It will be, in a great measure, labour lost, to enquire who this Tanfana was, whether a German goddess, or the place where the temple was: if the former, her name is quite foreign, and no footsteps are left of her, or her worship, unless our author, or his copiers, mistook Tanfana for Onfana, the name of Minerva among the Gauls.

There are some inscriptions, one in particular, dug up in the neighbourhood of Lyons, in which these words are engraven on a marble stone: "Pro salute Dom. N. Imp. L. Sept Sever. Aug. to-" tiusq; Domus ejus Ausanis Matronis & Matribus Pannoniorum &" Delmatarum. Ti. Cl. Pompeianus, &c." from which a modern antiquary (10) would conclude, that it should be Tansanis, instead of Ausanis, as bearing some relation to the goddess Tansania, whose temple Tacitus here speaks of. But since there are other inscriptions which agree with this, and call these Matres Ausaniæ, his conjecture will hardly be allowed.

Who these Matronæ were, is as hard to guess; the author last quoted thinks them to have been campestrian deities, such as presided over woods, rivers, lakes, &c. and were, by this time, worshipped both by the Gauls and Germans, as we have seen in the last chapter: but why such aereal beings should be called Matres and Matrones, cannot well be conceived; and to us it seems more probable that they were those famed druidesses, or propheteses, of whom we have spoken in the last note, and who, being deified after their death, were still invoked by the living, and had altars, and other inscriptions, reared to them by their votaries, as they were supposed to preside still on health, life, pregnancy, &c. whereas those aereal beings, which were thought to live in, or preside over fire, water, earth, woods, &c. and have been since distinguished by the names of salamanders, sylphs, nymphs, and gnomes, were supposed to have been created from the beginning, and to have had those elements assigned them by the Supreme Being.

Hence

(10) Reines. synt. art. 175. Vide Keyzler ubi supra, c. 39.

but as in the foregoing instance of Hertha he first calls it a temple, though he says in general, that the Germans had none, and afterwards explains his meaning by calling it a grove, and a private lake; might not this of Tanfana be of the same kind? However, suppose it to have been a real temple, there will be no wonder, that such a building should be erected by the Marsi, or, at least, in their country, and, perhaps, by the Romans, who had, by this time, subdued them [f]; for this was in Augustus's reign, about eighty years before the time in which Tacitus wrote. For though this be the only one we read of, yet there might as well have been some others built by this time, either in imitation of, or obedience, to the conquering Romans, who, as we have formerly hinted, were very industrious to propagate their religion amongst those nations they subdued. For if, either through complaisance or fear, they once adopted their deities, why might they not, from the same motives, erect also temples to them?

We

[f] See before, vol. xii. p. 487. & vol, xiii. p. 527. & seq.

Hence we may see whence the Rosicrucian notion, so much in vogue still among the Germans, and other northern people, had its rise; and that it is no other than a relict of the old northern heathenism, improved by the enthusiastic help of a warm imagination: for, to this day, the same, and even much more preposterous superstitions, are still preserved, in several parts of Germany, among the vulgar, and much more so as you go farther northwards, especially among the Icelanders, Samojedes, Laplanders, &c. some of which can hardly be read without horror, and might be much better passed over in silence, were it not that they plainly shew to us how far unassisted reason may be depraved and warped, by education and custom; since all the pains that have hitherto been taken, especially since the reformation, have not been able to root it out.

Before we dismiss this subject of these Deæ Matres, or Matronæ, we beg leave to mention an inscription found upon an altar-stone at Lowther in Westmorland, with these words: Deabus Matribus Tramai Tramai Vex Cerma. P. V. R. D. Pro Salute, &c. in which a German antiquary has endeavoured to shew, that the word Tramai should be read Tarami, or Tarani; Taran being one of the Celtic names of Jupiter (11). But we think our learned Gale (12) hath much better corrected the lection, by reading it Bramæ, the name of a place in that country, mentioned in the Itinerarium Antonini, and from which these Matres might, in all likelihood, be denominated.

(11) Schedius de diis Germ. c. 8. (12) Comment. in itiner. Anton. p. 7.

Their deities; Jupiter.

WE have already ſpoken of thoſe inferior ones introduced among the Gauls, ſuch as Jove, or Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Venus, Diana, &c. The ſame, and very nearly under the ſame notion, were adopted by the Germans, though ſome of them under different names: we ſhall juſt mention ſome of thoſe names and attributes, as they were peculiarly given by the Germans to each of them. Jupiter was worſhipped under the name of Thor, Tharam, or Taran, i. e. the thunderer. This name we have already ſeen, in the laſt chapter, was given by the Gauls to Mars, alſo, on account of the clattering noiſe of the martial trade. The ſame was done by the Germans, who gave it to their Odin, or Woden, which was the ſame deity, as we ſhall ſee under the next article. As for the name of Jupiter, we have formerly ſhewn, that it was never adopted by the Gauls, nor doth it appear to have been ſo by the Germans: if theſe had any other names for him than thoſe we have mentioned, they have been ſince loſt, and are not worth ſeeking further after.

Mars, or Odin.

MARS, called by them Odin, Othin, and Woden (D), has ſometimes been confounded with Mercury by the Roman authors, and no wonder, when they were ſo unacquainted with their language, and could have ſo little information from them concerning their religion or politics. For the Germans, as well as the Gauls, made it a conſtant maxim, not to communicate any thing of either to ſtrangers; and hence may be aſſigned the reaſon why ſome of them have even more abſurdly imagined this

(D) This deity had ſeveral other names, according to the ſeveral offices they attributed to him; ſuch as Walfader, and Walladur, the father of ſlaughter, and of arms; Sigmundur, the giver of victory, and the like. This of Odin ſeems derived from the antient word Audun, which ſignifies exterminator, as they prayed to him to exterminate their enemies. The Gauls did, moſt likely, give him that of Ollodius, as has been found by an inſcription dug up near Aix in Provence, which runs thus: "Vi-" gilia Melia Maſſa filia Marti Olloudio," which laſt word is thought by ſome to be of Greek extract, as it was found ſo near Marſeilles, where Greek had been ſo long introduced; and may be either from ὀλλύω, or ὄλλυμι, to put to death, to deſtroy (13). Inthe ſame ſenſe he is called, by Homer, οὐλὸς, fatal, or murderer; as his chief buſineſs, according to the heathen theology, was, to ſupply hell continually with new-comers. Yet,

(13) Snorro de reg. Haquino. Vide & Keyzler. antiq. Septentr. ſ. 2. § 7.

this Odin to have been the same with Hesus, or Esus [g] the Supreme Deity. The great veneration they observed to be paid to the former, their calling upon him at the beginning of a fight, and vowing to him all the plunder, and even lives, of their enemies, might easily lead those authors to mistake him for the latter. Mars, when his worship came to be adopted, was always, as far as can be gathered from antient monuments, represented in armour, though antiently under the type of a naked sword [h]; whereas Hesus was only worshipped under the type of an oak, or even the bare stump of one. Mars was looked upon not only as the god of war, but as the patron and guardian of those who were slain, whose souls the survivors bequeathed to him, in words to this effect, "Odin receive "thee; mayest thou be with Odin" (E)! If you ask what they supposed was to be their employment in that place of bliss which was called by them Valhalla, and of which Odinus was the chief disposer; some of their antient poets will tell you, that one of them was to carouse with exquisite beer in human skulls, whilst Odinus alone is allowed to drink wine. They were, moreover, to be served by elegant virgins, whose business it was to furnish them with a constant supply of whatever could make them happy and merry; and this notion of a Mohammed's paradise was no small spur to warlike actions, since every man's felicity there was to rise in proportion to the

The dispenser of future happiness.

[g] Lucan Pharsal. l. i. Lactant. l. i. c. 12. [h] See before, vol. v. p. 452.

Yet, after all, it may not improbably be derived from the old Celtic ohll, which signifies beer. For as neither Germans nor Gauls had vines till long after the Romans invaded them, as we have lately shewn, beer was not only their choicest liquor, but they believed, that Mars, or Odin, dispensed it in large quantities to his votaries in the next world, as we shall see by-and-by. So that he might be properly enough called Ollodinus, or Ollodius, from thence, that is, the god of strong beer.

(E) It seems from some sepulchral inscriptions, and funeral orations, still extant, that in some of the northern regions they bequeathed the souls of the deceased to Odin, in words to this effect: "Odin preserve thee, a dear child, faithful friend, an ho-"nest servant," and the like, even after their embracing christianity: and the sending any one to Odin, was reckoned a very kind and good wish, though it is since looked upon, especially by the Suevi, as bad as sending one to the devil (14).

(14) See Relig. des Gaul. vol. ii. c. 4.

the number of enemies they had conquered or killed [i] (F). Accordingly to this notion, we need not wonder at their conſecrating

[i] Edda mythol. 34, & ſeq. Caemen in bodbrog. reg. ex verſ. Barthol. Vide Maſcov. & Lediard. Germ. l. xiv. c. 3. n. 1.

(F) We have properly no antient author to vouch for this their belief of a Turkiſh paradiſe; our authority for it is only taken from ſome of the oldeſt northern poets (15), who quoted it from more antient ſongs and verſes of the druids, who, as we have often obſerved, couched all their religion and hiſtory in ſuch kinds of poems, and conveyed them down from one generation to another. To this we may, however, add, this collateral proof, from the general agreement of Greek and Roman authors, that the antient Celtes and Scythians made uſe of the ſkulls of their ſlain enemies to carouſe with, and that they were in general, but none more than the Germans, very fond of drinking to exceſs. So that it is very natural to ſuppoſe, the druids would carry this notion of happineſs beyond the grave, in order to inſpire the people with courage, and a contempt of death.

Accordingly, the famous king Lodbrog is introduced ſinging his own requiem, in theſe words, as tranſlated out of Edda, by Bartholine.

" Pugnavimus enſibus
" Hoc ridere me facit ſemper
" Quod Balderi (Odin) patris ſcamna
" Parata ſcio in aula
" Bibemus cereviſiam brevi
" Ex concavis crateribus craniorum
" Non gemit vir fortis contra mortem
" Magnifici in Odidi domibus
" Non venio deſperabundis
" Verbis ad Odini aulam (16).

He concludes thus (17):

" Fert animus finire
" Invitant me deæ
" Quas ex Othini aula
" Othinus mihi miſit
" Lætus cereviſiam cum Aſis (diis)
" In ſumma ſede bibam
" Vitæ elapſæ ſunt horæ
" Ridens moriar (18).

(15) Edda mythol. 30, & ſeq. Carm. in reg. Lodbrog. ſupra citat. & al. (16) Idem ibid. ſtroph. 25. (17) Stroph. 29. (18) Vide Vormii literat. Run. p. 222, & ſeq. & Keyzler. antiq. ſept. c. 2. § 13.

ing so great a share, and sometimes all the plunder of their enemies, making him heir of all their wealth, keeper of all their treasure, and often vowing their own lives to him; since they expected to be so amply rewarded by him in the next life, and with such a kind of happiness as best suited with their genius [k].

Is made a northern hero by their historians.

THE German, and other old historians, have since transformed this deity into a northern hero, whom they bring from Asia into Scandinavia, where, after a long and bloody prowess, and a reign stuffed with the greatest wonders, during which he gave them a body of laws, some of which we shall speak of in its proper place, that he might end as he begun, and inspire his people with the same contempt of death, he gave himself a slight wound with an arrow, because he would not go into the other world without one, and soon after died; and, after a magnificent funeral, in which his corse was laid on a large and magnificent pile, that the brighter and higher the flames ascended, the greater might be his glory among the gods, he was deified as the protector and rewarder of those who die in battle [l]. This may, perhaps, have been trumped up to wipe of the imputation of their having given into the Greek and Roman idolatry, and to shew, that they only paid a more than ordinary veneration to their heroes and heroines, some of whom they ranked in the same number as Hercules among the men, and Hertha and Fria, or Friga, among the women. Their mythologists, on the other hand, have split this Odin into two; the antientest of the two they suppose some to have been Mars, others the sun, and the youngest to have been one of their deified heroes; yet there is no doubt but that one may find a great resemblance between the antient Germans, Suevi, Æstii, &c. and other most distant nations; such, for instance, we may reckon the worship of the goddess Hertha, mentioned a little higher, which agreed with that which the Romans and others paid to the earth, under the name of Magna deorum mater; or as Tacitus says of the latter [m], their worship of Fria, or Friga, under that denomination (G).

Their worship of other deities.

How

[k] Vide inter al. Bartholin de contempt. mort. in Dan. l. ii. c. 12.
[l] Snorron. Yngliga saga, c. 8. [m] Germ. c. 9, & 45.

(G) That historian is, however, contradicted by some German authors, who pretend, that Fria Friga, or Frejun, was the sun (19). This they pretend to prove by what he adds, that they worg

(19) Vide Keyzler. ubi supra, § 15

How much of this kind of idolatry they may have had before their becoming acquainted with the Romans, is not eaſy to ſay; and we ſhall gladly refer our readers to what has been already hinted on that head in the hiſtory of the Gauls; but after that time, eſpecially after their being ſubdued by them, there is no doubt but they adopted many of their other deities, as well as a great number of their ceremonies and ſuperſtitions. However, it plainly appears, upon the whole, that their antient theology differed much from the mythology of the Romans and Greeks. The Germans, even according to the teſtimony of Roman writers, neither preſumed to confine their deities within temples, nor to repreſent them under any forms [n], nor admitted into that number any but ſuch they ſaw, and received aſſiſtance and benefit from; ſuch as the ſun, moon, and Vulcan [o], or the god of fire wore the boar on their ſtandard, and which, theſe pretend, was owing to an acceptable ſacrifice, which Odinus had offered of this creature to that planet. But, if they worſhipped the ſun under the name of Frejun, or Friggon, might they not as well do the ſame by the moon, under the name of Frea, Fria, and Frigga? And might not the wild boar be as fit a ſacrifice to that huntreſs, as to the ſun?

[n] Idem ibid. c. 9. & 43.

[o] Cæſ. com. l. vi. c. 21.

Iſis, who was the ſame with the moon, ſince Cæſar calls the ſame deity Luna which Tacitus calls Iſis, was worſhipped by Germans and Gauls, and is affirmed, by the latter hiſtorian, to have been the chief deity of the Suevi. He doth, indeed, there ſay (20), that he could find no footſteps upon what account her worſhip was there introduced; but ſuppoſes, by the figure in which ſhe was repreſented, viz. that of a ſhip, or frigate, that it was brought thither from abroad; and it is ſomewhat ſtrange, ſince ſhe was worſhipped by the Romans under that type, as preſiding over the ſea, and navigation (21), and had a ſet feſtival in their faſta, that he ſhould conclude from thence, that the Suevi, who were of Celtic extract, and given to navigation, ſhould receive that deity from abroad, which was peculiar to all the Celtes. However, therefore, Fria and Freius, Iſis and Mithras, Sol and Luna, Apollo and Diana, may be found confounded in antient hiſtorians, on account of their joint influence on earthly things, and their common courſe in the heavens; yet there is no doubt to be made but they were ſeverally worſhipped by all the northern, as well as ſouthern nations; and why not more ſo than earth, water, rivers, lakes, woods, foreſts, trees, and plants?

(20). De mor. c. 45.

(21) Lactant. l. i. c. 11. Diod. Sicul. Apul. & al.

fire (H). Their veneration for their deified heroes and heroines, and the encomiums they gave them in their poetical performances, extended no farther than to their virtues and heroic exploits, their ſtrength and courage, victories and conqueſts [p]; whereas the Greeks and Romans not only attributed to their deities all their own imperfections, but even ſanctified their moſt monſtrous and unnatural vices [q].

Horrid ſuperſtitions.

THE Germans, as well as Gauls, were early taught, by their druids, two momentous truths, viz. an over-ruling providence, and the immortality of the ſoul. The misfortune was, that theſe two noble ſprings of virtue and religion did not run long uncorrupted; for as, on the one hand, a too eager deſire in the people of prying into futurity, and a fatal ambition in their druids and diviners of being thought more intimately acquainted with the ways of that providence, introduced an infinite variety of auguries and ſuperſtitions; and ſome of them, as we have elſewhere hinted, were of the moſt inhuman and diabolical kind; ſo, on the other, the belief of a future life and immortality, proved but too fatal a ſpur

[p] German. c. 2. [q] Lactant. Minut. Fel. Clem. Alex. & al.

(H) So, at leaſt, that author is underſtood by moſt writers. We are, indeed, told, by Plutarch (22), that Viridomarus, a king of the Gauls, who lived above 200 years before our Saviour, having declared war againſt the Romans, made a vow to conſecrate all the arms he took from the enemy to Vulcan: ſo that if that author be right in the name, the worſhip of that deity muſt have been very antient among the Gauls and Germans. But the misfortune is, as a late writer obſerves (23), that the Roman writers either miſtook the names of thoſe heroes or deities, or mentioned them by the names of ſuch of their own gods as they imagined them to reſemble moſt; by which means, that part of German antiquity is become ſo intricate, that it can hardly be relied on.

Some inſcriptions ſhew, that they had a deity called Volian, or Volianus, according to the Roman termination. Hence ſome authors have concluded, that the two branches of the K were worn out, and that the name was originally Volkanus, which ſuppoſition is natural enough. But Volian being a Celtic word, which ſignifies either a furnace, or a fiery forge, the latter may, probably, have been the original name, though hardened ſince into Vulcan.

(22) Invit. Marcel. (23) See Maſcov. Germ. l. ii. c. 35.

a ſpur to raſhneſs, ambition, and cruelty, eſpecially after they came to imbibe that poiſonous notion hinted a little higher, that the ſureſt way to that happineſs was, to die in the field of battle; and that their felicity in the next world was to riſe according to the number of the enemies they had deſtroyed in this. For this not only inſpired them with a barbarous courage and cruelty in their wars, but made them leſs ſolicitous to enquire whether the motives of it were juſt or unjuſt. We have already given ſuch inſtances of theſe bloody ſuperſtitions, in the hiſtory of the antient Celtes and Scythians [r], and lately in that of the Gauls [s], that our readers, we hope, will eaſily ſpare us the trouble of repeating them here, ſeeing they are all of the ſame kind, and of ſuch a nature, that they can ſcarcely be read without horror. Only this we muſt be bound to add, that, whether the Germans received them from their neighbours, or whether they crept in amongſt them by degrees, as they did almoſt every-where elſe, they appear not only to have exceeded other nations in them, but to have retained them much longer than any of thoſe who received the goſpel (I). One piece of ſuperſtition, common to all the Germans and Gauls, was, never to fight, or undertake any material point, before the moon was full ſix days old, nor even then, if their ſoothſayers, who were moſtly women, did not like the auguries. Theſe were always conſulted, upon all emergencies, as the druids and druideſſes were in Gaul. They were always admitted to their councils, bore the greateſt ſway in them, not only as having the chief management of all their auguries, without which they did not do any thing, but as being eſteemed by the whole nation to have been endowed with a prophetic ſpirit [t].

NEXT

[r] See vol. v. p. 408. [s] See before, p. 449, 454, & ſeq & 463, paſſ. [t] Tacit. Germ. c. 8. & alib. paſſ.

(I) Hence all that ſad trade of witchery and ſorceries ſtill in vogue among the more northern parts; the divining wand, to find out mines, thieves, and murderers, among the ſouthern; their notions of fairies, and other aereal beings, ſome of a benevolent, others of a malevolent nature; of apparitions, charms, inchantments, faſcination, magical and diabolical contracts, carnal commerce with demons, and a number of other heatheniſh forgeries, which cannot be rooted out from among the vulgar of both; all which plainly appear to be owing to their tenaciouſneſs, of, and fondneſs for, the old leaven of the antient Celtic ſuperſtition.

Their prieſts.

NEXT in authority to theſe pretended propheteſſes, were the druids, or rather prieſts. Cæſar ſays, indeed [u], that they had no druids, as the Celtes; but Tacitus, who was better acquainted with them, ſpeaks frequently of their prieſts, whoſe office and authority, according to him, being much the ſame with the Gauliſh druids, ſhews them to have been the ſame order of men, though they did not, perhaps, bear the ſame name. For theſe prieſts, he tells us [w], were not only admitted to their public councils, but accompanied them in the wars, and bore a great ſway in both. For we are told, that they were the only ones who had power to impoſe ſilence in thoſe meetings, to reprove or puniſh offenders, which exactly agrees with what Cæſar ſays of the Gauliſh druids, whoſe office it was to try, condemn, and even to inflict capital puniſhment [x]. And hence it may be, that the office of hangman is ſtill in ſo much requeſt all over Germany, contrary to what we find it in all other chriſtian nations; where they are either taken from the dregs of the people, or, when that fails, ſome noted delinquent is commonly condemned to it.

Their office.

As, therefore, one main part of the prieſts office among the antient Germans, conſiſted chiefly in ſtirring them up to martial deeds, in killing and ſlaying victims, and very frequently human ones, both in their ſacrifices and auguries, in condemning and executing criminals, in puniſhing leſſer offenders with milder puniſhments, and the like; we need not wonder if the external part of their religion was ſo void of the Greek and Roman pomp, and ſo full of every thing that could ſtrike an awful dread on that fierce and warlike people, whoſe devotion might perhaps be better kept up under the covert of thick and gloomy groves, as well as by the bloody rites performed in them, than by all the ornaments of Greek and Roman temples, and the pageantry of their ceremonies and dreſs. It is therefore no ſmall wonder, that ſuch men ſhould chuſe a garb ſo contrary to their butcherly trade, and to affect to be clad in white, and not rather in the deepeſt crimſon: and may not this contraſt be a kind of proof, that their office at firſt was of a quite different nature, and that from ſinging the praiſes of their Creator, and of their famed heroes, or killing, perhaps, ſome few harmleſs creatures, in honour to them; their ambition, and thirſt of rule over an untractable people, made them degenerate, by degrees, into this pitch of arbitrary power and cruelty?

Dreſs.

[u] Comm. l. vi. c. 21.
[w] Tacit. ubi ſupra, l. vii.
[x] Idem ibid.

cruelty? But we offer this only as a conjecture, which is not, however, without ſome foundation, if we conſider, that they received their religion from the ſame foundation that the Perſes, Brachmans, and other Indian ſects, did, who yet, either from their living, perhaps, in milder climes, or from a more conſcientious adhering to their primitive inſtitution, have ever been juſtly famed for a character the moſt oppoſite to theirs.

As for their antient laws and government, we can only ſay, that they diſcover thoſe evident marks by which men, by degrees, were forced to form themſelves into ſocieties for their general good and preſervation; to have magiſtrates to govern and protect them in times of peace, and generals to command and lead them in war. This, conſidering the extent of their territories, and their fierce and warlike genius, prevented their being long united into one common ſtate, whatever they might have been originally. But every tribe of them had its own form of government, independent from the reſt, except, perhaps, that they had ſome laws in common, for the better union and preſervation of the whole body againſt foreign enemies, or to keep up a kind of balance among themſelves, that one nation ſhould not grow too ſtrong for the reſt: in other things each canton held their national councils at leaſt once a year, that is, in the ſpring, and oftner, if need required; and there deliberated about peace or war, the choice of magiſtrates, and other annual officers, both civil and military; the ſending out of colonies or auxiliaries, and other ſuch points, according to their preſent exigence [y]. And theſe aſſemblies were ſo exactly obſerved, that, we are told, the laſt comer to them was ſure to loſe his life (K). It is very likely alſo, that all others matters relating to property, crimes, and ſuch-like, were here alſo finally determined by the plurality of votes, rather than by any body of laws they can be ſuppoſed to have had in theſe early

Their laws and government.

National councils.

[y] Idem ibid. & c. 11, & ſeq.

(K) This, we are told, they did in imitation of the cranes, to which they, as well as the Gauls, in their auguries, paid a ſingular regard: and as theſe birds are ſaid by naturaliſts to ſhift their habitations every year, and to appoint a general rendezvous, in order to take their flight, and to kill the laſt comer to the place; ſo they did the ſame by him who came laſt to the general aſſembly (24).

(24) See Voſ. de idololat. l. iii. c. 22.

early days. Liberty, being by them looked upon as the ſummum bonum [z], made them exceeding watchful againſt every thing that looked like an infringement of it; and as they were too impatient to go through the fatigues of long law-ſuits, they rather choſe to have them decided at once by ſuch an aſſembly, and ſometimes by ſingle combat, rather than ſtay for their next meeting. Theſe aſſemblies were commonly accompanied with ſumptuous banquets, as they were judged to promote friendſhip and mutual confidence, to inſpire men with greater freedom of ſpeech, and open a door to wholeſome counſels [a]. In thoſe ſtates which were under a kingly government, as a great many of them were, they applied to the prince only in matters of ſmaller moment; but in thoſe which concerned the whole nation, to the grand council of it [b]: neither allowed they any other revenues to thoſe monarchs but a part of the fines, and ſuch free-will offerings as the people thought fit to make to them of cattle, and the fruits of the earth; ſo that they had little elſe to keep up their grandeur, except their hereditary eſtates [c]. Their expence was, indeed, inconſiderable, becauſe all their ſubjects, fit to bear arms, were obliged to follow them into the field, and their nobles thought it an honour to make part of their retinue; upon which account theſe had the free uſe of the prince's table, and were ſometimes preſented with a horſe, or ſome of his arms [d]. The ſubjects were diſtinguiſhed into ſeveral ranks, or claſſes, ſuch as nobles, free-born, freed-men, and bondſmen; in each of which claſſes thoſe were ſtill moſt eſteemed, who had ſignalized themſelves beſt, by their courage, conduct, or any laudable exploit [e]. As for their other laws, if any ſuch they had compiled in a body, they were rather preſerved by tradition and cuſtom, than kept upon record, ſince we have often obſerved they made it a conſtant maxim, not to commit any thing to writing. But that ſome ſuch laws they had, is apparent from this, that they ſtill retained many of them, even after thoſe of the Romans had been introduced amongſt them. Judges they likewiſe had of their own, and their office was held in ſuch eſteem, that men of the higheſt rank were promoted to it, as well as thoſe of the greateſt probity, years, and diſcretion: even their princes ſometimes took it upon them. Every judge had, it ſeems, a number of aſſeſſors,

Kings, and their revenue.

[z] Lucan. Pharſal. l. vii. v. 430. Tacit. ubi ſupra, c. 37.
[a] Idem ibid. c. 22. [b] Ibid. c. 11. [c] Ibid. c. 15, & ſeq. [d] Ibid. c. 14, & ſeq. [e] Ibid. c. 11.

aſſeſſors, with whom he might conſult upon occaſion; whence, probably, the office of ſcabinus, or ſheriff, had its riſe [f].

THESE general aſſemblies were antiently held in the open country; for the Germans deſpiſed cities and fortreſſes, as monuments of ſervitude, rather than places of defence [g]; and were ſome of the lateſt of the Europeans that either built any for themſelves, or would take refuge in them: ſo that, whenever they were obliged to fight an enemy, they always choſe to do it in the open field, and, when worſted, to retire into woods, marſhes, and inacceſſible places, where they could get proviſion for their cattle, and keep their purſuers at a diſtance; rather than to ſhelter themſelves in towns, and fortified places, where they might be caught, as in a trap. It was, moreover, a common ſaying among them, that even wild beaſts would loſe all their ſtrength and courage, if penned up [h]. And we are told, that this cuſtom ſubſiſted in Gaul till the eighth century, and much longer in Germany [i] (L). The whole nation being, moreover, naturally

Their ſtate of war. Had neither cities, nor fortreſſes.

[f] See Maſcov. German. l. ii. c. 3. 8. [g] Tacit. ann. l. iv. c. 64. [h] Cæſ. comment. l. iii. c. 29. l. iv. c. 19. & 29. [i] Vide Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. l. ii. c. 5. ſect. 4.

(L) We have formerly ſeen, that both antient Germans and Gauls lived in a kind of cantons, or villages, with their houſes and grounds about them, at a convenient diſtance from each other, that every family might have land enough for themſelves and their cattle (25); and that, as ſoon as they had gathered in their harveſt, they generally removed to new habitations. But when they came to be either conquered by the Romans, or enſlaved, perhaps, by ſome of their ambitious princes; either of theſe were forced to build caſtles, fortreſſes, and fenced cities, to keep them in awe, and deprive them of all poſſible means of regaining their liberty. And hence proceeded their averſion to all ſuch ſtrong places, as tending only to bring and hold them the faſter in ſlavery. But as neceſſity, in proceſs of time, obliged them to have their cities, caſtles, &c. for their own defence and preſervation, they fell into the ſame ſuperſtition with the Greeks and Romans, of dedicating them to certain deities, and even perſonifying and apotheoſing them, and to celebrate a kind of anniverſary of their foundation: which cuſtom laſted till long after their embracing chriſtianity, as appears from many antient inſcriptions, which the reader may find in Gruter's collection, and from ſundry

(25) See before, p. 403, note (H).

of a warlike genius, and esteeming cowardice as the greatest reproach and disgrace that could be thrown upon them, all such fenced cities and fortified places were looked upon by them as so many shameful asyla for the weak and pusillanimous to flee to, and they, consequently, despised them, as unworthy a brave people, who always scorned to take any advantage of their enemy, whether of weapons, intrenchments, discipline, stratagems, or, indeed, of any other kind but those of strength and bravery, intrepidity, and an invincible love of liberty. It was in these that they solely trained up their youth, leaving all other arts of gaining a superiority to those of their enemies to whom the want of these martial virtues rendered them more necessary. Accordingly, no nation could take more care than they did to inure them to all hardships (M), to inspire them with a contempt of danger, and even of death, and to rear them up to martial deeds. This was their chief and surest road to wealth, honour, and preferment, and, as their priests taught them, even to the greatest happiness in a future life [i]. It was for this that the ambitious amongst them neglected agriculture, and despised all mercantile and mechanic employments [k], how necessary and advantageous soever, and obliged all who were able to bear arms to go sundry prohibitions of christian bishops against all future observances of them (26).

[i] Cæs. com. l. iv. c. 22, & seq. [k] Idem ibid. See also Essay on those countries, &c. which helped to pull down the Roman empire, p. 13--16.

(M) We are even told, that those who lived nearest the Rhine, or any other rivers, used to dip their children, as soon as born, into them, in order to knit and harden their limbs (27). We have, indeed, formerly observed, from Julian the apostate (28), that the waters of that river were supposed to have some peculiar virtue above others, insomuch that they threw their children into it whenever they had any suspicion of their mothers fidelity. Whether our authors mistook the design, or confounded the one with the other, we cannot affirm; but it is very probable, that if any such custom they had, it was rather introduced on a persuasion, that such children who were not proof against the severity of such a trial, were not worth the rearing up, and might as well be left to be swallowed up by the waves.

(26) Vide Relig. des Gaul. l. iv. c. 27. (27) Vide Aristot. de repub. l. vii. (28) See p. 401, note (I). & Claudian in Ruf. v. 109, & Nonn. ap. Ledard. Germ. l. ii. c. 37. n. 2.

go into the field. Hence it was that they were never at a loſs how to raiſe, in a very ſhort time, ſuch powerful and numerous armies either to repulſe an enemy, or to aſſiſt their friends and allies [l]: for whenever any country was diſengaged from a war, the ableſt ſoldiers were ſent into foreign ſervice, not ſingly, or according to their own option, but in conſiderable bodies, and under the command of ſuch officers as were ſet over them by the ſtate; by which means, the whole nation not only ſhared in the honour of their exploits, but was likewiſe furniſhed with more experienced generals. Another advantage was reaped from it, viz. that when a canton or ſtate became too populous, they could draw out ſuch numbers as could be ſpared, to go and ſeek out new habitations; and theſe, by being trained up to the trade of war, could the better fight their way through, and maintain themſelves in thoſe countries which they had the good fortune to ſettle in [m].

Their cavalry and foot.

THEY had but little cavalry, in proportion to their foot, in which they placed the main of their ſtrength; but what they had of the former was extremely well diſciplined, though their horſes were, it ſeems, inferior to thoſe of the Romans, either in bigneſs, ſwiftneſs, or dexterity, as well as in thoſe evolutions which were ſo artfully uſed by the latter [n]. As for ſaddles and ſtirrups, they were quite neglected, by both Gauls and Germans, who were accuſtomed to mount and diſmount by their own agility, and could, whenever occaſion required, fight as well on foot as on horſeback (N). In their order of battle, every canton and diſtrict were placed together, that every one of them might reap either the glory or diſgrace of fighting valiantly or cowardly, which was no ſmall ſpur to them to behave in ſuch a manner as might be a credit to their own tribe; and, by this means, they commonly fought in ſeveral diſtinct bodies. We are told, indeed, that ſome of them, eſpecially the Cimbri, formed their whole infantry into one ſquare battalion, and placed their wives, children, and baggage, behind a fence made of their waggons: as ſoon as

Way of fighting.

[l] Idem ibid. See Maſcov. l. ii. c. 37. [m] Tacit. ann. l. iv. c. 12. Cæſ. comm. l. vi. c. 23. [n] Tacit. Germ. c. 6.

(N) This plainly appears, by Cæſar's own confeſſion (29), who owns, moreover, that he had them in moſt of his wars; and often boaſts of the great ſervices he received from them (30).

(29) Comment. l. iv. c. 2. (30) Ibid. l. vii. c. 13. Vide Hirt. com. de bell. Alexandrin. c. 29.

every thing was ready for the onſet, the ſignal was given, which was anſwered by an univerſal ſhout, which was redoubled in a moſt dreadful manner, till they came to cloſe engagement. They uſed no art or ſtratagems in fighting, but placed their whole confidence in a joint and furious onſet on the enemy, and continuing it with a deſperate intrepidity, till they had either won or loſt the day; by which means, if they once met with a ſtout repulſe, or were put into diſorder, they ſeldom knew how to rally again, but became ſtupified and deſperate, and either fought till they died, or elſe betook themſelves to flight [o]; for it was reckoned ſo inglorious amongſt them to yield themſelves priſoners, that we read but of few inſtances of their doing ſo, in compariſon to thoſe in which they died with ſword in hand. Time and experience did, indeed, at length teach them to truſt leſs to their own ſtrength and courage, and to ſtudy a little more the Roman diſcipline, and art of fighting. But they began too late: had they done ſo from the beginning, they might, perhaps, have continued unconquered to this day.

Weapons. THEIR weapons were likewiſe vaſtly inferior to thoſe of the Romans; the cavalry had their ſhields and ſpears in common with the foot, but the latter had, beſides, their darts, bows and ſlings, and ſeldom had recourſe to their pikes and ſwords [p]. Helmets, armour, and coats of mail, were generally deſpiſed amongſt them; ſome of them did even affect to fight naked: ſo that if any ſuch armour was worn amongſt them, it was rather for diſtinction, than defence: upon which account, they adorned them with the horns and heads of ſome wild beaſts. Hence thoſe frightful figures which Plutarch obſerved among the Cimbrian cavalry [q], ſome of which are ſtill to be ſeen upon the ſeals and arms of thoſe antient times. Their ſhelds, which they diſtinguiſhed only by different colours, or ſome particular emblem, were reckoned ſo ſacred amongſt them, that they looked upon it as the greateſt diſgrace to loſe them in fight; becauſe none durſt appear either at their religious ceremonies, public aſſemblies, or even funerals, without them (O). Their arms were eſteemed their favourite furniture, [o] Tacit. & Cæſar, ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in Mar. Valer. Max. l. ii. c. 6. See before, p. 510, & ſeq. [p] Tacit. ubi ſupra. [q] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. [q] Idem ibid.

(O) Tacitus adds, that they were forced to live in diſgrace all the remainder of their days, and excluded from the company of men: inſomuch that they choſe often to put an end to both by a voluntary furniture, and chiefeſt ornament; they never appeared in public without them, and nothing was ſo earneſtly wiſhed for by their youth, as the day in which they became qualified to bear them [r]. The ſword was ſo ſacred amongſt them, that no oaths were reckoned more binding than thoſe they took upon a naked one [s]; neither did they appear in public, or aſſiſt at any ſolemn rite, without their ſword, ſhield, and ſpear [t]. We are even told, that they wore them at their familiar viſits, banquets, religious dances, and the like. When they ſat down, they had their ſword by their ſide, and a ſervant behind, to hold their ſhield and ſpear; and when they roſe, every one took them up again [u]: in a word, they looked upon themſelves as wedded to their arms; and when they had worn them from their youth to their extremeſt old age, they commonly cauſed them to be burnt or buried with them, when they died [w]. It was on account of this exceſſive regard they paid to their warlike weapons, as well as from their antient cuſtom of rearing a ſword, pike, or ſpear, at the head of their army, round about which they all gathered themſelves to perform their devotions, that they were ſuppoſed to worſhip them [x]; though it is plain, that they only worſhipped the Deity, or, at moſt, the god Mars, ſince adopted their grand patron and protector, under theſe types: but, upon the whole, it appears, that both Celtes and Scythians, and all their deſcendents, were accuſtomed to wear their arms, as well in the time of the profoundeſt peace, as in war; which was alſo practiſed by all the Greeks, Perſians, and other antient nations [y] (P). In voluntary death (31). He tells us farther, that the Suevi were the only people in all Germany where private men had not the liberty to wear their arms, or even to keep them at home; and the reaſon he gives is, that they lived under arbitrary princes, who, to maintain themſelves in their tyranny, ſtripped their ſubjects of them, and put them under the cuſtody of their favourite creatures (32).

Exceſſive fondneſs for them.

[r] Tacit. ubi ſupra, c. 13. [s] Am. Marcel. l. xvii. c. 12. [t] Nic. Damaſc. ap. Stob. ſerm. 164. Livy hiſt. l. xxi. c. 20. Cæſ. comm. l. vii. c. 21. [u] Tacit. Germ. c. 2, 15, 22. Annal. l. iv c. 64. Athen. ex Poſid. l. iv. c. 12. [w] Claudian. de bell. Get. v. 501. Comment. l. vi. c. 19. Tacit. Germ. c. 13, 27. [x] See vit. Dagobert. ap. du Cheſne, tom. i. c. 31. Adam Bremenſ. & al. [y] Ariſtot. politic. l. ii. c. 8. Thucydid. l. i. c. 6. Ammian. Marcel. l. xxiii. c. 6.

(P) It is not unlikely, that not only the Perſians, but likewiſe

(31) Tacit. Germ. c. 6. (32) Ibid. c. 44.

Sieges.

In their ſieges of places they were likewiſe vaſtly inferior to the Greeks and Romans, whether in the offenſive or defenſive, being ſtrangers to thoſe deſtructive inſtruments which were uſed by the latter, ſuch as towers and circumvallations, battering-rams, mining and counter-mining; and, placing the ſtreſs of their confidence in their miſſile weapons, as darts and ſtones, and their vigorous aſſaults and ſcalings, or in a reſolute and intrepid reſiſtance, if theſe failed, as they too often did, eſpecially when they were engaged againſt the well-diſciplined and artful Romans, who, beſides that they uſed all theſe, and many other ſuch warlike engines, in the greateſt perfection, were likewiſe expert in a great variety of ſtratagems, with which the Germans were wholly unacquainted, they fell immediately into confuſion, and became an eaſy prey to them. Hence the native ſtrength and valour of the latter is the more conſpicuous, as they defended themſelves ſo long, and ſo bravely, againſt ſuch powerful and dexterous enemies, and at length conquered them by their own arts [z].

Valour

Puniſhments.

FROM what we have ſeen we may infer, that the Germans in general, though too long unacquainted with the art of war, did yet obſerve a ſtrict diſcipline with their ſoldiery; and that cowardice and neglect of duty were ſeverely puniſhed amongſt them: they were not, indeed, ſo ſtrict in other caſes, but adapted their puniſhments to the different purpoſes of the commonwealth; were ſevere againſt ſome offences, and remiſs towards others; inſomuch, that even murder was not eſteemed capital amongſt them [a], but was puniſhed by ſuch a fine, of great or ſmall cattle, as was deemed a ſufficient compenſation to the family for their loſs. In diſputes and accuſations, whenever the caſe appeared dubious or intricate, they had two expeditious ways of deciding the matter; the one by their pretended divine auguries, and the other by ſingle combat; for in either of theſe they looked upon Providence the antient Greeks and Romans, had this cuſtom from the old Celtes. However, the two laſt, when they came to form themſelves into more regular ſocieties, and under a wholſome ſet of laws, probably abrogated this cuſtom, and permitted the people to carry their arms, in time of peace, only at their public ſpectacles, games, &c. (33).

[z] See Maſcov. Germ. l. ii. in fin. c. 37. [a] Tacit. Germ. c. 12, & 21.

(33) Vide Lucian. de gymnoſoph. p. 803. Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. l. ii. c. 6.

vidence as the chief director, and therefore ſubmitted to its unerring judgment. When, therefore, Varus endeavoured to introduce the Roman laws among them, we are told, that they refuſed it; alledging, that it was their way to decide all their controverſies by the ſword [b]; and this cuſtom continued amongſt them ſeveral hundred years [c].

Sciences. SCIENCES they were altogether ſtrangers to, if we except thoſe who lived by the ſea-coaſts, and had made ſome conſiderable progreſs not only in navigation, and building of ſhips, but probably, alſo, in ſome branches of aſtronomy, as well by obſervation, as by their converſe with other more polite nations: the reſt were all rude and ignorant, and it is even doubted whether they knew the uſe of letters (Q). Their greateſt ſkill in phyſic conſiſted in the knowledge and uſe

[b] Vel. Paterc. l. ii. c. 188. [c] In vet. leg. Aleman. tit. 44. ap. Maſcov. l. ii. c. 38.

(Q) At leaſt Tacitus, who knew them beſt, and may be ſuppoſed to have been converſant with the politer ſort, tells us, that neither men nor women knew any thing of them (34); unleſs by literarum ſecreta be meant ſomething more than the bare knowledge of letters, which is not unlikely; ſince he tells us, in the ſame book, that both they and the Switzers made uſe of the Greek characters (35); which is alſo confirmed by Cæſar (36) and by ſome antient coins and inſcriptions written in that character. (37).

We have already taken notice, that the Gauls probably received that character from the Greek colony that ſettled at Marſeilles (38); from whence it might eaſily paſs into Switzerland, and thence into Germany, and have been adopted by theſe for the ſame reaſon that they were by the Gauls; and this is the only way to reconcile Tacitus with himſelf, and with Julius Cæſar.

With reſpect to the Germans being ignorant of the liberal ſciences, we muſt except what a later author ſays of the Goths (39), that a Grecian philoſopher, named Diceneus, finding in them a fit capacity for philoſophy, aſtronomy, &c. took the pains to inſtruct them in every branch of them: for if that be true, the Germans could not be long without them. But our author, who was a Goth, is too juſtly ſuſpected of partiality for his own nation, in many other particulars as well as this, to be relied on. As for the Germans, it plainly appears, that literature of any kind was not introduced amongſt them till even ſome centuries after him, as we have ſhewn in the laſt chapter (40).

(34) Germ. c. 18. (35) Ibid. c. 3. (36) Comment. l. i. (37) Vide Rom. ſubterran. ap. Mabillon. Bouteroue traité des monoyes, p. 157, & 379. Vide & Relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 4 (38) See before, p. 518. (39) Jornand. de reb. Getar. c. 11. (40) See before, p. 521.

use of certain plants and roots found out by observation and experience, in which these pretenders intermixed a deal of superstitious trash; such as the time of the moon for gathering and applying them, charms, and other occult quackeries, which served only to amuse and raise the admiration of the vulgar. Music and poetry were much better cultivated amongst them, though one would be apt to judge their tongue too harsh and inharmonious for the one, and for the other. But besides that such foreign languages appear more so to us than to the natives, we may reasonably suppose, that both their music and poetry being adapted to the genius of the German nation and tongue, their harshness might be looked upon rather as a majestic beauty, than a defect: however that be, they had a set of men whose business it was to couch the heroic deeds of their warriors in lyric poems, and to sing them to the people, upon proper occasions, as the Gauls did of theirs [d]. And as martial deeds were the common topic of these verses, and one part of the instrumental music, which accompanied it, was the clattering their swords against their shields, it is no wonder Julian the apostate, whose ears were accustomed to more gentle and harmonious strains, gives such a frightful account both of the German tongue, music, and poetry [e].

Music and poetry.

Games and exercises.

THEIR sports, games, and exercises, were all, likewise, of the masculine kind, and fit to inure them to the martial trade. The youth performed them naked, and with incredible agility, such as running, shooting, swimming, leaping, and the like. Some equestrian exercises were much in vogue with them, as they were extraordinary horsemen; they were likewise fond of gaming, to such a degree, that, when they had lost all they were worth, they would venture even their liberty upon one cast more of the dice [f]. Manufactures were not introduced very early amongst them, that of linen excepted, which was, perhaps, one of the first, if not the only one they cultivated, for a considerable time, as it was the favourite dress of their women, priests, and men of quality [g]. Their original dress, when they came first to cover themselves, were the skins of beasts (R); the Germans and Trades.

[d] Vide Tacit. Germ. c. 2. & 3.
[e] Misopog. p. 336, & seq.
[f] Tacit. ubi supra, c. 24.
[g] Plin. nat. hist. l. xxix. c. 1.

(R) These were called by several names, according to those nations among which they were worn. In some parts of Germany and Britons ſeem to have been ſome of the laſt who exchanged them for cloaths made of flax and wool : theſe they did not wear long and full, as the Sarmatians, but ſhort and ſtrait, and fit to diſplay every limb of their body [h]. As they became more acquainted with the Romans, they not only improved in their dreſs, and the manner of weaving, flowering, and embroidering thoſe ſtuffs of which they were made [i], but adopted a great number of manufactures, in which they have ſince excelled other nations : for it was their contempt of ſuch trades, and not their want of a capacity for them, which made them be ſo long neglected, as beneath a martial genius; but when they came to take them up, they ſoon convinced the world, that their country ſeemed cut many they were called reno, which Cluverius thinks is derived from the rein-deer, whoſe ſkins they made their garments of (41). In others, maſtruga ; ſuppoſed to have been called ſo becauſe it made thoſe who wore them appear like monſters (42), or brutes in human ſhape. Tacitus adds, that the only diſtinction between men of quality and the vulgar conſiſted in the richneſs and fineneſs of thoſe furs (43).

[h] Tacit. ubi ſupra, c. 17. [i] Idem ibid.

And here it will not be amiſs to take notice of a merry jeſt which ſome Greeks, ſettled in Scythia, had endeavoured to impoſe upon Herodotus, as a ſerious truth ; viz. that the Nauri, a northern nation, were once a year changed into wolves, and after ſome time, reſumed their own ſhape (44). He doth indeed own, that he could hardly give credit to it ; but it is plain they only impoſed on his too great credulity in this point, as they did in ſome others, particularly where they told him that on the other ſide the Danube the air was, at ſome ſeaſons, ſo full of feathers, meaning of ſnow, that a man could ſcarce ſee two yards before him. Wolves, it is certain, were in ſuch quantities. and ſo dangerous, in all theſe northern countries, that the inhabitants were forced to deſtroy them as faſt as they could. Their ſkins they probably dreſſed, and made them into cloſe garments, to wear during the winter, and, when ſpring came on, they exchanged them for ſome lighter habit : and this is all that could be meant by this pretended transformation. Unleſs we will ſuppoſe, not without ſome probability, that thoſe Greeks had ſo far corrupted their native language, by their long abode in Scythia, that our author, naturally fond of wonders, underſtood them quite differently from what they meant.

(41) Germ. ant. p. 110.
(42) Iſidor. Orig. l. xix. c. 23.
(43) Tacit. Germ. c. 17.
(44) Herodot. l. iv. c. 105.

cut out to produce the beſt artificers; and we may add, that, in the number and variety of curious mechanic inventions, they have outdone all the world (S). They did not ſo Writing. ſoon give into the liberal arts, or even that of writing: we are told, that Charles the great cauſed ſome of their old barbarous poems, which they till then only ſung by heart, and contained the actions of their antient kings and heroes, to be committed to writing for their uſe, and to encourage them to learn to read [k]. The Saxons had ſuch a contempt for letters, that they refuſed to learn to read the goſpels till they were put into verſe, and ſet to ſuch tunes as they could eaſily ſing [l]. Even their laws were not, it ſeems, reduced to writing till about the 12th or 13th century [m]: which plainly ſhews that their runæ, or letters (T), are not of ſo antient a date as ſome moderns have imagined.

Before

[k] Eginhard in vit. Carol. mag. c. 29. [l] Vide Du Cheſnerer. Franc. tom. ii. p. 326. [m] See Schottel. de antiq. Germ. jur. p. 254. Pelloutier. hiſt. Celt. l. ii. c. 10.

(S) Amongſt theſe, that of clocks, watches, and other ſuch kind of uſeful and curious machinery, they have been long ſince famed for; but for none more than for the noble art of printing, which was found out at Mentz, ſoon after the year 1440, by John Fuſt, or Fauſt, a citizen of that place, and improved by his ſon-in-law, Peter Shoeffer, and from thence propagated, by ſome of his countrymen, through all the famous cities of Europe, in leſs than half a century (45).

In ſpeaking of this noble and uſeful invention, we cannot paſs by a pathetic reply which a German made to a Frenchman, who allowed, indeed, that the Germans were generally good mechanics, but in other caſes, ſaid, that they had but a low and groveling genius, and no wit. To which the German gravely aſked the following queſtion. "Pray, Sir, which of the two nations "ſhewed the brighter genius; ours, which invented the art of "printing; or yours which condemned the inventor of it to the "flames for a conjurer?" For it plainly appears, that the parliament of Paris had condemned John Fauſt to be burnt for magic, and that he with great difficulty obtained his pardon, at the expence of diſcovering his new invention to the archbiſhop of Paris (46).

(T) The runæ, or antient characters, are ſuppoſed to have been called ſo ab incidendo, from cutting out, becauſe they were either

(45) See Palmer's hiſtory of printing, l. i. c. 2, & ſeq. l. ii. c. 1, & ſeq. (46) Vide Peliſſon. ap. eund.

BEFORE we finiſh this ſection, it will not be amiſs to ſay ſomething concerning the character and genius of the antient Germans, which was pretty near the ſame through all that large country. They are generally deſcribed to us by Greek and Roman authors as reſembling one another, and differing from other nations by the largeneſs of their ſtature, ruddy complexion, blue eyes, and yellow and buſhy hair, haughty and threatening looks, ſtrong conſtitutions, and proof againſt hunger, cold, and all kinds of hardſhip [n]. Nothing could be more conducive to their bodily ſtrength than their coarſe diet, their living in huts rather than houſes, their conſtant and ſtrenuous exerciſes, and inuring themſelves betimes to all kinds of fatigue; to which Tacitus joins another thing, which is not, perhaps, quite ſo authentic, viz. their drinking of ſtrong liquors made of barley or wheat [o], and which they drank either cut out of wooden blocks, or cut into the bark of ſome trees (47), and in a very rude manner. The antienteſt author who appears to have made mention of thoſe runæ, is Venantius Fortunatus, who lived about the beginning of the 6th century; he ſpeaks of them as being uſed by the Franks, whoſe manner of writing, as well as of the Goths, was yet but coarſe and uncouth. He gives us their method of painting, or rather graving them upon wooden planks, which were called runæ. The Germans have retained the ſame etymon in their language, in calling their letters buchſtaben, which implies their being engraven on wood, and in ſtrait lines (48). It has been much diſputed whether thoſe letters were Latin or Greek, and much has been urged on both ſides; but a ſepulchral inſcription, dug up at Rome, and the only one, perhaps, that has been preſerved of that old character, ſhews them to have been moſtly Greek, with here and there a Roman one (49). Some old coins alſo confirm it, in ſome of which the legend is wholly Greek, and in others, partly that, and partly Latin (50). And this is, in all probability, the character which is, by Venantius above quoted, called the runic, and was, at that time, common to all the Europeans; only among the northern nations they were very coarſe and ill-ſhaped, in compariſon of the reſt.

Genius and character.

Robuſtneſs.

[n] Tacit. Germ. c. 4. & 30. Horat. epod. xvi. v. 7. Juvenal. ſatir. xiii. Auſon. idyl. vii. Comment, l. i. c. 39. Apol. l. viii. c. 9, & al. [o] Tacit. ubi ſupra, c. 23.

(47) See Celſius's letter to Mr. Vignoles, ann. 1733. ap. Pellyutier, ubi ſupra, l. ii. c. 10. (48) Idem ibid. (49) Vide Relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 4. (50) Bouteroue, ubi ſupra, p. 43, 62, & ſeq.

drank in large quantities. Cæsar adds, that their animal spirits not being exhausted in their youth by study, learning, or any troublesome occupations, nor enervated by early amours and gallantry, their bodies were more apt to grow large and robust [p]. Pliny attributes much of this to the temperateness of their climate [q]; but though it be true, that the perspiration is not so copious in such cold countries, yet it may be much doubted whether this doth so much contribute to the growth and strength of their inhabitants: on the contrary, experience shews, that there are very small people in some of the coldest climates, as in Lapland; and very gigantic ones in some of the warmest, as among some of the Ethiopians, as the same author justly observes. What may have farther contributed to the strength and stature of the Germans, was, their never or rarely intermarrying with other nations, nor adopting any of their soft customs; by which means, they transmitted these qualities to their children pure and uncorrupted [r].

Valour and fidelity.

THEIR native disposition displayed itself chiefly in their martial genius, and in their singular fidelity. The former of these they did indeed carry to such an excess, as came little short of downright ferocity; but as to the latter, they not only valued themselves highly upon it, but were greatly esteemed by other nations for it; insomuch that Augustus, and several of his successors, committed the guard of their persons to them, and almost all other nations either courted their friendship and alliance, or hired them as auxiliaries: though it must be owned, at the same time, that their extreme love of liberty, and their hatred of tyranny and oppression, has often hurried them to treachery and murder, especially when they have thought themselves ill used by those who hired them: for, in all such cases, they were easily stirred up, and extremely vindictive. In other cases, Tacitus tells us, they were noble, magnanimous, and beneficent, without ambition to aggrandize their dominions, or invading those from whom they received no injury; rather chusing to employ their strength and valour defensively, than offensively; to preserve their own, than to ravage their neighbours [s].

Hospitality.

Their friendship and intercourse was rather a compound of honest bluntness and hospitality, than of wit, humour, or gallantry.

[p] Comment. l. iv. c. 1. [q] Nat. hist. l. ii. c. 78.
[r] Tacit. ubi supra, c. 4. Conring. de habit. antiq. & nov. corp. Germ. causis. Malcov. Lediard Germ. l. ii. c. 32. [s] Tacit. Germ. c. 35.

lantry. All ſtrangers were ſure to meet with a kind reception from them, to the utmoſt of their ability; even thoſe who were not in a capacity to entertain them, made it a piece of duty to introduce them to thoſe who could; and nothing was looked upon as more ſcandalous and deteſtable, than to refuſe them either the one, or the other [t]. They do not ſeem, indeed, to have had a taſte for grand and elegant entertainments; they affected in every thing, in their houſes, furniture, diet, &c. rather plainneſs and ſimplicity, than ſumptuouſneſs and luxury. If they learned of the Romans and Gauls the uſe of money, it was rather becauſe they found it more convenient than their antient way of bartering one commodity for another; and then they preferred thoſe antient coins which had been ſtamped during the times of the Roman liberty, eſpecially ſuch as were either milled or cut in the rims, becauſe they could not be ſo eaſily cheated in them, as in ſome others, which were frequently nothing but copper, or iron, plated over with ſilver. This laſt metal they likewiſe preferred before gold, not becauſe it made a greater ſhew, but becauſe it was more convenient for buying and ſelling [u]. And as they became, in time, more feared by, or more uſeful to, the Romans, ſo they learned how to draw enough of it from them to ſupply their whole country, beſides what flowed to them from other nations. Money.

As they deſpiſed ſuperfluities in other caſes, ſo they did alſo in the connubial way; every man was contented with one wife (U), and both were ſo faithful to each other, and chaſte, true, and diſintereſted, in their conjugal affections, that Tacitus prefers their manners, in this reſpect, to thoſe of the Romans. The men ſought not dowries from their wives, but beſtowed them upon them [w]. Their youth, in thoſe cold climes, did not begin ſo ſoon to feel the warmth of love, as they do in hotter ones; and it was a common rule with them, not to marry young; and thoſe were moſt eſteemed, who continued longeſt in celibacy; becauſe they looked upon it as an effectual means to make them grow tall and ſtrong: and to marry, or be concerned with a woman, before they were full Marriages.

[t] Ibid. c. 2. [u] Idem ibid. c. 5. [w] Ibid. c. 20.

(U) Our author, however, excepts ſome caſes, which yet were not frequent among them, as when any of their princes or noblemen allowed themſelves a plurality of wives, more, ſays he (50), out of grandeur and oſtentation, than wantonneſs.

(50) Tacit. ubi ſupra, c. 18.

full twenty years old, was accounted shameful wantonness [x].

Unjustly charged with incestuous commerce.

They have been, indeed, unjustly taxed with permitting a promiscuous and unnatural commerce of parents with their children, brothers with their sisters, and the like; but the only thing that seems to have given a colour to this pretended incestuous mixture was, their living together in their plain and homely cottages, and the whole family lying promiscuously in the straw, and stark-naked: which custom, though shocking to more polite nations, yet, being natural to them, was much more likely to restrain such unnatural commerce, than give birth to it. But though they did lie thus together in the same hut, yet we can scarcely doubt but nature taught them to observe some decency; and that the husband and wife lay in some corner apart, and the boys and girls at a convenient distance from each other. We may add, that such a brutish intermixture is quite opposite to that care which they took to keep their youth chaste and unmarried, till after twenty; and to that conjugal fidelity for which they are so justly admired. The women shared with their husbands not only the care of their family, and the education of their children, but even the hardships of war. They attended them in the field, dressed their victuals for them, dressed their wounds, stirred them up to fight manfully against their enemies, and sometimes have, by their courage and bravery, recovered a victory, when it has been upon the point of being snatched from them. In a word, they looked upon such constant attendance on them not as a servitude, like the Roman dames, but as a duty, and an honour. We find, in most parts of Germany, especially where vassalage is still in use, some notable relics of this antient female submission; we have even lately seen some remarkable, and, as they appeared to us, shocking instances of it here, in those Palatines and Saltsburghers whom persecution and distress drove hither for shelter; young, hale, and lusty fellows, sauntring along, with their pipes in their mouths, and a staff under their arm, whilst their obsequious wives trudged and sweated after them under a load of their cloaths and other lumber, and a child or two in their arms (W). But what appears to have been still a harder fate upon [x] Cæs. com. l. vi. c. 21.

(W) We have ourselves taken upon us to reprove their husbands for it, and told them, in a friendly manner, that our nation was much offended at it; but have been gravely answered by their passive dames, that it was the fashion in their country, and that it upon the antient German dames was, that their great Odinus excluded all thoſe from his valhalla, or paradiſe, who did not, by ſome violent death, follow their deceaſed huſbands thither. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of it in the next paragraph, and conclude this with an obſervation, that, notwithſtanding their having been antiently in ſuch high repute for their wiſdom, and ſuppoſed ſpirit of prophecy, and their continuing ſuch faithful and tender helpmates to their huſbands, yet they ſunk, in time, ſo low in their eſteem, that, according to the old Saxon law, he that hurt or killed a woman, was to pay but half the fine that he ſhould have done, if he had hurt or killed a man [y].

THERE is ſcarcely any one thing in which the Germans, though ſo nearly allied in moſt of their other cuſtoms to the Gauls, were yet more oppoſite to them than in their funerals. We have ſhewn, in the laſt chapter, with what pomp and profuſion the latter performed theirs; thoſe of the former were done with the ſame plainneſs and ſimplicity which they affected in all other things: the only grandeur they affected in them was, to burn the bodies of their great men with ſome peculiar kinds of wood; but then the funeral pile was neither adorned with the cloaths and other fine furniture of the deceaſed, nor perfumed with fragrant herbs and gums: each man's armour, that is, his ſword, ſhield, and ſpear, were flung into it, and ſometimes his riding horſe [z]. The Danes did, indeed, fling into the funeral of a prince, gold, ſilver, and other precious things, which the chief mourners, who walked, in a gloomy guiſe, round the fire, exhorted the by-ſtanders to fling liberally into it, in honour of the deceaſed [a]. They afterwards repoſited their aſhes in urns, like the Gauls, Romans, and other nations; as it plainly appears, from the vaſt numbers which have been dug up all over the country, as well as from the ſundry diſſertations which have been written upon them by ſeveral learned moderns of that nation, a liſt and account of Their funerals.

[y] Specul. Sax. l. i. c. 45. [z] Vide Keyzler de mulier. fatidic. c. 2. [a] Saxo-Gram. l. viii. Keyzler ant. ſeptr. p. 115.

it would caſt a much greater diſgrace on their good men to help them off with any ſhare of the burden. And what appeared ſtill more ſurpriſing was, when theſe poor women have been offered a draught of ale or beer to refreſh them, they have deſired it might be given to their husbands, for that themſelves could drink water: ſo great is the force of education and cuſtom.

of which the reader may ſee in the author laſt quoted [b]. One thing we may obſerve, in general, that, whatever ſacrifices they offered for their dead, whatever preſents they made to them at their funerals, and whatever other ſuperſtitious rites they might perform at them, all was done in conſequence of thoſe excellent notions which their antient religion had taught them, the immortality of the ſoul, and the bliſs or miſery of a future life [c].

Notions of the ſtate of ſouls after death.

It is impoſſible, indeed, as they did not commit any thing to writing till very lately, and as none of the antient writers have given us any account of it, to gueſs how ſoon this belief of their great Odin, and his paradiſe, was received among them. It may, for aught we know, have been older than the times of Tacitus, and he have known nothing of it, by reaſon of their ſcrupulous care of concealing their religion from ſtrangers: but as they conveyed their doctrines to poſterity by ſongs and poems, and moſt of the northern poets tell us, that they have drawn their intelligence from thoſe very poems which were ſtill preſerved among them; we may, rightly enough, ſuppoſe, that whatever doctrines are contained in them, were formerly profeſſed by the generality of the nation, eſpecially ſince we find their antient practice ſo exactly conformable to it. Thus, ſince the ſureſt road to this paradiſe was, to excel in martial deeds, and to die intrepidly in the field of battle, and ſince none were excluded from it but baſe cowards, and betrayers of their country, it is natural to think, that the ſignal and exceſſive bravery of the Germans flowed from this antient belief of theirs: and, if their females were ſo brave and faithful, as not only to ſhare with their huſbands all the dangers and fatigues of war, but, at length, to follow them, by a voluntary death, into the other world; it can hardly be attributed to any thing elſe but a ſtrong perſuaſion of their being admitted to live with them in that place of bliſs. This belief, therefore, whether received originally from the old Celtes, or afterwards taught them by this, ſince deified, Odin, ſeems, from their general practice, to have been univerſally received by all the Germans, though they might differ one from another in their notions of that future life (X).

In

[b] P. 109, & ſeq. [c] Vide Diod Sicul. hiſt. l. v. Am. Marcel. l. xv. Cæſ. com. l. vi. c. 14. Strab. Mela, & al.

(X) What the bliſs of this paradiſe conſiſted in, we have already ſeen; but, beſides this, there are ſome notions attributed to them, by theſe writers lately mentioned, which do not ſeem to ſquare altogether

In general, they ſeem to have had a twofold notion of this future ſtate, the one to precede, and the other to come after, what they called, in their language, ragna rockur, or the crepuſcule of the gods, or heroes; by which they meant the conſummation of all things by a general conflagration [d]. So that, according to them, there was to be a future life of bliſs and miſery, till the deſtruction of the world; and another which was to follow it preſently after, when a new ſun, new heavens, and a new earth, were to be created, and in them a place of endleſs happineſs for the good, and another of endleſs miſery for the bad: which notion one would be apt to imagine they had imbibed from the chriſtians, did it not appear, from Seneca, to have been the doctrine of the ſtoics; unleſs we ſhould ſuppoſe that author had it rather from ſome of the apoſtles [e], or their diſciples, than from his own ſect (Y). However that be, ſome of the circumſtances, which theſe old Germans believed would attend this general conflagration, ſeem to us to have been taken from the apocalypſe, and adapted to their own antient notions and taſte: we ſhall give

[d] Eddæ mythol. 30, & 48. Eivind. Scaldaſpiler. & al. ap. Keyzler. ubi ſupra, p. 119, & ſeq. [e] Conf. 2 Pet. c. iii. v. 7, & ſeq. Senec. quæſt. nat. l. iii. & conſolat. ad Marcian. Ovid. metamorph. l. ii.

together with it (51): ſuch as that of the tranſmigration of ſouls, which, if we may believe ſome antient chriſtian writers (52), Pythagoras received from them. We have ſhewn, in the laſt chapter, that the Gauls were unjuſtly charged with adopting the ſame notion; and the ſame thing may, for aught appears, have been done with reſpect to the Germans. But if theſe had any ſuch belief amongſt them, it can only be reconciled with that of Odin's paradiſe, by ſuppoſing the latter to be reſerved for their brave and enterpriſing heroes; whilſt the reſt, who had no title to it, were left to tranſmigrate from body to body, more or leſs noble and happy, according to their merit or demerit, in a continual rotation, till the conſummation of all things.

(Y) It is not to be doubted, that the doctrine of a general conflagration was believed by many antient nations, as we have had occaſion to ſhew at the beginning of this work; but Seneca, in the place laſt quoted, ſpeaks of it in ſuch a manner, as makes one believe he had converſed with ſome chriſtians, or, at leaſt, ſome Jewiſh

(51) See Keizler. ubi ſupra, p. 116, & ſeq. & auct. ab eo citat. (52) Clem. Alex. ſtrom. l. vi. Euſeb. præp. l. x. c. 2.

Unnatural customs.

give our readers some few instances of this in the margin (Z), they being scarcely worth mentioning any where else. We shall finish this section with observing, that the notion of a future happiness obtained by martial exploits, especially by dying sword in hand, made them bewail the fate of those who lived to an old age, as dishonourable here, and hopeless hereafter: upon which account, they had a barbarous way to send them

Jewish rabbies, from whom he had adopted many particulars, which the stoics, till then, knew nothing of.

(Z) They tell you, among other things, the old earth being thus destroyed, a new one is to start up out of the sea, which will produce all things necessary and delightful to its inhabitants; and that the males and females which escape the general destruction are quickly to replenish it with a more hopeful offspring: that on the south side of heaven there is a court vastly brighter than the sun itself, and which will be proof against the flames which are to destroy the rest of the creation; and there it is that the good will be preserved for that new and endless life. That the general destruction is to be preceded by the most severe seasons, bloody wars, enormous crimes, &c. after which, two monstrous wolves are to be let loose, who shall devour sun, moon, and stars. That the rainbow, by which the souls of the good went up to heaven, will be broken down. That some of the asæ, or deified heroes, shall begin an unsuccessful war, and Odin himself be devoured by one of the wolves; after which, the universe is to be set on fire: that there is another court, as dismal as the other is glorious, whose gates open towards the north; the fences of it are woven with the hinder-parts of venomous serpents, whose heads are all turned towards the inside of it, and cast continual streams of deadly poison, which infects all the rivers round it, through which the wicked are forced to wade; and much more to the like purpose.

We shall not trouble ourselves further, to enquire whence those northern poets drew all this mythological rhapsody; but only observe, from the whole, that they plainly appear not to have had so high an opinion of their country, as some of a moderner date, who have taken a vast deal of pains to prove, that the earthly paradise was situate there, and that they, especially Suedland, afforded every thing that is useful and delightful to mankind (53); for if those old ones had entertained any such favourable opinion of these cold regions, they would hardly have made them the abode of miserable souls, and removed the seats of the blessed to the southern side of the universe (54).

(53) Rudbeck. Olai Atlantic. & al. ubi supra, p. 123.

(54) Vide Keyzler.

them packing into the other world, willing or not willing. And this cuſtom laſted ſeveral ages after their receiving chriſtianity, eſpecially among the Pruſſians and Venedi; the former of whom, it ſeems, diſpatched, by a quick death, not only their ſick children, ſervants, &c. but even their parents, and ſometimes themſelves [f]: and of the latter we have inſtances of this horrid parricide being practiſed even in the beginning of the 14th century [g]. All that need be added is, that, if thoſe perſons, thus ſuppoſed to have lived long enough, either deſired to be put to death, or, at leaſt, ſeemed chearfully to ſubmit to what they knew they could not avoid, their exit was commonly preceded with a feaſt, and their funeral with another; but if they endeavoured to ſhun it, as it ſometimes happened, both ceremonies were performed with the deepeſt mourning. In the former they rejoiced at their deliverance, and being admitted into bliſs; in the latter they bewailed their cowardly excluding themſelves from it. Much the ſame thing was done towards thoſe wives who betrayed a backwardneſs to follow their dead huſbands. We need not here obſerve, that, in theſe funerals, as well as in all their other feaſts, they were famed for drinking to exceſs; and one may ſay of them, above all the other deſcendents of the antient Celtes, that their hoſpitality, banquets, &c. conſiſted much more in the quantity of ſtrong liquors, than in the elegance of eating. Beer, and ſtrong mead, which were their natural drink, were looked upon as the chief promoters of health, ſtrength, fertility, and bravery; upon which account, they made no ſcruple to indulge themſelves to the utmoſt in them, not only in their feaſts, and eſpecially before an engagement, but even in their common meals. Tacitus tells us, that they could bear neither heat nor thirſt; and that they thought it no diſgrace to ſpend whole days and nights in quaffing [h]: ſo that though they were in no caſe more invincible than in this, yet if you plied them with enough of it, you could not fail of overcoming them [i]. As for wine, though they at firſt betrayed an exceſſive fondneſs for it, yet they quickly found by experience, that it only tended to enervate and emaſculate the men, and obſtructed the fecundity of the women; for which reaſon ſome of them, eſpecially the Suevi, forbad the importation of it [k]. And it is thought, to this day, that the Exceſſive love of ſtrong liquors.

[f] See Chriſtoph. Hartknoch. antiq. Pruſſia, diſſert. xiii. [g] Mareſcale annal. Herul. & Vandal. l. ii. c. 8. Krantz. Vandal. l. vii. Keyzler. ubi ſupra, p. 147, & ſeq. [h] Germ. c. 4, & 22. [i] Ibid. c. 23. Vide & Julian. miſopog. p. 352. [k] Cæſar. comment. l. iv. c. 2.

degeneracy of the modern Germans, in this respect, as well as that of the Gauls, Spaniards, and other nations, is, in a great measure, owing to their exchanging their old natural liquors for the foreign juice of the grape [1].

[1] Keyzler. ubi supra, c. 6. § 6.

SECT. III.

The history of the antient Germans.

The antient history of the Germans unknown.

WE have taken notice, at the beginning of this chapter, that the most antient historians, both Greek and Roman, have so injudiciously confounded the whole German nation under the names of Scythians and Celtes, and that Tacitus himself, who had conversed so much amongst them, is, in some cases, so manifestly fabulous, and, in many others, so obscure and inconsistent, that no tolerable certainty can be expected, either with relation to their origin, or antient history, except we can strike out some light from better hands, and from some such concurring circumstances as may add weight to their testimony. This, we hope, we have done, in some measure, with relation to the first of these two points; but it is much more difficult to adjust the latter to any satisfaction, considering what a vast number of nations are comprehended in the general name of Germans, their constant fluctuations, and driving each other from place to place, their various intermixtures with each other, till the name of the one was quite swallowed up in the other; that many of them did, in time, come to differ widely from the rest, in their customs, government, laws, and politics; and others are scarcely known to us by any thing but their names; and especially, considering that none of them wrote any thing of their own affairs, and that both Romans and Greeks had but a very confused, if any knowledge of them, till the Romans did, by their wars and commerce with them, open a more easy way to it (A). Upon these accounts, we must be contented to

(A) It is plain, that, before the Romans came over the Alps, they had so little knowledge of them, that they confounded them with the Gauls, and called both nations by that name. The general one of Germans doth not, indeed, appear to have been of so early date as some have thought it, as we have shewn at the beginning of this chapter; so that each nation being distinguished by their peculiar names, unknown then to the Romans, it was natural for to ſet down the epocha between the coming and ſettling of the former in the ſeveral parts of Germany, and the invaſion of the latter, for dark and uncertain, and as impenetrable as their famed Hercynian foreſt; except what we have been able to gather from thoſe authors concerning their names, ſituation, and ſome few other particulars, which we have already, or ſhall have occaſion to mention, in the ſequel of this ſection.

WHAT occaſioned the Romans breaking in upon Germany, as they did upon all other nations they could come at, we have already ſeen, in the courſe of the Roman hiſtory [a]; the Germans were then ſo far from being formed into one ſingle community, that they were divided into a vaſt number of ſmall kingdoms and commonwealths. They might, indeed, look upon themſelves, in general, as a nation deſcended originally from the ſame ſtock, and ſo have ſome laws in common to them all, either for the ſupporting of each other for theſe to include them all under the name of Celtes, Gauls, and Galatæ, as they were ſo nearly allied in their origin, religion, cuſtoms, &c.

[a] See vol. xii. p. 17, & ſeq.

There is, indeed, one paſſage, in the faſti Capitolini (1), in which mention is made of that great victory ſo much cried up by Virgil and other writers (2), which Marcellus gained over Viridomarus and his Gauls, who are here joined with the Inſubri and Germans, and which, if this laſt name be not corrupted by the tranſcriber, will plainly ſhew it to have been longer in uſe than we ſuppoſe it. But a late writer hath ſhewed it very probable, at leaſt, both from the ſimilitude of the names, and other concurring circumſtances, that Germani is here tranſcribed, inſtead of Cenomani (3); for theſe were not only next neighbours to the Inſubri, and concerned with them in the ſame war againſt the Romans, but were defeated with them, not long after, by Cethegus, who, thereupon, triumphed over them both at the ſame time (4).

This Viridomarus is by ſome ſtyled a king, and by others a general of the Gauls (5); and his invaſion threw the Romans into ſuch a conſternation, that, to turn away the impending evil, they were guilty of that inhuman piece of ſuperſtition we have mentioned out of Plutarch, in a former volume (6).

(1) Sub an. U. C. 531. (2) Æneid. vi. v. 855, & ſeq. (3) Maſcov. Germ. l. i. c. 4. (4) Faſt. Capitol. ſub an. U. C. 556. (5) Plutarch. in Marcel. Polyb. l. ii. Flor. l. ii. c. 4, & al. (6) See before, vol. xiv. p. 598.

againſt foreign invaders, or for the preſervation of a due balance amongſt their vaſt variety of commonwealths; but, in other things, each had its particular form of government, laws, policy, and intereſt. They were all of them bred up with an exceſſive love of liberty, and hatred to all kinds of invaſion; and could not, but with jealouſy and reſentment, behold the daily encroachments which the Romans continually made on all their neighbours, or, conſequently, without uniting themſelves more cloſely againſt them, and aſſiſting thoſe of their neighbours, who were likely to fall the next ſacrifice to their ambition; as we have ſeen they did, with reſpect to the Gauls, Helveti, and other neighbouring ſtates. Hence aroſe thoſe wars and conqueſts which ended in their total conqueſt; for the politic Romans ſoon took the advantage of their being divided into ſo many different republics; and by fomenting jealouſies among ſome of them, bribing and corrupting others, and by uſing all their force and art againſt the reſt, they found means to ſubdue them gradually, and by piece-meal: ſo that one ſtate after the other fell a prey to their conquering arms, till the whole country was reduced into a Roman province. This part, therefore, of their hiſtory, is not to be looked upon as a general one of a whole nation, but as a ſeparate one of ſuch a number of different ſtates ſubdued one after the other, and in a great meaſure independently one from the other, till we come to that period of time the Franks brought and united all the other Germans, who remained in thoſe countries, together with many other Roman provinces, under their dominion. For this reaſon, and becauſe a full and particular account has been given of all theſe conqueſts in the Roman hiſtory, we ſhall, to avoid all unneceſſary repetitions, content ourſelves with giving a chronological ſummary of the reduction of each of theſe nations, till we come to the grand epocha of the Franks above-mentioned; and refer our readers to the volume and page where each of them is more fully and ſeverally mentioned. For the Roman hiſtory being not only the moſt conſiderable one in this whole work, in all reſpects, but being, as it were, the baſis, or pivot, on which that of all the nations they ſubdued doth chiefly turn, we thought it would render it more complete, uſeful, and inſtructive, to give them all in one view, or ſeries, in that part of it, than if we had detached them from the main body, and branched then out into ſo many diſtinct parts of hiſtory; which could hardly have been done without either great confuſion, or endleſs repetitions. From the conqueſt of Germany by the Romans, our next point in view will

The deſign of this ſection.

will be, to ſhew by what means they regained their liberty, and made ſuch ample repriſals upon their conquerors under the Franks; and as the defection of theſe gave riſe to the German empire, which will make a conſiderable part in our modern hiſtory, which is to follow, we ſhall, to avoid confuſion, give the hiſtory of all thoſe ſeveral nations, and of thoſe kingdoms which they erected in other countries, in their ſeveral tranſmigrations, each in a diſtinct chapter, and confine ourſelves, in the latter part of this, to mentioning the moſt conſiderable of thoſe other countries which have been ſince conquered and poſſeſſed by the Germans who now inhabit the empire, at leaſt as far as will be neceſſary to open the way to the modern hiſtory of it.

Germany invaded by the Gauls.

BUT before we come to the Roman invaſion, it will be neceſſary to mention ſome tranſactions, relating to the antient Germans, which are previous to it, and have yet been but touched upon; the firſt of which is, the Gauliſh irruption into their territories, under the conduct of Sigoveſus, whilſt his brother, Belloveſus, made the like over the Alps. Theſe two valiant princes were ſons to the ſiſter of Ambigatus, a king of the Celtæ, or Gauls, about the time of Tarquinius Priſcus. That monarch, finding his ſubjects to encreaſe too faſt for the extent of his territory, reſolved to ſend two large colonies out of it, to ſettle ſomewhere elſe, under the conduct of his two nephews. Theſe being directed, as the Gauliſh manner then was, by the flight of birds, the former of theſe was directed over the Rhine, and ſettled in the Hercynian foreſt [b], whilſt the other went and penetrated into Italy, as we have ſeen in a former volume [c] (B). Whether the Germans had any hand in this latter expedition, doth not clearly

[b] Livy decad. I. v. c. 34. [c] Vol. xi. p. 576.

(B) We find, however, no farther mention of the former colony, and their ſettlement in Germany, unleſs we ſuppoſe, that it is of them which Julius Cæſar ſpeaks, when he informs us of a Gauliſh nation, which in his time inhabited the heart of Germany, along the Hercynian foreſt, and all the moſt fertile parts of that country between the Rhine and that famed wood, and had entirely conformed themſelves to the cuſtoms and manners of that country (7). Tacitus, likewiſe, by placing the Boii and Helvetii much about the very ſpot of ground, and making them both to be deſcended from the Gauls (8), doth, in all probability, mean the very ſame nation and colony with Cæſar and Livy.

(7) Comment. l. vi. c. 24. (8) German. c. 28.

clearly appear, for the reaſons mentioned in the laſt note. Only if the regions lying at the foot of the Apennine hills were at that time inhabited by Germans, or ſemi-Germans, as Livy calls them [d], there is no queſtion to be made but they might be hurried, by thoſe Gauliſh ſwarms, to follow them in thoſe excurſions, and ſhare in thoſe devaſtations and pillages, which they committed. But hitherto it doth not appear, that the reſt of the German nation were at all concerned in them, ſince Tacitus gives them this peculiar character, that they rather ſtudied how to preſerve their own, than how to invade the territories of others [e]; and it is moſt likely, that they did not begin to act offenſively againſt the Romans, at leaſt, till they were alarmed at the greatneſs of their power, and the daily encroachments they made round about them. Swarms of colonies they muſt be ſuppoſed to have ſent abroad, to prevent the want of elbow-room, as they multiplied ſo faſt: but there was ſo much of that to ſpare towards the north parts of Europe, and ſo little on the ſouth parts, where they were, moreover, ſure to meet with a ſtout oppoſition, that they poured moſt of them towards the other way, at leaſt till the Gauls did, in ſome meaſure, oblige them to make repriſals upon them.

THE firſt of theſe we meet with, and which, in all appearance, is of much later date than that of Segoveſus into Germany, is that of the Belgæ, one of the fierceſt, and moſt warlike nations of Germany; who, having paſſed the Rhine, and driven the Gauls out of a canton of it, ſeated themſelves ſo firmly in it, that neither their neighbours, whom they continually annoyed, nor any other nation, could ever drive them out of it. Cæſar adds, that they were not a little proud of this their ſettlement, and that they aſſumed a high hand over all their neighbours [f]; and we have elſewhere obſerved, that they were, probably, called Belgæ, upon that account, that word, in the old Teutonic, ſignifying fierce and quarrelſome [g] (C). They afterwards peopled the coaſts of Britain, and [d] Decad. l. xxi. c. 28. [e] Germ. c. 35. [f] Comment. l. ii. c. 4. [g] See before, p. 393, note (A).

(C) And which is the character Cæſar gives them, and attributes this roughneſs of theirs to their living at a diſtance from the more civilized provinces of Gaul, and having few or no foreign merchants to trade with them, and bring them ſuch commodities as ſerve to effeminate mankind (9).

(9) Comment. l. i. c. 1.

and drove the natives into the inland parts, and waged continual wars with the Germans [h]. We have already given an account of theſe Belgæ, of their origin, wars with the Romans, and reduction to their yoke, in a former volume, to which we refer our readers [i]. From this irruption of the Belgæ into Gaul, which is the firſt the German nation made upon them, at leaſt that we read of, theſe two nations continued in a kind of alternate ſtate of hoſtility and friendſhip, as occaſion ſerved; ſometimes invading each other's territories, at other times aſſiſting each other againſt the Romans, as we have had frequent occaſion to hint in the laſt chapter, and ſhall again in this: but it is time that we ſhould ſpeak of thoſe wars and defeats which the ſeveral German nations waged againſt the Romans, the defeats they received from them, and by which they were ſubdued by them, in the ſuccinct method and order of time, as we have promiſed.

Cimbri invade Italy.

THE firſt we read of, who ventured to invade the Roman territories, were the Cimbri and Teutones: we have already ſpoken of their antient ſettlement, the former in the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, and the latter on the coaſts and iſles of the Baltic [k]; but whether, for want of room there, or, perhaps, invited by the beauty of a warmer clime, both theſe (D) marched,

[h] Comment. l. i. c. 1.
[i] See vol. xiii. p. 16, (X). p. 30.
[k] See before, p. 574.

(D) It doth not, indeed, appear, that theſe two nations began their firſt excurſions jointly, or at the ſame time, much leſs, that they all left their territories, for they left a much greater number behind; but only that ſome of the reſoluteſt of each reſolved to exchange them for new ones. It is more likely, that, upon the ſight of the vigorous oppoſition they were likely to meet with from the conſular armies, and under ſuch experienced generals, the Cimbri invited the Teutones, who were their neighbours, to come and join them, as they did ſome others, both Germans and Gauls, through whoſe territories they paſſed; particularly the Tigurini and Ambrones, who are mentioned in the ſame invaſion (10). They parted, indeed, from them all, upon what account doth not appear; but, inſtead of purſuing their Italic invaſion, marching toward the Pyrenees, and being there repulſed by the Celtiberi, they rejoined the Teutones again, and made ſad havock in Gaul, which was then in no condition to withſtand them. They moved, at length, towards Italy, by ſeveral ways, and were forced to fight their way through each of them. It proved, however, a fatal expedition marched, with their wives and children, through, and ravaged, Noricum and Illyricum, penetrated into Italy, defeated the Romans, at ſeveral pitched battles [l], and threw all Italy into the greateſt conſternation [m]. In the firſt of theſe actions they vanquiſhed the famed conſul, Papirius Carbo; in another, M. Junius Silanus, another conſul, who was ſoon after called to a ſevere account for it; and, in a third, L. Caſſius; and, in a fourth, the brave M. Aurelius Scaurus, whom they took priſoner, and put to death, by their king, Bolos (E), for ſpeaking too boldly in praiſe of the Romans: but, after ſeveral other ſucceſſes in Italy, they were totally defeated and deſtroyed by the policy of conſul Marius [n]. For this general took care to poſt himſelf ſo advantageouſly, on the day of battle, that the Cimbri had not only his army, but the ſun, wind, and duſt, to combat with, and were the more eaſily overthrown, by that ſubtle ſtratagem (F). How greatly the Romans

(10) See vol. xii. p. 429, & 489.

Defeated by Marius.

[l] Vol. xii. p. 429, & ſeq. [m] Ibid. p. 494--497, & ſeq.
[n] Ibid. 498, paſſ.

expedition to them all, particularly to the Teutones, who, after having inſulted the Roman army with the moſt biting taunts (11), were cut off by them, to the number of 100,000, by the ſame victorious conſul (12).

(E) This is, in all likelihood, the ſame whom Plutarch calls Boiorix, king of the Gauls (13), but Livy Bolos, king of the Cimbri (14). We have formerly mentioned the murder of the brave Scaurus, by that young hot-headed prince, and the occaſion of it (15); and there we followed the former of theſe authors, though, moſt likely, the latter is in the right. We lately took notice, how apt the Greeks and Romans were to confound the Gauls and Germans; the Cimbri were, doubtleſs, antient Celtes, as their name imports, with reſpect to their origin; but Gauls they could not be, ſince they inhabited the moſt northern parts of Germany.

(F) This circumſtance we are beholden to Plutarch for (16), and need the leſs queſtion it, ſeeing that author had it out of Sylla's memoirs, who was himſelf in Marius's army, and had wrote a deſcription of this victory, beſides Catulus, who likewiſe left an account of his conſulſhip: and, perhaps, ſome other helps he might have had beſides. The deſcription which he and ſome others (17) give us of the order of battle of the Cimbrians, their accoutre-

(11) Ibid. p. 496. (12) In Mario. (13) Plutarch. ubi ſupra. (14) Epit. lxvii. (15) Vol. xii. p. 480, & ſeq. (16) In Mario. (17) Valer. Max. l. ii. c. 6. Vide & Artholin. de contempt. mort. ap. Danos.

Romans eſteemed this victory, may be ſeen by the triumph, and other ſingular honours which they decreed both to Marius, and to Catulus, as well as by the monuments which theſe cauſed to be reared in memory of it [o] (G). Thoſe Cimbri who eſcaped this dreadful ſlaughter, did, in all likelihood, return into their own country; for they are ſaid to have ſent afterwards a ſubmiſſive embaſſy to Auguſtus [p]; and are likewiſe mentioned, by authors of later date, as the moſt warlike of all the northern Germans [q], down to Claudian's time, who calls the north ſea by their name [r]. But it is likely the Saxons, their neighbours, joining with them in their excurſions, and growing, by degrees, more famous, the Cimbrian name was ſwallowed up in theirs [s].

Arioviſtus ſettles in Gaul, and forms a kingdom there.

THE next excurſion we find recorded of the Germans, is that which happened in Julius Cæſar's time, on occaſion of the jealouſy, which it is juſtly ſuppoſed that politic conqueror fomented between the Ædui and the Arverni, the then two moſt potent nations in Gaul; the former of whom being then in friendſhip with Rome, and the latter allied with the Sequani, theſe thought fit to call in the neighbouring Germans to their aſſiſtance. At firſt, only 15000 came over to them, but they accoutrements, weapons, valour, and intrepidity to the laſt, plainly ſhews what brave warriors they were, and that they only wanted ſome parts of the Roman diſcipline and policy to have made them, in all points, ſuperior to the conquerors of the world.

[o] See Plutarch. ubi ſupra. & vol. xiii. p. 498, & ſeq. [p] Strabo, l. vii. [q] Tacit. Germ. c. 37. Ptolem. l. ii. c. 11. [r] Conſul. Honor. p. 335, 450. [s] See Maſcov. in fin. l. i.

We are told, farther, that their wives behaved, in this action, with incredible bravery; and at length preferred an honourable death for themſelves and their children, to a diſhonourable captivity (18): and Seneca adds, that, after their death, their very dogs fought in defence of the carriages, which theſe heroines had loſt their lives for.

(G) Among theſe was the famed temple of Virtue, built by the former, and the brazen bull, which the latter is ſaid to have taken from them, and cauſed to be perſerved in his own houſe (19). What this bull was, hath puzzled moſt antiquaries, becauſe it is not mentioned by any other author: ſome think, that the Cimbrians had it upon their ſtandards, as the Romans had the eagles; others, that it was only a bullock's head (20); but all this is mere conjecture, and not worth dwelling upon.

(18) Plutarch. ubi ſupra. (19) N. Hiſt. l. viii. c. 41. (20) See Maſcov. & Lediard. l. i. c. 13. n. 1, & ſeq.

they became so enamoured with this delightful country, that, to keep their footing in it, they sent for fresh supplies from over the Rhine, insomuch that they amounted, at last, to 120000. The Sequani, by their assistance, soon subdued the Ædui, as we have formerly seen [t]; but their victory cost them dear, for they were forced by Arioviſtus, the German king, to evacuate one third part of their kingdom, to settle his troops in. He soon after obliged them to yield another third to him, as a setlement for 40000 Harudes, who crossed over to him, and, at the same time, did, by his address, induce Julius Cæsar, then consul, to allow him the title and honour of a king [u]. But it proved a short-lived kingdom, and Cæsar, who only caressed him for his own ends, soon found a specious pretence to dispossess him of it. The vast numbers of Germans which Arioviſtus had brought into Gaul, and the success which their bravery had gained them, could not but raise the Roman jealousy, and alarm not only the Sequani, but the greatest part of the Gauls, who thereupon applied to the consul with bitter complaints against the German devastations, and the danger they were in of being quickly swallowed up by them. Cæsar turned all this to his own advantage, and sent to desire an interview with the German prince, who found means to excuse himself from it, and to get six other nations, or cantons, to join with him, besides his own Suevi (H), and a fresh reinforcement of those which were hastening over to him; upon which, Cæsar made what haste he could towards him, to prevent their joining. A conference was, at length, agreed upon, in which Cæsar used some threats to him, and plainly told him, that the Romans would doubly resent his tyrannic use of their old friends the Ædui, after they had shewed him so much regard, and bestowed such honours upon him; and therefore insisted, that he should restore their hostages to them, send back part of his German troops, and forbear all future hostilities. To all this imperious stuff, [t] See before, vol. xiii. p. 13. [u] Dio, l. xxxviii.

(H) These were the Marcomans, Harudes, Tribochi, Vangiones, Nemetes, and Seduſii. We have given an account of these German nations, at the beginning of this chapter; besides these, the Treviri gave notice to Cæsar, that a fresh swarm of Suevi were got as far as the banks of the Rhine, under the command of Nasua and Cimberius, two brothers, who were just on the point to cross over into Gaul, and join the German army (21).

(21) Comment. l. i. c. 35, & seq.

ſtuff, Arioviſtus, in vain, pleaded the right of conqueſt, his being invited into Gaul, and his treaties with the Sequani, and even offered his ſervices and friendſhip to Cæſar himſelf: the conference was broken, and followed with a dreadful engagement, in which the Roman policy got the advantage of the German bravery (I), gave them a total overthrow [w], and forced [w] Cæſ. comment. l. i. c. 52, & ſeq.

(I) Cæſar played a double ſtratagem againſt them; the firſt, by animating his Roman and Gauliſh allies, with the pretence, that Arioviſtus had been guilty of the blackeſt treachery againſt him (22); which notion, whether true, or falſe, would not fail exaſperating them, and diſheartening the Germans: the other, by obliging them to fight before the new moon, which, he had been informed, both Germans and Gauls carefully avoided, as ominous to them: and accordingly, Arioviſtus ſtrove all he could to ſhun it, till the Romans fell ſuddenly upon him, and obliged him to fight, which both he, and his men, did, with greater fury than diſcretion; and being once put into diſorder, betook themſelves to a haſty flight, in ſpite of the cries and endeavours of their wives and children to rally them, and ſtopped not till they got ſafe over the Rhine.

The misfortune is, that we have no other account of theſe things but what Cæſar has been pleaſed to give us, who is evidently partial to his own nation, and much more to himſelf. Had they been written by a more impartial hand, it is likely we ſhould find them in a very different light from what he has given them. However, even as we have them from him, it is not difficult to diſcover ſuch inconſiſtencies as ſeem to us to carry their own confutation. Such as is that which he ſays of the Germans at this action, viz. that they formed themſelves into ſuch a thick and impenetrable phalanx, and held their ſhields ſo cloſe over their heads, that the Romans were forced to leap upon them, and tear them aſunder, and, ſinking down between them, kill thoſe who lurked under them, till they had opened a paſſage for their companions to come in upon them (23).

But Cæſar was not the only Roman writer who betrays ſuch fond partiality for the glory of that nation; the account which ſome of them give of the total overthrow of ſuch a vaſt army as that of the brave Cimbrians, and their allies, mentioned a little higher, and with the loſs of only 300 men on Marius's ſide (24), ſeems no leſs ſtretched beyond all probability, eſpecially conſidering how bravely they tell us the enemy behaved on this occaſion, and how much ſuperior they had proved in all former actions.

(22) See vol. xiii. p. 13. (23) Comment. ibid. c. 52.
(24) Vide Eutrop. & Flor. l. i. c. 14.

forced them over the Rhine, ſome by ſwimming, and others in boats, and, among the reſt, Arioviſtus himſelf, who, by what may be gueſſed by a paſſage in Cæſar, did not long outlive his diſgrace [x]. After this, the nations which fought under him diſperſed themſelves, the Marcomans into Boiohemum, under the conduct of Maroboduus; the Tribochi, Nemetes, and Vangiones, ſtayed in Gaul, or went over the Rhine, and ſubmitted, with the Ubii, to the Romans; for we find them ſtill ſeated along the banks of that river [y]. As for thoſe Suevi who were aſſembled on the ſame ſide, they retired, upon their receiving the news of this defeat; only a great number of them were cut off, in their flight, by the Ubii, who had been treated in a hoſtile manner by them [z]. And thus ended this ſecond expedition of the Germans into Gaul. On the very next year the Belgæ, alarmed at the ſucceſs of the Romans, formed a great alliance with the Celtes, Germans, and Gauls, in order to drive them farther from their neighbourhood. Cæſar, according to cuſtom, found means to ſow ſuch diviſions amongſt them, that many of thoſe allies ſubmitted to him; only the Nervii, Atrebates, and Veromandui, ſtood firm againſt him, and, though defeated at length, yet yielded him one of the deareſt victories he had ever got: ſo that the whole Belgic nation was forced to ſubmit to the Roman yoke [a]. Comius, a faithful dependent on Cæſar, was by him made king of the Atrebates, and ſoon gained a conſiderable authority over all that country [b]; the Atuati, about the ſame time hearing of theſe ſwift conqueſts, came in one body to the ſuccour of the Atrebates, and entertained no ſmall contempt of the Romans, when they found them ſo far inferior in ſtature: they were, however, ſoon undeceived, to their coſt, when, being briſkly beſieged by them in their capital, into which they had been forced to retire after the defeat of the Atrebates, and unable to obtain better terms than to ſurrender it at diſcretion, both their city, and all the garriſon of it, to the number of 53000, were ſold by the conqueror [c] (K).

The Belgæ ſubdued.

53000 Atuati ſold for ſlaves.

CÆSAR

[x] Ibid. l. v. c. 29. See vol. xiii. p. 13. [y] Tacit Germ. c. 28. [z] Comment. l. i. c. 54. [a] Ibid. l. ii. paſſ. See vol. xiii. p. 14---24. [b] Comment. l. iv. c. 21. [c] Ibid. c. 33, & ſeq.

(K) Cæſar, in his account of this action, ſeems to intimate, that he had extirpated the whole nation by it (24): for he ſays, that they

(24) Comment. l. ii. c. 29, & ſeq.

CÆSAR was, not long afterwards, forced into a war with two other German nations, viz. the Tencteri, and Uſipetes (L): theſe, having been forced out of their own territories by the Suevi, the fierceſt and moſt warlike of all the northern Germans, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel of this volume, had paſſed into Gaul, and ſettled themſelves in the neighbourhood of the Eburones and Condruſi. Cæſar was then at Rome, to obſtruct the cabals of Lucius Domitius againſt him, but was obliged to haſten into Gaul, to prevent their joining with that nation againſt the Romans. Upon his arrival, they ſent an embaſſy to acquaint him with the reaſons of their coming into that country, and to beg, that he would allow them ſettlements there, promiſing him, if he did, to ſerve him upon all occaſions; otherwiſe, that they would maintain their ground by force of arms. Cæſar not only refuſed to grant them their requeſt, but fell ſuddenly and furiouſly upon them, and made a terrible ſlaughter of them, together with their wives and children; and of thoſe who eſcaped, the greateſt part periſhed, with endeavouring to croſs the Maeſe [d]; only their cavalry, who happened not to be in the battle, croſſed the Rhine, and fled to the Sicambri, whoſe territories were ſited between thoſe two rivers. This, and the aſſiſtance which the Ubii about Cologn ſent to beg of him againſt the threatening Suevi, afforded him a pretence for building a bridge over the Rhine, to the great ſurpriſe of all the Germans (M), but eſpecially of the Sicambri, whoſe country they had all abandoned their cities and towns, and had ſheltered themſelves in this capital, where thoſe who eſcaped being killed in the ſiege, were all ſold for ſlaves. But they are found, in proceſs of time, to have made ſuch powerful head againſt the Romans, as ſhews plainly enough how apt that conqueror was to exaggerate every advantage he got againſt thoſe who fell under his hand.

Tencteri and Uſipetes defeated.

A bridge built over the Rhine.

What this capital was, he doth not tell us: Cluverius thinks it to have been Namur; if ſo, it is ſtrange that Cæſar, when he deſcribes the ſtrength of the place (25), ſhould ſay nothing of the Maeſe, on which that place is ſituate, and which could not but add conſiderable ſtrength to it.

(L) We have given an account of theſe two nations, and their country, in a former volume (26).

(M) The Ubii, indeed, offered to waft him over in their boats; but [d] Ibid. c. 1, & ſeq. See vol. xiii. p. 21.

(25) Ibid. c. 24. (26) Vol xiii. p. 20, note

try he ravaged at an unmerciful rate, set fire to their houses, cut down their corn, and returned to the Ubii; whilst they, at his approach, ran with all their effects into their forests, and exhorted the Tencteri and Usipetes to do the same[c]. This was the first time, in all likelihood, that the Romans set foot on the German territories, which became afterwards the scene of so much bloodshed on both sides, both under that conqueror, and his successors, and which ended in the almost total conquest of this brave nation. The Treviri were the first who gave an occasion to that general to invade their country, who doth not appear to have had any intention, upon his first entering Germany, to carry on a war against them, but only to keep them in awe, by convincing them, that he was not afraid to come to attack them in their own territories (N). However that be, the Treviri, grown jealous of the Romans, and of their own liberty (O), had, by their credit and valour, well nigh stirred up a general revolt in Gaul, which had groaned some time under the Roman yoke: this obliged Cæsar to send Labienus against them, whilst he went to the assistance of Cicero, who was, in some measure, besieged by the Nervii. We have given already a full account of all these transactions, [c] Comment. ubi supra, c. 7, & seq.

but the politic general told them, that it would be more for the honour of the Romans to build a bridge over that river; which it seems was the first attempt of that kind, they being used before to cross it in floats, and other slight and flat vessels. What encreased their surprise, if his account can be credited, was, that he finished it in ten days, and set a strong guard on each side of it. The reader may see this famed fabric described by himself (27).

(N) Cæsar had two other views, the one to shew the Germans, by the example of the Sicambri, how dangerous it was to exasperate the Romans; and the other, by the timely assistance he gave the Ubii against the Suevi, though for his own ends, to induce them to set a high value upon Roman friendship.

(O) They had been formerly reckoned a very powerful nation among the Germans (28), and having since passed the Rhine, had extended their dominions from that river quite to the country of the Rhemi. They had, a little before, shook off the Roman yoke, and were even reported to have invited other Germans to come, and assist them, and the Gauls in defence of their liberty (29); which occasioned their being defeated by Labienus, as has been elsewhere hinted (30).

(27) Comment. l. iv. c. 17. (28) Tacit. Germ. c. 28.
(29) Comment. l. v. c. 2. (30) See vol. xiii p. 33.

actions, in a former volume; for which reason, we shall refer our readers to them, as they are quoted in the margin, to avoid needless repetitions [f].

For the same reason we shall content ourselves with just recapitulating the principal and brave efforts which they made, upon all favourable conjunctures, for the recovery of their liberty, and the desperate wars which they renewed, and carried on, upon all proper occasions, against several Roman emperors, and during several centuries; till they had accomplished their end, and subdued their conquerors; and refer our readers to those parts of the Roman history, where they have been as fully treated of as could be done in a work of this extensive nature. It is not, indeed, to be supposed, that their insuperable love of liberty could suffer them to be longer patient under the Roman yoke, than till an opportunity offered itself for shaking it off; and this, in spite of the Roman caresses, policy, and vigilance, could not but often happen, considering the continual distractions of that unwieldy empire: neither could the ill success, which too often attended these attempts, discourage them from fresh ones: so that it would unavoidably draw us too far, to particularize them all here again; especially considering that they were, in process of time, divided into many distinct nations, and appear, in history, under several names; such as those of Franks, Alemans, Gepidæ, Burgundians, &c. of each of whom, as well as of the other considerable northern nations, such as the Hunns, Goths, Sueves, Dacians, Lombards, &c. we shall give a full history, in the subsequent chapters (P).

[f] See vol. xiii. p. 24, & seq. p. 29, 30, &c. p. 403, 404, &c.

(P) It will not, however, be amiss to advertise our readers here, that, as those nations branched out into a vast multitude of tribes, governments, and names, it will be impossible, in a work of this extent, to take notice of them all under separate articles, especially as many of them are known to us by little more than their names, or, at most, on account of some of their alliances with, or assisting other more considerable ones, and sharing with them either in some notable victory or defeat. Of such, we hope, it will be sufficient to speak occasionally, as we find them mentioned by antient authors, and to give the best account which can be found of them, in as few words as possible.

But of those who have made a greater figure in antient history, such as the Alemans, Gepidæ, Longobards, Vandals, Suevi, &c. among

WITH relation to the Germans in general, the moſt conſiderable tranſactions which remain to be taken notice of, are thoſe which follow, and which having been already ſpoken of in the preceding volumes, we ſhall here only recapitulate and refer our readers to the places quoted in the margin. In Auguſtus's reign, who, as we formerly took notice, had iſſued out ſome edicts againſt the inhuman ſuperſtitions of the druids [g], which, in all likelihood, affected both nations, the Germans took that opportunity to paſs the Rhine, and to ravage thoſe countries which were ſubject to him. Againſt them Agrippa was ſent, whoſe arrival ſo intimidated them, that they quickly repaſſed that river [h]. But whilſt he was gone into Spain, they repaſſed it, and defeated a body of Roman horſe, and afterwards the Gallic proconſul M. Lollius, from whom they carried off a ſtandard: but he ſoon recovered his honour, and drove them back again [i], with conſiderable loſs. All this while the Gauls were in great ferment, and meditating a general revolt; upon which he ſent Druſus thither to quell them, which he had no ſooner done [k], but he paſſed the Rhine, drove all before him, and penetrated almoſt to the German ocean [l].

THE famed revolt which happened among the Roman legions left in Pannonia, and which was happily quelled, in part, by Druſus, and afterwards wholly by Germanicus [m], gave occaſion for a freſh invaſion, which the laſt-mentioned general carried on with great ſucceſs, and much greater havock and ſlaughter of the Germans for fifty miles about; and, if we may believe Tacitus, without the loſs, or even the wounding of one ſingle Roman [n]. This action, which may be more properly called a maſſacre than a conqueſt (Q), alarmed among the antient Germans, the Huns, Goths, eaſtern and weſtern, and other Scythian nations, together with their migrations, ſettlements, wars, conqueſts, &c. they will be beſt treated of, each under a ſeparate chapter, according to the beſt accounts we can get from antient authors, and in ſuch a manner as may beſt open the way to the modern hiſtory of the German empire.

[g] See before, p. 564. [h] See vol. xiii. p. 397. [i] Ibid. p. 403. [k] See the laſt chapter, p. 451, & vol. xiii. p. 417. [l] Ibid. [m] Vol. xiii. p. 504---522 [n] Annal. i. c. 49, & ſeq.

(Q) That general was, it ſeems, informed, that the Germans were then celebrating ſome great feſtival; and as he knew it was their alarmed ſome other German nations againſt them; but theſe, likewiſe, had the misfortune to be defeated, as we have ſeen in the Roman hiſtory [o]. The Roman general had ſoon after a fairer field offered to him, on occaſion of the rupture between the two German chiefs, Arminius and Segeſtes, the former a ſworn enemy to the Romans, the latter a ſtaunch friend to them. What advantage Germanicus made of this rupture, we need not repeat here, but only that the Germans received ſeveral defeats, and Arminius himſelf, after ſome advantages gained over them, was totally routed [p]. All that we ſhall add concerning this war is, that though it coſt the Roman general very dear [q], yet he had received ſuch reinforcements of men and arms from Gaul and other parts, that he hoped in one campaign to have reduced all Germany; but his ſucceſs raiſed the jealouſy of Tiberius, and occaſioned his being recalled [r].

THEIR other moſt conſiderable wars with the Romans the reader will find in the places quoted in the margin [s]; in the reign of M. Aurelius [t], and afterwards under the following emperors, which we ſhall but juſt mention here, and refer to the places where they are ſpoken of in the Roman hiſtory, viz. againſt Alexander and Maximin [u], againſt Valerian [w] and Aurelian [x], Probus [y], Conſtantius [z], Julian [a], Valentinian, and their cuſtom to drink very hard, and to carouſe it all night, he did not doubt but to find them either dead-drunk, or faſt aſleep, as he actually did. For having, with a numerous army, croſſed the Caſian foreſt all night, he fell upon them, before they either knew any thing of his coming, or were recovered from their debauch. The confuſion that reigned among them upon ſuch a ſurprize, made them become an eaſy prey to him, and he failed not to make the beſt advantage of it; permitting his troops to put all to fire and ſword, ſparing neither age or ſex, or even their moſt ſacred groves; witneſs that famed one of Tanfana, of which we have had occaſion to ſpeak at the beginning of this chapter, and which they burnt, and levelled to the ground (28).

[o] Vol. xiii. p. 129, & ſeq. & notes. [p] Ibid. p. 535---542, 547, & ſeq. [q] See ibid. 545. [r] Ibid. p. 562. [s] vol. xiv. p. 432, & ſeq. [t] See vol. xv. p. 13, paſſ & ſeq. [u] Ibid. p. 169, p. 184. [w] Ibid. p. 226. [x] P. 255. [y] P. 279, & ſeq. [z] P. 469. [a] P. 483, & ſeq.

(28) See Tacitus's ann. c. 50, & ſeq, & vol v. p. 369, & (P).

and ſome of his ſucceſſors [b]: but theſe, and the ſequel of their hiſtory, will be beſt ſeen in ſome of the ſubſequent chapters, where we ſhall ſpeak of them under the names of Alemans, Gepidæ, Franks, &c. by which they were diſtinguiſhed, and better known, by that time.

But before we come to their ſeveral hiſtories, it will be neceſſary to paſs, according to our plan, over to the Britiſh iſles, whoſe firſt inhabitants being undoubtedly of antient Celtic extract, as we have, we hope, ſufficiently ſhewn in a former volume [c], as well as in this and the foregoing chapters, claim a preference, in point of time; whereas thoſe northern people above-mentioned, ſo far as they appear, at leaſt, under thoſe new names, being not only of recenter date than the antient Britons, but of more uncertain origin, we think will more properly be ſpoken of in the ſubſequent chapters, and each in its due order.

[b] P. 582, & ſeq. vol. v. p. 398, & ſeq.

CHAP. XIII.

The antient ſtate and hiſtory of Britain, to its deſertion by the Romans, and the invaſion of the Angles and Saxons.

SECT. I.

Deſcription of Britain. The firſt inhabitants. The cuſtoms, religion, government, &c. of the antient Britons. The ſtate of Britain under the Romans.

Britain called, in more antient times, Albion.

THE iſland, which is now called Great Britain, and comprehends the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, with the principality of Wales, was, in more antient times, by way of diſtinction, ſtyled Albion, the name of Britain being then common to all the iſlands, that lie round it. Hence, Agathemerus ſpeaking of the Britiſh iſlands, "They are many "in number," ſays he; "but the moſt conſiderable among "them are Hibernia and Albion [a]." And Ptolemy, to the chapter, wherein he deſcribes the iſland now called Great Britain,

[a] Agathem. l. xi. c. 4.

Britain, prefixes the following title; "The ſituation of Al"bion, a Britiſh iſland [b]." But, as this far excelled the other Britiſh iſlands, the name of Albion, in proceſs of time, was quite laid aſide, and that of Britain, by way of excellency, uſed in its room. By this name it was known in Pliny's time, and even in Cæſar's. "The iſland of Britain," ſays Pliny, "ſo much celebrated by the Greek and Latin writers,
"was formerly called Albion, the name of Britain being
"then common to all the iſlands round it [c]. And Cæſar,
"The other angle of Britain, ſhooting out to the weſt, lies
"over-againſt Spain; on which ſide is Hibernia, an iſland
"thought to be half as big as Britain, and about the ſame
"diſtance from Britain, as Britain is from Gaul [d]." Hence it is manifeſt, that the name of Britain, once common to all the iſlands in our ocean, was, in Cæſar's time, and Pliny's, become peculiar to the iſland, which is ſtill known by that name. Whence it had the name of Albion, is uncertain, ſome deriving it from the Greek word alphon, which, according to Feſtus, ſignifies white, the chalky cliffs, that, in ſeveral places, riſe on our coaſts, being of that colour; while others pretend this name to have been borrowed from a giant, feigned to have been the ſon of Neptune, and mentioned by ſeveral antient writers. Some of our etymologiſts have recourſe to the Hebrew tongue, and ſome to the Phœnician; alben, in the former, ſignifying white; and alp, in the latter, high. The derivation from the Greek word alphon, or from the Hebrew alben, ſeems to be countenanced by the Britiſh poets, who ſtyle Britain Inis Wen, that is, the White Iſland [e]. The origin of the name Britain is no leſs uncertain, than that of Albion. Nennius, and ſome other Britiſh writers, derive it from Brutus, whom they likewiſe call Brito, the fifth in deſcent from the celebrated Æneas. Others bring it from the Britiſh words Pryd Cain, that is, a white form, ſoftened, by degrees, into Britannia. The learned Camden derives it from the words Brith, which, in the antient language of the iſland, ſignifies painted, and Tania, importing, in Greek, a region or country; ſo that the name Brithania, changed in proceſs of time into Britannia, expreſſes what the Britons really were, that is, painted. Somner, diſliking Camden's etymology, propoſes another, viz. that the name Britain comes from Brydio, ſignifying, in the Britiſh tongue, rage, and pointing out the violent motion of the ſea, that ſurrounds the iſland.

Various conjectures concerning the original of this name.

Whence ſtyled Britain.

Various etymologies of the word Britain.

[b] Ptol. l. ii. c. 3. [c] Plin. l. iv. c. 16. [d] Cæſ. l. v. c. 13.
[e] Vide Seld. annot, ad Polyb. alb. p. 20.

Of theſe four etymologies, the firſt is founded on a fable; and againſt the other three lies one common, and, in our opinion, unanſwerable objection; which is, that the name of Britain was given to the iſland by foreigners, who could not borrow it from the Britiſh tongue, with which they were, in all likelihood, unaquainted. That the iſland received the name of Britain from foreigners, is evident, ſince the natives never ſtyled themſelves Britons, nor their country Britain, their true name being Cumri, or Cumbri; whence Cambria the name of Wales to this day among the Welſh. Beſides, the ſecond of the above-mentioned etymologies, deriving Britain from Pryd Cain, ſeems too far fetched. As to Camden's etymology, Somner obſerves, that Cæſar, in telling us the Britains painted their bodies with woad, ſpeaks only of the inhabitants of Albion; whereas all the iſles in our ocean were called by one general name inſulæ Britannicæ, Britiſh iſlands. Is it probable, that a name, common to all the iſlands in our ocean, ſhould owe its origin to a cuſtom peculiar to one, though the moſt conſiderable among them? As for the rage and fury of the ſea, whence Somner derives the name of Britannia, it is not true, that the ſea rages more on the coaſt of Great Britain than elſewhere. The learned Bochart, ſpeaking of the colonies and language of the Phœnicians, offers a conjecture, which moſt of our modern writers have adopted as the moſt natural. The Phœnicians, according to that writer [f], called this iſland, and ſome others near it, Barat Anac, that is, "the land or country of tin or lead", and more contractedly Bratanac; which name, paſſing from the Phœnicians to the Greeks, and from theſe to the Romans, might have been ſoftened into that of Britannicæ and Britannia. That the Phœnicians firſt diſcovered thoſe iſles, which were afterwards by the Greeks called Caſſiterides, and are proved by Camden to be our Scilly iſlands, appears both from Strabo and Pliny, of whom the former tells us, that the Phœnicians firſt brought tin from the Caſſiterides, which they ſold to the Greeks; but kept the trade to themſelves, and the place private [g]: and the latter writers, that Mediocritus was the firſt, who brought lead from the Caſſiterides [h]; where Bochart ſhews, that we ought to read Melichartus, who is the Phœnician Hercules of Sanchoniathon, to whom the Phœnicians aſcribed their firſt weſtern diſcoveries [i]. But, notwithſtanding the care of the Phœnicians to conceal theſe iſlands, the Greeks at laſt diſcovered them, and gave them the

Bochart's opinion the moſt natural, the name of Caſſiterides, which, in the Greek tongue, anſwers that of Barat Anac in the Phœnician. This name was at firſt given to the above-mentioned iſlands, but, by degrees, communicated to all the others lying in the ſame ſea. Thus Bochart. But, after all, his opinion, however plauſible in appearance, may be as foreign to the purpoſe, as any of the reſt, the late inſtances of names given to new diſcovered countries teaching us, that the origin of ſuch names is not always owing to reaſon, but often to chance and caprice. As therefore the origin of the names given to this iſland is of too antient a date to be traced with any certainty, we ſhall diſmiſs this ſubject, and proceed to ſome more material account of the country.

[f] Boch. l. i. c. 39. [g] Strab. l. ii. c. 2. [h] Plin. l. vii. c. 36. [i] Boch. ubi ſupra.

Deſcription of the country.

BRITAIN lies over-againſt France and Germany, as Cæſar obſerved, in a triangular form, having three promonotries ſhooting out three different ways, viz. Belerium, the Land's-end towards the weſt, Cantium, the Kentiſh or North Foreland towards the eaſt, and Traviſium or Orcas, Cathneſs, towards the north. It is divided from Ireland, to the weſt, by the Verginian or Iriſh ſea; waſhed on the north by the northern ocean; on the eaſt, where it faces Germany, by the German ocean; and on the ſouth, towards France, by the Britiſh chanel, called by the Romans Fretum Britannicum. Some writers have thought, that, where the chanel is moſt contracted, the iſland was antiently joined by an iſthmus to the continent [k]; It lies between the 50th and 59th degrees of north latitude, extending from north to ſouth about 560 miles. Its breadth is various; and in compaſs its three ſides are found to contain, allowing for the windings of the coaſt, about eighteen hundred miles. The ſouth ſide, extending from the North Foreland in Kent to the Land's-end in Cornwall, contains about three hundred miles; the weſt ſide, from the Land's-end to the moſt northern point of Scotland, about eight hundred; and the eaſt ſide about ſeven hundred. Were Great Britain to be conſidered as a perfect triangle, formed by three right lines, the length of its three ſides, put together, would amount to about fifteen hundred miles. The fertility and pleaſantneſs of Britain gave occaſion to Iſaacius Tzetzes to imagine, that theſe were the fortunate iſlands, deſcribed by the poets, where the face of nature ſmiled with a perpetual ſpring.

[k] Vide Serv. in Virg. "Et penitustoto diviſos, &c." White hiſt. Brit. l. ii. not. 2. Burton. comment. in Anton. p. 18, 19. Twin. de reb. Albion. Sammes Brit. l. i. c. 4. Verſtegan. l. i. c. 4.

ſpring. It was, in former times, the granary of the weſtern empire; for hence was every year tranſported an immenſe quantity of corn for the ſupply of the armies on the frontiers of Germany. But the convenience of its ſituation, the fertility of its ſoil, and the innumerable bleſſings, with which it has been enriched by nature, are, with high encomiums, deſcribed by two antient panegyriſts, one of whom pronounced his ſpeech before Conſtantine, and the other before Conſtantius. To theſe we refer the reader, and paſs to the firſt inhabitants of this iſland.

Its firſt inhabitants.

THE ſouthern parts of Britain were peopled, according to Cæſar [l], by the Gauls. Tacitus is of the ſame opinion: "If "we conſider all circumſtances," ſays he, "it is probable, "that Gaul firſt peopled Britain, which lies ſo near it [m]." This opinion, which is followed by moſt of the antient, as well as the modern writers, is chiefly founded on the agreement obſerved by the Roman writers between the two nations in their cuſtoms, manners, language, religion, form of government, way of fighting, &c. Beſides, as the Gauls ſent colonies into Italy, Spain, Germany, Thrace, and Aſia, it is but reaſonable to conclude, that they did the ſame with reſpect to Britain, which lay ſo near them, that they could diſcern it from the continent, and was no leſs plentiful than the other countries, where they ſettled. As for the more northern inhabitants of Britain, Tacitus infers, from the make of their limbs, and other circumſtances, that they came from Germany [n]; and Cæſar telling us, that they were Aborigines, ſeems to imply, that he diſcovered no affinity in their language, manners, cuſtoms, &c. with thoſe of Gaul, and the ſouthern parts of Britain.

The origin of the Picts.

As for the Picts, who held the eaſtern parts of Britain, which lay north of the Tine, the venerable Bede tells us, that they came out of Scythia in long ſhips, and landed firſt in the north of Ireland; but not being ſuffered to ſettle there by the Scots, who then poſſeſſed that iſland, they were adviſed to plant themſelves in the north part of Britain; which they did accordingly, with the aſſiſtance of the Scots, who moreover ſupplied them with wives to perpetuate their colony; but upon this condition, that, in all diſputes concerning the ſucceſſion to the crown, the Picts ſhould prefer the female to the male line of their former kings; which is obſerved among them, ſays Bede, to this day [o]. By Scythia Bede perhaps meant meant the northern parts of Germany; for that Scandinavia, now comprehending the kingdoms of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, was, by the beſt writers of the middle ages, ſtyled Scythia, is ſhewn by the learned Uſher [p], and Stillingfleet [q], of whom the latter admits, as not improbable, the conjecture of Hector Boetius, deriving the Picts from the Agathyrſi, who, from Sarmatia, came into Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, and from thence into Scotland [r]. As no Roman author makes mention of the Picts before Ammianus Marcellinus, who lived about the end of the fourth century, ſome writers are of opinion, that the Picts were not a diſtinct people from the Britons, but ſuch of that nation as, to avoid the tyranny of the Romans, had retired into the northern parts of the iſland; where, continuing to paint their bodies, they were, by the Romans, called Picti, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe, who, ſubmitting to Rome, had laid aſide that cuſtom, and adopted the Roman manners. To confirm this opinion, they allege the authority of Cambden, who, in his introduction, endeavours to ſhew, that the names of places, formerly held by the Picts in the ſouth and weſt parts of Scotland, are Britiſh, and conſequently, that one and the ſame was the language of the Britons and Picts. But that theſe two nations ſpoke different languages, is manifeſt beyond diſpute from Bede, who tells us, that, in his time, God was ſerved in five ſeveral languages in Britain, viz. of the Angles, of the Britons, of the Scots, of the Picts, and of the Latins; which latter was commonly uſed in divine worſhip [s]. Now, this difference of language, which Bede, who lived ſo near a neighbour to the Picts, could not be ignorant of, weighs down, with us, all the arguments, that are alledged to prove, that the Britons and Picts were one and the ſame people. Beſides, it is certain, that the Picts were, for ſeveral ages, a ſeparate and diſtinct nation, differing both from Scots and Britons, not only in their language, but in their laws and cuſtoms. The contrary opinion is entirely built on the conformity of the name Picts with the Latin word Picti; which is but a weak foundation, ſince ſome writers, and among the reſt Verſtegan, derive the name of the Picts from a word in their own language ſignifying warrior. The Scots called them Pehiti, which name, in the opinion of ſome antiquaries, anſwers that of Picts, from the Latin word Picti; but others think it highly improbable, that the Scots, who were late ſubdued by the Romans, and continued

[l] Cæſar, l. v. c. 16. [m] Tacit. vit. Agr. [n] Idem ibid.
[o] Bed. hiſt. l. i. c. 1.

Whether the Picts and Britons one and the ſame people.

[p] Uſſ. antiq. Brit. c. 15. [q] Stillingf. orig. Brit. c. 5.
[r] Idem ibid. [s] Bed. l. i. c. 1.

nued but a ſhort time under their dominion, ſhould give their neighbours a Roman name. Buchanan takes the name of Picts to be Roman; but at the ſame time pretends they came from certain Gauliſh colonies ſettled in Thrace, where they painted their bodies, as well as in Britain. The ſame author adds, that the Picts ſpoke the ſame language as the Britons and Scots. But herein he is contradicted, not only by Bede, whom we have quoted above, but by John Major, one of the moſt antient Scots hiſtorians, who tells us, that as yet, that is, in his time, "almoſt half Scotland ſpoke the Iriſh "tongue, which they had brought over with them from "Ireland."

The origin of the Scots.

As for the origin of the Scots, Bede tells us, that they came into this iſland out of Ireland: "In proceſs of time," ſays that writer [t], "Britain received a third nation, viz. the "Scots, beſides the Britons and Picts, who, coming out of "Ireland, under the conduct of one Reuda, poſſeſſed them-"ſelves of thoſe territories, which they ſtill hold among the "Picts." From this Reuda, adds our hiſtorian, they are called, to this day, Dalreudini, the word Dal, in their language, ſignifying ſhare or portion. But of this colony, and the time, in which it is ſuppoſed to have ſettled in the north part of Britain, called afterwards Scotland, we ſhall ſpeak more at length in the hiſtory of that kingdom.

The cuſtoms and manners of the antient Britons

To return to the Britons: their manners, cuſtoms, religion, form of government, &c. are deſcribed, not only by Cæſar in his commentaries, but by others, and perhaps more fully, who wrote after the Romans were become maſters of the iſland. The country was, according to Cæſar, well peopled, and ſtocked with cattle. Their houſes were not unlike thoſe of the Gauls. They uſed copper or iron plates, weighed by a certain ſtandard, inſtead of money. If they bred domeſtic fouls, hens or geeſe, it was for their diverſion, being ſtrictly forbidden by their religion to eat them. Of all the Britons thoſe, who inhabited Cantium or Kent, were the moſt civilized, not differing much in their manners from the Gauls. The more inland people, for the moſt part, ſowed no corn, their uſual food being milk and game, with which their woods and plains were well ſtored. The uſe of cloaths was ſcarce known in the iſland. Only the inhabitants of the ſouthern coaſt covered their nakedneſs with ſkins of wild beaſts, careleſsly thrown over them, not ſo much to defend themſelves againſt the cold, as to avoid giving offence to the ſtrangers, [t] Idem ibid.

ſtrangers, who came to trade with them. All the Britons painted their bodies, with the juice of woad, of a ſky-colour, and wore long hair; but ſhaved the reſt of their bodies, except their upper-lip. One cuſtom prevailed among them, which ſeemed deteſtable to other nations; which was for ten or twelve men, brothers or friends, to have wives in common [u]. This cuſtom continued among them ſome time after the Romans were maſters of the iſland; for Diodorus Siculus tells us, that a Britiſh lady, being upbraided with this uſage by Julia, wife to the emperor Severus, returned her this ſmart anſwer: "Surely the Roman ladies ought not to "reproach us on this account, ſince we do publicly with the "beſt of men no more than what they do privately with the "worſt of their freemen and ſlaves [x]." They abſtained from all manner of fiſh, though the ſeas, that ſurrounded their iſland, and their rivers, were plentifully ſtored with them [y]. Their towns, or rather villages, were a confuſed parcel of huts, placed at a ſmall diſtance from each other, and, generally ſpeaking, in the middle of a wood, whereof the avenues were defended with ſlight ramparts of earth, or with the trees, that were cut down to clear the ground [z]. Strabo tells us, that they exceeded the Gauls in ſtature, but their bodies were not ſo well-ſet; that he ſaw, at Rome, ſome of their youth taller by half a foot than other men; that they had many princes and diſtinct governments among them; that their woods ſerved them inſtead of cities; for having cut down trees, and incloſed with them a large, round ſpot of ground, there they built huts for themſelves, and folds for their cattle [a]. Diodorus Siculus ſpeaking of the manners and cuſtoms of the antient Britons. Their houſes, ſays he, are made of reeds or wood; they lay up their corn in the ear in granaries, taking from thence no more than what they conſume in one day; they are ſimple and upright in their dealings, and ſtrangers to the craft and ſubtlety of our countrymen; their manner of living is remote from the luxury of other nations; they are ſatisfied with a very mean and frugal diet; their iſland abounds with men, who are ſubject to divers kings and princes. Thus Diodorus [b]. And Pomponius Mela: Britain is well peopled, and obeys ſeveral kings; but they are all rough and unpoliſhed, and the farther they live from the continent, the leſs they are acquainted

[u] Cæſ. comm. l. v. [x] Diod. Sic. l. lxxvi. [y] Cæſ. ubi ſup. Idem ibid Strab. l. iv. [b] Diod. Sic. l. iv.

ed with foreign riches, abounding chiefly in cattle. They dye their bodies with woad, but whether by way of ornament, or for some other cause, is uncertain. Ambition of empire, and desire of enlarging their dominions, prompt them to disturb each other with frequent wars [c]. Tacitus writes, that the Britons, in their manners, resembled the Gauls, which was owing either to the same original, or the like climate; that the Britons however, not yet softened by a long peace, shewed greater intrepidity in war; that they were formerly governed by kings, but were then, that is, in Agricola's time, divided by petty princes into parties and factions. Tacitus adds, that nothing was of greater advantage to the Romans against the most powerful among them, than their not consulting one common interest, nor their joining to repel common dangers. Thus, while they fight separately, says that author, they are all alike overcome [d]. Dion Cassius, as epitomized by Xiphilin, speaking of the more northern Britons, says, that they tilled no ground, their food being game and fruits; that they lived in their huts naked; that they had wives in common; that the chief authority resided in the people; that, in war, their arms were a shield, and a short spear, to the lower end of which was fastened a ball of brass, in order to terrify the enemy with the noise, when they shook it. They are inured to hunger, cold, and all manner of hardships, continues the same writer, and, when in the woods, can live upon the bark and roots of trees. He adds, that, on all occasions, they had ready a certain kind of food, of which if they took but the quantity of a bean, they were not troubled with hunger or thirst for a considerable time after [e]. Herodian and Solinus, in describing the more northern nations of Britain, tell us, that they knew not the use of garments, but girt their waists and necks with iron, by way of ornament, that metal being no less in request among them, than gold was among other nations; that they made deep incisions in their bodies in the shape of flowers, trees and animals, which, with the juice of woad, they painted of a sky-colour, that never wore out [f]. They are a warlike nation, adds Herodian, and most greedy of slaughter. In war they use a narrow shield, a lance, and a sword. As for breast-plates and helmets, they look upon them as an incumbrance [g]. Pliny observes, among their other customs, that [c] Pomp. Mel. de situ orbis, l. iii. c. 2.

[d] Tacit. vit. Agric.
[e] Dio apud Xiphilin. l. lxiii. l. xi. & Solin. l. vii. c. 8.
[f] Herodian.
[g] Herod. ibid.

that they wore rings on their middle fingers, and manured their land with marl; which muſt be underſtood of the more civilized Britons dwelling near the coaſt; for the others, as we have related above, did not apply themſelves to agriculture.

As to their manner of fighting, Cæſar, who extols their valour, and the undaunted bravery, with which they went to battle, tells us, that they made uſe of chariots, driving furiouſly among the enemy's ranks, and diſcharging their darts, by which means they often put the Romans in diſorder. When they engaged the horſe, they left their chariots to fight on foot, their charioteers in the mean time retiring, and placing themſelves ſo, that their maſters, if overpowered with numbers, might readily find them, and have an eaſy retreat. By this manner of fighting, they had, ſays Cæſar, both the ſpeed of the horſe, and the ſteadineſs of the foot, and were, by daily practice, ſo expert, that they could ſtop their horſes on a ſteep deſcent, though in full career, turn them in a narrow compaſs, run along the pole, ſit upon the yoke, and from thence, with incredible quickneſs, return to their chariots. Thus Cæſar [h]. But why they choſe to engage the horſe rather on foot than in their chariots, is not eaſily conceived. Their manner of fighting.

THEIR trade was very inconſiderable, notwithſtanding the convenient ſituation of their iſland for carrying on an extenſive commerce. Their veſſels were very ſmall, with their keels and ribs made of ſlight timber, interwoven with wicker, and covered with hides; which ſhews, that they undertook no long voyages; nay, in all likelihood, they never ventured to ſea beyond the coaſts of Gaul. Their chief traffick was with the Phœnician merchants, who, after the diſcovery of the iſland, which happened, according to Sammes, before the Trojan war [i], yearly exported great quantities of tin, which they ſold to the Greeks, and other diſtant nations. As this trade proved very profitable, the Phœnicians, with great care, concealed, for many ages, the fountain-head; but the Greeks diſcovered it at length, about an hundred and ſixty years before Julius Cæſar, as Sammes will have it [k], and traded to the ſame place, giving the iſlands, from whence chiefly they brought the tin, the name of Caſſiterides, anſwering, as we have obſerved above, the Phœnician name Barat-Anac. But this trade was only carried on in the Scilly Their trade.

iſlands,

[h] Cæſ. comment. l. iv. ibid. [i] Sam. Brit. p. 47. [k] Idem islands, where Camden tells us that some veins of lead were found even in his time.

Their religion.

THE religion of the antient Britons was, as Cæsar informs us [l], much the same with that of their neighbours the Gauls. They worshipped Jupiter under the name of Taramis, or Taran, signifying in the antient British language, as it does still in the Welsh, thunder. Maximus Tyrius writes, that they paid divine worship to the highest oak they could find, as the figure or representation of this god. Their other deities were Tutates, called by the Britons Duw Taith, the god of journeys, and supposed to be the same with Mercury; Hesus, called also Camulus, according to Camden, the god of war, or the Mars of the Britons; Beleus or Belinus, that is, as appears from a passage of Julius Capitolinus [m], Apollo, who is also supposed to have been called Belatucardus, this inscription, Deo Belatucardo, being found in several monuments of antiquity. As for their goddesses, they worshipped Diana under the name of Camma, and paid a very particular veneration to Andate, their goddess of victory, who had a temple at Camalodunum, now Maldon in Essex. To her they are said, by Dion Cassius, who calls her Andraste, to have sacrificed their prisoners of war [n]. The care and direction of all religious matters was, by the Britons as well as the Gauls, committed to the Druids, whose authority was great, not only in religious, but civil affairs. Their name seems to come from the British word Deru, or the Greek word Drus, both signifying an oak, not only because they esteemed nothing more sacred than the misleto that grows on the oak, but likewise because their usual residence was in groves among oaks; nor did they perform any of their ceremonies without some branches or leaves of that tree [o]. They were held, both by the Britons and Gauls, in such veneration, that their authority was almost absolute. To them belonged the care of private and public sacrifices, the interpretation of religion, the bestowing rewards, or inflicting punishments, the deciding controversies, let the difference be of what nature soever; and whoever refused to obey their decree, whether lord or vassal, was excluded from the sacrifices, which was accounted the greatest punishment that could be inflicted; for such as were thus, we may say, excommunicated, were reckoned in the number of the wicked, and, as such, avoided by all, not allowed to commence a suit,

The Druids.

[l] Cæs. comment. l. iv. [m] Jul. Capit. in. vit. Maximin.
[n] Dio, l. lxiii. [o] Vide Plin. l. xvi. c. 44.

a ſuit, to diſcharge any public office, or to have the leaſt regard paid them. Theſe Druids had a ſuperintendant or pontiff, to whom they were all ſubject. Upon his deceaſe, the moſt worthy ſucceeded him; but, if there happened to be ſeveral condidates of equal merit, the election was decided by a majority of votes, and ſometimes, as Cæſar tells us, by the ſword. Once a year, the Druids of Gaul had a general aſſembly in the midſt of the country, to which reſorted perſons from all quarters, who had any controverſies to decide, every one ſubmitting readily to their decrees [p]. The diſcipline of the Druids was thought, as Cæſar writes [q], to have been firſt inſtituted in Britain, and from thence transferred to Gaul; for, even in his time, thoſe who were deſirous to have a thorough knowledge of it, came over to this iſland to learn it. The Druids were exempted from all military duties, taxes, and impoſts, and met with ſuch encouragement, that many embraced that profeſſion. The youth, eſpecially the nobility, were educated by them. Thoſe who embraced the ſame profeſſion were, firſt of all, obliged to learn by heart a great number of verſes; which employed ſome, ſays Cæſar, for the ſpace of twenty years; for the Druids never committed any thing to writing, not that they were ignorant of letters, for, on all other occaſions, they made uſe of Greek characters, but in order to lock up, by that means, their myſterious learning from the vulgar, or to exerciſe the memory of their diſciples. Thus Cæſar. But from hence we muſt not conclude, that they had any knowledge of the Greek tongue, ſince Cæſar himſelf, when he wrote to Q. Cicero, beſieged among the Nervii, penned his letter in Greek, to prevent its giving, if intercepted, any intelligence to the enemy; which plainly ſhews, they were ſtrangers to that language. Selden thinks the word Græcis has crept into the text, the meaning of Cæſar being, that the Druids never committed their learning to writing, but, on all occaſions, made uſe of letters; which opinion does not appear to us ill grounded. One of the chief tenets they taught, was the immortality of the ſoul, and its tranſmigration from one body to another; which doctrine they looked upon as proper to inſpire them with courage, and a contempt of death. They inſtructed their youth in ſeveral other traditions concerning the ſtars, and their motions, the extent of the world, the nature of things, and the power of the immortal mortal gods[r]. There were women as well as men Druids; for a female Druid of Tungria, now the biſhoprick of Liege, foretold to Dioclesian, as we read in Vopiſcus, when yet a private ſoldier, that he ſhould one day be emperor. The ſect and religion of the Druids ſpread as far as Italy; for Auguſtus publiſhed an edict, forbidding the Romans to celebrate their myſteries. Beſides the Druids, there were, among the Britons and Gauls, prieſts of an inferior rank, called Bards, whoſe province it was to celebrate the exploits of their heroes in verſes, which they ſung to the harp. The Bards were ſtill in Britain, after the Romans had entirely abandoned it.

[p] Cæſ. l. vi. Plin. ubi ſup. [q] Cæſ. ibid.

The civil government of Britain.

THE ſame form of government prevailed in Britain, as in Gaul; that is, the whole country was divided into ſeveral ſmall ſtates, with a head over each, dignified by authors with the name of king. Of theſe heads or kings, Cæſar mentions four in the ſmall compaſs of Kent. Whether theſe ſtates were hereditary, or elective, we find no-where recorded. On great and imminent dangers, one of theſe heads or kings was, in a general aſſembly, and by common conſent, choſen commander in chief of all their forces. Thus, when Cæſar invaded the iſland, the chief command of all the Britiſh forces was conferred upon Caſſibelanus; and when the Britons revolted in the time of Claudius, Caractacus, king of the Silures, was choſen general. As in other caſes, the ſeveral ſtates, into which Britain was divided, had no dependence upon each other, they had, no doubt, quarrels and conteſts among themſelves. But of their affairs before Cæſar's invaſion we have no account, but ſuch as may be deemed fabulous; and therefore at that period, and no higher, ought the Engliſh hiſtorian, as Camden well obſerves, to begin his hiſtory.

Diviſion of the country.

THAT part of Britain, which comprehends the preſent kingdom of England, and the principality of Wales, was in antient times divided into ſeventeen petty ſtates, whereof the inhabitants were diſtinguiſhed by the following names, viz. the Damnonii, the Durotriges, the Belgæ, the Attrebatii, the Regni, the Cantii, the Dobuni, the Catticuchlani, the Trinobantes, the Iceni, the Coritani, the Cornavii, the Silures, the Dimetæ, the Ordovices, the Brigantes, the Ottadini. That part of Britain, which extends a great way to the weſt, and is bounded on the north by the Severn ſea, on the ſouth by the Britiſh ocean, and on the weſt by St. George's [r] Idem ibid.

George's chanel, was antiently inhabited by thoſe Britons, who are called by Solinus, Dunmonii, by Ptolemy, Domnonii, and, in the more correct copies, Danmonii. In this tract, or, as we may call it, peninſula, now comprehending the counties of Cornwall and Devon, the following places are mentioned by Ptolemy [s], viz. the eſtuary Vexalla formed by the confluence of the two rivers Pedredus and Ivellus, now the Parret and the Ill; the promontory of Hercules, about half-way between that eſtuary and another promontory, called by Ptolemy, Bolerium, and by Diodorus Siculus [t], Belerium. The promontory Belerium, which is by Ptolemy called alſo Antiveſtæum, is the moſt weſtern point of Britain, now known by the name of the Land's-end. Not far from this ſhoots out to the ſouth the promontory Danmonium, or Ocrinum, now the Lizard. On the ſouth coaſt the following places are taken notice of by our geographer, viz. Voliba, now Falmouth; the mouth of the Tamara, now the Tamar or Tamer, on which ſtands the town of Plymouth; the mouth of the Iſca, now the Ex. The inland places mentioned by Ptolemy are, Iſca Danmoniorum, Exeter; Tamare, Taviſtock; Uxella; according to Camden, Leſtwithiel. The Danmonii.

Next to the Danmonii, eaſtward, were the Durotriges, inhabiting that tract, which is now called Dorſetſhire. In this country Ptolemy take notice of one place only, which he calls Dunium, and Antoninus, in his itinerary, Durnovaria. All critics agree, that, inſtead of Dunium, we ought to read in Ptolemy, Durnium; and that this was the antient name of Dorcheſter, the chief town of the county of Dorſet. Durotriges.

To the north and eaſt of the country of the Durotriges, were ſituated the Belgæ, who poſſeſſed Somerſetſhire, Wiltſhire, and Hampſhire. In this country Ptolemy and Antoninus mention on the coaſt Magnus Portus, Portſmouth; and Triſantonis Portus, Southampton, ſo called from the river Triſanto, now Hampton, on which it ſtands. Either Portus Triſantonis, or another place very near it, is called by Antoninus, Clauſentum. In the inland country ſtood Venta Belgarum, Wincheſter, a place of great note in antient times, as we read both in Ptolemy and Antoninus; Aquæcalidæ, or, as Antoninus ſtyles it, Aquæſolis, ſo called from its hot waters, now Bath; Iſcalis or Iſchalis, Ilcheſter. On the Belgæ bordered the Attrebatii, the inhabitants of Berkſhire. The Attrebatii, as well as the Belgæ, came originally from Belgæ. Attrebatii.

[s] Ptol. l. ii. c. 3. [t] Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 22.

Belgic Gaul, as we read in Cæſar [u], and ſettling in Britain, retained their antient names. The chief city of the Attrebatii was Calcua, as Ptolemy calls it, or Caleva, as it is named by Antoninus, now Wallingford. Antoninus mentions another place, viz. Spinæ, which, according to Camden, ſtill retains its antient name, being called Spene; but is now only a village near Newbury, which roſe out of its ruins.

Regni. On the country of the Attrebatii, bordered that of the Regni, comprehending Surry, Suſſex, and part of the ſea-coaſt of Hampſhire. In this country Ptolemy mentions but one city, viz. Noviomagus, which is alſo taken notice of by Marinus Tyrius, as appears from Ptolemy [x]. Some antiquaries take this to be the preſent town of Guilford; but Noviomagus was only ten miles diſtant from London, as we read in Antoninus's itinerary; whereas Guilford is thirty. Camden tells us, that, in his time, were ſtill to be ſeen the ruins of a city, anſwering exactly the diſtance ſet down in the itinerary. Beſides Noviomagus, Antoninus mentions ſeveral other places in the country of the Regni, viz. Othona, where was, according to the Notitia, the ſtation of the Roman ſoldiers called Fortenſes. Camden takes Othona to have ſtood where Haſtings now ſtands. Portus Adurni, now the ſmall village of Ederington, and Regnum, now Ringwood, that is, the wood or foreſt of the Regni, into which they fled for protection. In the country of the Regni, namely at Ockham in Surry, where the Wey falls into the Thames, at a place to this day called Coway-ſtakes, from the ſtakes, with which the Britons had fenced the bank, Cæſar paſſed the Thames, and entered the territories of Caſſivelan. Cæſar croſſed the Thames eighty miles from the ſea; and this is the only place, at that diſtance, where the river is fordable.

Cantii. To the eaſt of the Belgæ and Attrebatii, lay the country of the Cantii, called by Ptolemy and Cæſar [y], Cantium, by Bede, Cantia [z], now Kent. The Cantii were, according to Cæſar, the moſt civilized of all the Britons, not differing much, in their cuſtoms and manners, from their neighbours the Gauls [a]. The places in Cantium, mentioned by the antients, are, Durovernum, Durobrivis, Durolenum, Portus Rutupiæ, Portus Dubris, Regulbium or Regulvium, and Portus Lemanis, now Canterbury, Rocheſter, Lenham, Dover, Reculver, and Lime. Whether Rutupiæ and Portus Rutupenſis, called by Tacitus Portus [u] Cæſ. comm. l. v. c. 12. [x] Ptol. l. i. c. 15. [y] Ptol. ubi ſupra. Cæſ. comm. l. v. c. 14. [z] Bed. hiſt. l. i. c. 26. & l. iii. c. 3. [a] Cæſ. ibid.

Portus Trutulenſis, were one and the ſame place, is queſtioned by our antiquaries. Somner thinks they were two places [b], contrary to the opinion of Leland, Lambard, and others. Perhaps he may be in the right; but it is not probable, ſays Camden, that Sandwich was the Portus Rutupenſis, it being evident, that Stonar was the road, where the ſhips lay, that came to Rutupiæ; and Somner himſelf allows Stonar to have been an antient port [c]. In the opinion of Camden therefore, Portus Rutupenſis was Stonar, and Rutupiæ the preſent village of Richborough, at ſome diſtance from the ſea. Be that as it will, it is certain, that, in the Roman times, Geſſoriacum, now Bologne, and Rutupiæ or Portus Rutupenſis, were, for thoſe who from Gaul came into Britain, or from Britain croſſed over into Gaul, what in our times are Dover and Calais. Hence, frequent mention is made of Rutupiæ by the Latin writers [d]; nay the word Rutupinus was, by ſome of the poets, uſed inſtead of Britannus [e], ſo famous was Rutupiæ in the Roman times. Portus Dubris, now Dover, is firſt mentioned by Antoninus; but, before the Romans abandoned the iſland, it became no leſs famous than Rutupiæ itſelf. At Rutupiæ was quartered the ſecond legio Auguſta; at Portus Dubris the Tungricani; at Portus Lemanis, or Novus Portus, as Ptolemy calls it, the Turnacenſes; and at Regulbium or Regulvium, the firſt cohort of the Betaſii, as we read in the Notitia. Ptolemy reckons Londinium, London, among the cities of the Cantii; but he was therein certainly miſtaken. When the Roman government was eſtabliſhed in Britain, the ſea-coaſt of Kent, which they termed littus Saxonicum, or the Saxon ſhore, had, from the time of Dioclefian, a particular governor, called by Marcellinus, count of the ſea-coaſt, and by the Notitia, count of the Saxon ſhore, whoſe province it was to prevent the barbarians, eſpecially the Saxons, who began then to infeſt Britain, from plundering the country. In imitation of the Romans, our anceſtors ſet over this coaſt a governor or portreve, commonly called the warden of the cinque ports, from his preſiding over five ports. Cæſar landed, when he invaded Britain, in the country of the Cantii, and, as is commonly believed, at Deal, on the twenty-ſixth of [b] Som. ports and forts, p. 3, 4. [c] Vide Camd. Brit. p. 244. [d] Vide Lucan. l. v. c. 67. Juven. ſatir. iv. ver. 140. Auſon, parental. xviii. & de clar. urb. Zoſ. l. iv. c. 25, 46. Ammian. Marcel. l. xx. c. 1. & l. xxvii. c. 18, Tacit. vit. Agric. c. 38. [e] Juven. & Auſon. ibid.

Auguſt, in the afternoon, fifty-four years before the birth of Chriſt [f]. Cantium is parted from the continent by a narrow ſea, called by Solinus, Fretum Gallicum; by Tacitus and Ammianus Marcellinus, Fretum Oceani, and Oceanus Fretalis. Thus far of that part of Britain, which is bounded by the ocean, the Severn ſea, and the river Thames.

Dobuni. ON the north ſide of the Thames, near its head, are placed by Ptolemy the Dobuni, the antient inhabitants of Gloceſterſhire and Oxforſhire. In their country that writer mentions but one city, namely Corinium, called by Antoninus, ſo far as we can conjecture from the diſtances ſet down in his itinerary, Durocornovium, which ſtood in or near the place, where the preſent town of Cirenceſter ſtands. Two other places are taken notice of by Antoninus, viz. Altone, or Avone, and Clevum, or Glevum, built by the Romans, as a curb upon the Silures, now Alvington and Gloceſter. To the eaſt of the Dobuni lay the country of the Cattieuchlani, Calyeuchlani, Cattidudani, Cathicludani, as they are ſtyled in different copies of Ptolemy's works. Dion calls them Cattuellani, and alſo Caſſii. In their country, which comprehended Buckinghamſhire, Bedfordſhire, and Hertfordſhire, the following places are named by Antoninus; Lactodorum, Bedford; Magiovinium, Aſhwell; Durocobrivis or Durocobrivæ, Hertford; Pontes, placed in the itinerary twenty-two miles from London; and Verulamium, mentioned not only by Antoninus, but by Ptolemy, and all the Roman writers, who ſpeak of Britain. Camden conjectures Verulamium to have been the town of Caſſivelan, which was taken by Cæſar [g]. In Nero's time it was a municipium, as we read in Tacitus [h]; but being afterwards deſtroyed, as is ſuppoſed, in the Saxon war, the town of St. Albans roſe out of its ruins, which are ſtill called Verulam. In the country of the Cattieuchlani, Ptolemy mentions only Verulamium, which he calls Urolamium, and Salenæ, of which no footſteps are remaining. Before the arrival of Cæſar, the Cattieuchlani had reduced great part of the country belonging to the Dobuni, and were conſtantly at war with their neighbours.

Cattieuchlani.

Trinobantes. NEXT to the Cattieuchlani were the Trinobantes, as Cæſar calls them, or Trinonnantes, as they are ſtyled by Tacitus and Ptolemy. They inhabited the preſent countries of Middleſex and Eſſex. To them belonged the city of London, called by Tacitus, Ptolemy, and Antoninus, Londinium; by Ammianus, [f] Vide Halley philoſoph. tranſact. N° 193. [g] Cæſ. comm. l. v. c. 21. [h] Tacit. l. xiv. c. 33.

Ammianus, Lundinum; by Stephanus, Lindonion; and by Bede, Lundonia and civitas Lundonia [i]. There ſeems to have been no ſuch place as London in Cæſar's time; and yet it was a town of great note and trade in Nero's, as appears from Tacitus [k]. It muſt therefore have been founded between the times of theſe two emperors, and, in all likelihood, as the learned biſhop of Worceſter thinks, about the time of Claudius. Tacitus calls it a place famous for trade, and the concourſe of merchants, though not diſtinguiſhed with the title of colony [l]. Whether in proceſs of time it attained this honour, may be queſtioned; for though Ammianus Marcellinus ſtyles it Auguſta, yet we cannot from thence conclude, that it was a Roman colony, ſince antiquaries, of no mean character, are of opinion, that the emperors allowed ſome towns, that were not colonies, to aſſume that title [m]. Perhaps it took the name of Auguſta from Conſtantine the Great, who is ſaid to have ſurrounded it with a wall. Ptolemy, as we have obſerved above, and alſo Ravennas, place London in Cantium, on the ſouth ſide of the Thames. The other towns of the Trinobantes were, Durolitum, Cæſaromagus, Cononium, Camalodunum, and Colonia, now Leighton, Burghſtead, Cannonden, Maldon, and Colcheſter. Camalodunum, called by Ptolemy, Camudolanum, was the firſt Roman colony in Britain, granted by the emperor Claudius to the veterans, who, driving out the natives, ſettled there; but they were afterwards themſelves, in a general inſurrection, either driven out, or put to the ſword, the theatre, the temple of Claudius, and the ſeveral villa's in the neighbourhood, belonging to the Roman commanders, being utterly demoliſhed by the incenſed Britons, who looked upon the colony as the ſeat of ſlavery [n]. The country bordering on that of the Trinobantes, and comprehending the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, was inhabited by the Iceni, called by Ptolemy, Simeni, and by others, Tigeni. Camden is of opinion, that the Iceni were the people, whom Cæſar calls Cenomagni [o]. To them belonged the following places, mentioned both by Ptolemy and Antoninus, Villa Fauſtini, Cambretonium, Sitomagus, Venta Icenorum, Garienis Oſtium, Iciani, Brannodium, and Durobrivæ, now St. Edmundsbury, Bretenham, Thetford, Caſtle, Yarmouth, Ichburrough, Brancaſter, Dornford. In the Roman times, Iceni.

[i] Bed. l ii. c. 4, 7, 3. [k] Tacit. ubi ſup. [l] Idem ibid.
[m] Vide Cell. geog. antiq. tom. ii. l. ii. c. 4. [n] Tacit. l. xiv. c. 31. & vit. Agricol. c. 16. [o] Camd. Brit. p. 434.

the commander of the horse under the count of the Saxon shore was stationed at Ostium Garienis, called also Oppidum Garianorum; and the Dalmatian horse, as appears from the Notitia, at Brannodunum. To these we may add Camboritum, mentioned by Antoninus, though not by Ptolemy, and in the itinerary placed on the Cam, where the present city of Cambridge stands; which Camden supposes to have been built out of the ruins of Camboritum.

Coritani. On the Iceni bordered the Coritani, whose country comprehended Northamptonshire, Leicestershire, Rutlandshire, Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire. Their chief places were, Lindum, Lincoln; Tripontium, Towcester; Bennavenna or Beneventa, thought to be Northampton; Ratæ, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Rage, according to Camden, Leicester; Verometum, Burrowhill; Margidunum, Margedoverton; Pontes, Panton; Crococolanum, and Agelocum, or, as Camden will have it, Adelocum, Idleton. Lindum, called by Bede, Lindocolina civitas, was, according to Ptolemy, the metropolis of the Coritani. In this country, between the springs of the Nen and the Avon, are still to be seen the ruins of antient fortifications and military fences, erected, as Camden believes, by Ostorius governor of Britain, after he had fortified the banks of the Severn, the Avon, and the Nen, in order to prevent the irruptions of those who inhabited Wales, and the north parts of Britain. When the banks of the two latter rivers, the one running eastward, and the other westward, were well defended, the only passage from the north into the hither part of Britain was between the springs of these two rivers; and this pass was defended with strong works, whereof the ruins are still to be seen at Gildsborough and Dantry. Ostorius, says Tacitus [p], after having disarmed such as were suspected, by fortifying the banks of the Antona and Sabrina, restrained them from breaking into the province; where, instead of Antona, mentioned by no other writer, Camden reads Ausona, or Avona, which name was, according to him, common to the Nen and Avon [q]. To the west of the Coritani, were Cornavii. situated the Cornavii, who, according to Ptolemy's description of their country, seem to have possessed Warwickshire, Worcestershire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, and Cheshire. Their chief towns were, Branonium, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Branogenium, Worcester; Præsidium on the Ausona or Avona, Warwick, where the prefect or commander of the Dalmatian

[p] Tacit. l. xii. c. 31. [q] Vide Camd. Brit. p. 404.

Dalmatian horſe was poſted by the appointment of the governor of Britain, as we read in the Notitia; Pennocrucium, Penkridge; Viroconinum or Uricomium, as Ptolemy calls it, the metropolis of the Cornavii, probably built by the Romans, when they fortified the banks of the Severn, which is here fordable, and no-where lower. It is now a ſmall village, called Wrockceſter. Out of its ruins roſe the preſent town of Shrewsbury. Deva, or Deuna, as Ptolemy calls it, on the river Deva, from whence the town borrowed its name, now Cheſter. It was antiently a Roman colony, and the ſtation of the twentieth legion, ſurnamed Victrix. Condate, Congleton; and Rutunium, now Routon.

THE principality of Wales, formerly comprehending the whole country beyond the Severn, was, in the Roman times, inhabited by the Silures, the Demetæ, and Ordovices. To theſe belonged not only the twelve counties of Wales, but likewiſe the two others lying beyond the Severn, viz. Herefordſhire and Monmouthſhire, now reckoned among the Engliſh counties. The Silures and Demetæ, according to the deſcription Ptolemy gives us of them, inhabited that part, which is now known by the name of South Wales, and compriſes the following counties, Radnorſhire, Brecknockſhire, Glamorganſhire, with Herefordſhire and Monmouthſhire. As to the origin of the people, Tacitus is of opinion, that they came originally from Spain, on account of their ruddy complexion, their curled hair, and their ſituation over-againſt that country. They were a warlike people, of great intrepidity and reſolution, utterly averſe to ſervitude, and great ſticklers for their liberties, as will appear from their wars with the Romans under Oſtorius, Veranius, and Julius Frontinus, who in the end ſubdued them. In Herefordſhire ſtood Bletium, now the Old Town on the Munow; and about three ſhort miles weſt of the preſent city of Hereford, near the village of Kencheſter, Ariconium, mentioned by Antoninus. In this country are to be ſeen the veſtiges of ſeveral Roman camps. In Brecknockſhire, towards the north, where it is divided from Radnorſhire by the Wye, ſome place Bullæum Silurum; but others think it ſtood in Glamorganſhire. Brecknock, the chief town of the country, was inhabited, in the Roman times, as appears from ſeveral Roman coins found there, from a Roman brick diſcovered with this inſcription, "Leg. II. Aug." and from a ſquare camp near this place, called by the natives Gaer, that is, fortification. In Monmouthſhire, about three miles from Chepſtow, which ſtands near the fall of the Wye into the Severn, Silures.

Severn, is placed by all our antiquaries Venta Silurum, called to this day Kaer-went, that is, the city Venta; but now only ſome ruins of it are to be ſeen. On the north-weſt border of the country ſtood Gobannium, mentioned by Antoninus, at the confluence of the Iſca, now Wyſk or Uſk, and the Govenni; whence it took the name of Gobannium, which, with a ſmall alteration, it retains to this day, being called Aber-Gavenni, that is, the confluence of the Gavenni or Gobannium. About twelve miles from Gobannium, Antoninus places Burrium, where the Birdhin or Birthin falls into the Uſk. This place is now known to the Welſh by the name of Brynbiga, and to the Engliſh by that of Uſk. On the other ſide the Uſk, twelve miles from Burrium, ſtood Iſca Silurum, where the ſecond legion was ſtationed; whence it is ſtyled by Antoninus, Legio Secunda, and by the Britons to this day Kaer-Lheion, or Kaer-Wyſk, that is, the city of the legion, or of the river Uſk. The Legio Secunda, called alſo Britannica Secunda, was raiſed by Auguſtus, and removed out of Germany into Britain by Claudius, under the conduct of Veſpaſian, to whom, upon his aſpiring to the empire, it ſecured the Britiſh legions. It was placed in garriſon at Iſca by Julius Frontinus againſt the Silures, and long after that, that is, in the reign of Valentinian, tranſlated from thence by count Theodoſius, the father of Theodoſius the Great, to Rutupiæ, as we read in the Notitia, and in Marcellinus[r]. At Iſca Silurum, many monuments of atiquity have been diſcovered, as the reader will find in Camden[s]. The moſt ſouthern country formerly belonging to the Silures, is Glamorganſhire, where, at a ſmall diſtance from the Remney, which divides it on the eaſt from Monmouthſhire, is to be ſeen Kaer-phily-caſtle, in the opinion of Camden, the moſt noble and antient piece of architecture remaining in Britain. That this caſtle was built by the Romans, ſeems highly probable, though we have no other reaſon to conclude it Roman, but the ſtatelineſs of its ſtructure, no Roman inſcriptions, ſtatues, coins, or other monuments of antiquity, having ever been diſcovered there. Camden thinks it was the Bullæum Silurum, of which we have ſpoken above.

Demetæ. THE remaining part of South Wales, comprehending Caer-Mardhinſhire, Pembrokeſhire, and Cardiganſhire, was likewiſe inhabited, according to Pliny, by the Silures; but Ptolemy, to whom Britain was better known, placed another nation here, called by him Demetæ and Dimetæ. Beſides, both both Gildas and Nennius ſtyle this country Demetia; and the Britons to this day call it Dyved, changing M into V, according to the dialect of that language. Perhaps the Latin name Dimetia owes its origin to the Britiſh Dyved; for it was the cuſtom of the Romans, as Camden obſerves, to retain ſuch names of the places they conquered, as had been given them by the natives, adding only to them a Latin termination. In the country of the Demetæ, Ptolemy takes notice only of two places, Loventium or Luentium, at the mouth of the Tuerobis, now the Towy, and Maridunum, or, as Antoninus calls it, Muridunum, now Caer-Mardhin. The country now known by the name of North Wales, and comprehending Montgomeryſhire, Merionethſhire, Caernarvanſhire, Denbighſhire, and Flintſhire, was inhabited by the Ordovices, a brave and powerful nation, who held out firſt againſt the Romans, and afterwards againſt the Engliſh, after the other Britons were ſubdued; for by the Romans they were not reduced till the time of Domitian, nor by the Engliſh, till the reign of Henry I. In their country, namely in Montgomeryſhire, where the village of Meviod ſtands at preſent, ſtood formerly, according to the conjectures of the beſt antiquaries, the city of Mediolanum, celebrated both by Ptolemy and Antoninus. Beſides Mediolanum, Antoninus mentions other places in the country of the Ordovices; viz. Segontium, on the river Sejont, whence, without all doubt, it took its name; Conovium, now Conway; and Varis, of which the ruins were to be ſeen in Camden's time, near the village of Bodwar. In this country are the ruins of ſeveral antient forts raiſed by the Romans, to awe and keep in ſubjection the natives. Over-againſt Caernarvanſhire lies the iſland of Mona, now Angleſey, the antient ſeat of the Druids, firſt attempted by Paulinus Suetonius, and afterwards reduced by Agricola. It was called in the Britiſh tongue Môn, and, when conquered by the Engliſh, Angleſey, that is, the Engliſh iſland. Ordovices.

[r] Ammian. Marcel. l. xxvii. c. 18.

[s] Vide Camd. Brit. p. 718, 728.

The Brigantes, whom Stephanus calls Brigæ, a numerous and powerful people and much commended by the antient writers, poſſeſſed the following countries; viz. Yorkſhire and the biſhoprick of Durham towards the eaſt and the German ocean, and to the weſt Lancaſhire, Weſtmoreland, and Cumberland. In Yorkſhire, and in the weſt-riding, on the Dan, now the Don, ſtood the city of Danum, mentioned by Antoninus, and in the Notitia called the ſtation of the Criſpinian horſe. Nennius ſtyles it Caer-Dann; but it is now known by the name of Doncaſter. Olicana, mentioned by Ptolemy, is, from its ſituation with reſpect to Eboracum or York, thought by Brigantes.

Camden to have ſtood where Ilkly, on the Wharf, now ſtands. It was rebuilt in the reign of Severus by Virius Lupus, legate and proprætor of Britain, as appears from an antient inſcription dug up there [t]. The ſecond cohort of the Lingones was quartered here. Near the confluence of the Calder and the Are ſtands the ſmall village of Caſtleford, formerly, according to Camden, Lageolium, or as Antoninus ſtyles it, Lagetium. This our learned antiquary conjectures from its ſituation, by a Roman way, from ſeveral monuments of antiquity diſcovered there, and its diſtance from Danum and Eboracum. Colcaria, according to ſome Tadcaſter, according to others Aberford, is mentioned by Antoninus, but not by Ptolemy. Iſurium Brigantum is placed by both on the Ure; and by Camden thought to have ſtood where the preſent village of Aldborrow ſtands, at a ſmall diſtance from Burrowbridge. Eboracum or Eburacum, now York, on the Owſe, for the Ure takes that name at Aldburrow, where the Owſeburn, a ſmall brook, falls into it, was the metropolis of the Brigantes. It owed, no doubt, its origin and grandeur to the Romans; for it was both a Roman colony and a municipium, as appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions [u]. The ſixth legion, called Victrix, ſent out of Germany into Britain, was quartered here in the time of the Antonines, and likewiſe the ninth in Galba's reign [x]. In this city the emperors had a palace, in which died Septimius Severus, and Conſtantius Chlorus. Upon the death of the latter, his ſon Conſtantine, who afterwards acquired the ſurname of Great, was here firſt declared emperor. The reſcript of the emperors Severus and Antoninus, "de rei "vindicatione," is dated from this place. Upon the death of Severus, juſtice was, for ſome time, adminiſtered here by the great oracle of the law Æmilius Paulus. When the Romans abandoned Britain, Eboracum was, by the Scots and Picts, reduced to the ſhadow of what it had been. In the eaſt-riding, about ſeven miles from York, ſtood Derventio, now Auldby, a ſmall village on the Derwent, formerly Derventio. At the ſame diſtance from the Abus, now the Humber, where the ſmall town of Wigton ſtands, ſtood, in the Roman times, Delgovitia; and on the promontory called by Ptolemy, Ocellum, now Holderneſs, the city of Prætorium, now Patrington. The only places in Lancaſhire mentioned by Antoninus, are, Mancunium, now Mancheſter, [t] Vide Camd. p. 867. [u] Vid. Camd. p. 878. Grut. p. 485. Gale in comment. ad Anton. it. Brit. p. 19. [x] Vide Camd. ibid.

Mancheſter, and Alone, called in the Notitia, Alione, now Lancaſter, the chief town of the county to which it gives name. In Weſtmoreland, two ſhort miles from the Ituna, or Eden, ſtood Veteræ, now a village called Burgh. It is mentioned by Antoninus; and from the Notitia we learn, that upon the decline of the Roman empire, was quartered there a prefect, with a band of Directores. Not far from hence ſtood Aballaba, on the Ituna, the ſtation, as we read in the Notitia, of the Mauri Aureliani. It retains its antient name, being now called by contraction Apelby. At Whallop-caſtle appear vaſt ruins of an antient town, where Roman coins and urns have been frequently dug up. Here ſtood, according to Camden, Gallagum, mentioned by Ptolemy, and called by Antoninus, Gallatum; which conjecture agrees with the diſtances in the itinerary. From this place, an old cawſway runs almoſt in a ſtrait line, for the ſpace of about twenty miles, to Caer-Vattan, near the Picts wall. Upon this cauſway, now commonly called the Maiden-way, Camden thinks, that the ſtations and manſions, mentioned by Antoninus in his ninth iter, were ſettled. At Brougham, according to Camden, the antient Brocovum and Brevoniacum of Antoninus, called in the Notitia, Brocaniacum, where a cohort of the Defenſores was quartered, ſeveral coins and other monuments of antiquity, have been dug up. In Cumberland, the ſea-coaſt was fortified by the Romans in ſuch places as were convenient for landing; whence the Scots, when from Ireland they invaded our iſland, met with the greateſt oppoſition. Many remains of antiquity are ſtill to be ſeen at Moreſby, perhaps, as the preſent name ſeems to imply, the Morbium of the antients, where, according to the Notitia, the equites catafracti were quartered. At the head of the Wize, a ſmall river, that falls into the Waver, are the ruins of an antient town, called, by the neighbouring inhabitants, Old Carliſle; perhaps the Caſtra Exploratorum, placed ſomewhere hereabouts by Antoninus; for it is ſeated on a high hill, and therefore, as it commands a free proſpect round the country, was very convenient for ſpying an enemy. From ſeveral inſcriptions it appears, that the ala, named Auguſta, and Auguſta Gordiana, was quartered here in the time of the emperor Gordian. A little higher jetts out a ſmall promontory, below which is a large arm of the ſea, at preſent the boundary of England and Scotland, and formerly of the Roman province and the country of the Picts. On this promontory ſtood Blatobulgium, now Bulneſs, from which, as the moſt remote limit of the province of Britain, Antoninus begins his itinerary.

At

At Blatobulgium are frequently found Roman coins and inſcriptions. A mile beyond it, at low-water, are to be ſeen the foundations of the famous wall called the Picts wall, built by the Romans to reſtrain the barbarians from breaking into the province. Though a vaſt arm of the ſea comes up here about eight miles, called by Ptolemy, Itunæ æſtuarium, now Solway-frith, yet, at low-water the Scots and Picts found means to ford it. Upon the ſame frith ſtands Drumbugh-caſtle, formerly a Roman ſtation, and thought by Gale[y] to be the antient Blatobulgium. This frith is called by Ptolemy Itunæ æſtuarium, from the river Ituna, now Eden, which here falls into the bay. It is now called Solway-frith from the town of Solway in Scotland ſtanding upon it. At the preſent Burgh-upon-ſands was another Roman ſtation. At a ſmall diſtance from the confluence of the Eimot and the Loder ſtands Penreth, according to Gale, the Voreda of Antoninus. The city of Carliſle, having the Eden to the north, the Petervill to the eaſt, and the Caude to the weſt, was by the Romans called Luguvallum, Luguballum, and Lugubalia. The word vallum was, no doubt, derived from that famous vallum of the Romans, which ran cloſe to the city. As to the word Lugus, or Lucus, it ſignified among the Celtæ, who ſpoke the ſame language as the Britons, a tower; for what Antoninus calls Lugo-Auguſti, Pomponius Mela ſtyles turris Auguſti; ſo that Lugovallum ſignifies a tower on the vallum. This city was a place of great note in the Roman times, as appears from ſeveral monuments of antiquity found in that neighbourhood, and from the frequent mention made of it by the antient writers.

Ottadini

NEXT to the Brigantes, Ptolemy places the Ottadini, Ottadeni, or Ottalini, according to the various readings of the ſeveral copies. Camden reads Ottatinos, becauſe they dwelt ultra Tinam, beyond the Tine. Their country extended from the wall at leaſt to the Tweed, and was afterwards part of the province Valentia; for ſo count Theodoſius named it, after he had recovered it, by driving out the barbarians, who had ſeized it. It is now called Northumberland, as lying north of the Humber. In this country, near Caer-vorran, part of the wall was ſtill ſtanding in Camden's time, fifteen foot in height, and nine in breadth. Bede writes, that it was only twelve foot high, and his account is, generally ſpeaking, exact; for, where there has not been any extraordinary fortification, what was ſtill ſtanding in Camden's time came near [y] Gale, p. 36.

near that height, and no part exceeded it. The breadth which Bede allows it, viz, eight foot, is pretty exact; for every-where it ſtill exceeds ſeven. In this country have been diſcovered many monuments of antiquity, of which the reader will find an account in Camden [z]. Beyond the wall, and at the mouth of the Tina or Tine, ſtood Segedunum, now Seton, where reſided, according to the Notitia, the tribune of the ſixth cohort of the Lergi. At a ſmall diſtance from Segedunum, Antoninus places Corſtorpitum, or, as Camden reads it, Morſtorpitum, according to him, Morpeth. On the north ſide of the Alaunus, now the Aln, and not far from that river, ſtood antiently Bremenium, from which Antoninus begins his firſt journey in Britain. Some take Bremenium to be Rocheſter, near the head of the Rhead, others to be Brampton. At Gabroſentum, according to ſome, Newcaſtle, was quartered the ſecond cohort of the Thracians. The country of the Ottadini reached, according to ſome, to Edinburgh-frith; but the only places taken notice of by the antients between Bremenium and that frith, called by the Roman writers Bodotriæ æſtuarium, are Tæi or Tavi oſtium, the mouth of the Tweed, and Caſtra Alata, thought by all our antiquaries to be Edinburgh. On the weſt coaſt, between Solway and Dumbriton friths, are placed by Ptolemy the Selgovæ, and the towns Trimontium and Oxellum belonging to them. To the north of the Selgovæ were the Damnii, in whoſe country, extending to Dumbriton-frith, antiently Glotæ æſtuarium, ſtood the following towns mentioned by Ptolemy; Colania, Coria, Alauna, and Victoria. The Horeſti, mentioned by Tacitus, are placed by Camden between the Selgovæ and the Ottadini. Agricola entered their country, as we read in Tacitus; and, having received hoſtages, commanded his admiral to ſail round Britain. Hence Camden infers, that their country bordered on Solway-frith, and that the Roman fleet was then riding there. In this voyage were diſcovered the Orcades, unknown to the world till that time. That narrow neck of land, by which Glotæ and Bodotriæ æſtuaria, that is, Dumbriton and Edinburgh friths, arms of different ſeas, are kept from joining, was fortified by Agricola with garriſons and caſtles; by which means all Britain, on this ſide, being poſſeſſed by the Romans, the barbarians were removed, as it were, into another iſland. Thoſe who dwelt beyond the two friths, are by Dion Caſſius comprehended under the two denominations of Mæatæ and Caledonii. The ſouth part of Britannia Barbara, as the Selgovæ. Damnii. Horeſti. Mæatæ. Caledonii.

Romans

[z] Camd. Brit. p. 1071.

Romans ſtyled it, was poſſeſſed by the former; and the north part by the latter. From the Caledonii, Calidones, Deucaledonii, or Dicalidones, as they are ſtyled by different authors, the north part of Britain was called Caledonia; nay, Florus calls the woods adjoining to the Thames, Caledonian woods; for ſpeaking of Cæſar ſoon after he had paſſed that river, "Having followed the Britons," ſays he, "into the "Caledonian woods, he took one of their kings priſoner[a]." But herein he ſhews himſelf little acquainted with the country.

Picti. Of the Picts no mention is made either by Tacitus or Ptolemy; but under that denomination the Caledonians were comprehended in Conſtantine's time: "I do not mention," ſays Eumenius in his panegyric upon that prince, "the "woods and marſhes of the Caledonians and other Picts[b]." And Ammianus Marcellinus, writing of the time of Valentinian and Valens; "The Picts," ſays he, "under which "denomination are comprehended the Dicalidones and the Attacotti. "Vecturiones, the Attacotti likewiſe, a warlike nation, and Scotti. "the Scotti, roaming about, committed great devaſtations[c]." Hence it is manifeſt, that, in the reigns of thoſe two princes, the Attacotti, and the Scotti or Scots, were two different nations from the Caledonii and the Picts. But of Scotland, and its antient inhabitants, we ſhall ſpeak more at length hereafter. Thus far of the inhabitants of Britain, of their towns and territories, while the Romans were maſters of the iſland, in the deſcription of which we have followed Ptolemy, Antoninus, and our beſt modern antiquaries. But, after all, we cannot pretend exactly to aſcertain the bounds of ſo many different nations ſubject to ſo many kings, who were continually making encroachments upon each other. Moſt of the towns we have mentioned were, in all likelihood, built after the Romans had made themſelves maſters of the iſland; but that the Britons had no towns at all before their arrival, as Strabo ſeems to inſinuate[d], is what he can hardly believe. What that geographer wrote of Gaul and Britain, he copied from Cæſar, who tells us indeed, that the Britons gave the name of towns to woods, after they had fortified them with a ditch and rampart, to reſtrain the incurſions of thoſe with whom they were at war[e]. But, from their giving the name of towns to the woods, which they choſe for places of ſhelter, and fortified in time of war, we cannot conclude, that they had had no other places, deserving that name, to dwell in, when under no apprehension of an enemy. Who can believe, that the twenty towns, which Vespasian reduced under the emperor Claudius, as we read in Suetonius [f], were only woods thus fortified and fenced in?

[a] Flor. l. iii. c. 10. [b] Eumen. panegyr. Conſt. c. 7. [c] Ammian. Marcel. l. xxvii. c. 18. Vales. c. 88. [d] Strabo, l. iv. p. 138. [e] Cæſ. l. v. c. 21.

We cannot dismiss this subject, without taking notice of the walls or ramparts raised by the Roman emperors in this island, to secure the countries belonging to Rome against the incursions of the northern barbarians. That three walls were erected for that purpose by three different emperors, is manifest from history. Of these the first and hithermost was, without all doubt, the work of Adrian; for Spartian tells us in express terms, that he was the first, who, by a wall or rampart eighty miles in length, parted the Romans and barbarians [g]. This wall is, by our best antiquaries, placed between Solway-frith and Tinmouth; and truly, considering its extent, it can be placed no-where else. This wall or rampart, (for some writers style it murus, and others vallum) was made, says Spartian, "in modum muralis sepis," or septi, that is, "after the manner of a mural hedge," with large stakes fixed deep in the ground, and fastened together. Upon it stood Pons Ælia, perhaps Pont-Eland in Northumberland, Classis Ælia, Cohors Ælia, and Ala Sabiniana, which took their names from Ælius Adrianus, and his wife Sabina. In the reign of Antoninus Pius, the successor of Adrian, the Brigantes revolted; but Lollius Urbicus, then governor of Britain, having overcome them, and driven back the barbarians, built another wall of turf or earth, says Capitolinus in the life of Antoninus Pius [h]. As no antient writer mentions the place where this second wall was built, it is impossible to determine it with any certainty. Some learned antiquaries, whom we have followed in our Roman history [i], place it between the frith of Forth and Clyde. But Camden and Brietius, upon the authority of a very antient chorographical table, are of opinion, that it began at the mouth of the Taus or Tweed, and was carried southward to the head of the Esk in Eskdale, so as to secure the east coast, and inclose part of the country of the Ottadini. Upon second thoughts, this opinion does not seem to us improbable, since Antoninus begins his itinerary from the mouth of the Tweed, as the most northern boundary, at that time, of the Roman empire.

Adrian's wall.

Antoninus's wall.

[f] Suet. in Claud. c. 4.
[g] Spartian. in Adrian. c. 11.
[h] Capitol. in Anton. Pio, c. 5.
[i] Vide Univer. hist. vol. xiv. p. 668.

empire. The first wall was built, according to our best chronologers, in the year of the christian æra 123, the fourth of Adrian's reign, Glabrio and Torquatus being then consuls; and the other in 142, the third of Antoninus Pius, then consul with Marcus Aurelius Antoninus [k]. That a third wall was built by the emperor Severus, is plain from Spartian, who, in the life of that prince, tells us, that he secured Britain with a wall carried on cross the island from sea to sea [l]. There is a great disagreement among antiquaries about the place where this wall was built. Camden maintains, that Severus's wall was raised in the same place, where Adrian had erected his about eighty years before. But we cannot help disagreeing herein with that learned antiquary, since Eutropius, in the life of Severus writes, that he built a wall thirty two miles in length, reaching from sea to sea; whereas Adrian's wall extended eighty, viz. from Solway-frith to Tinmouth. Besides, we cannot persuade ourselves, that Severus, after having overcome in several battles the barbarians, after having marched from one end of the island to the other, and been at an immense trouble and charge, not to mention the loss of fifty thousand men, in draining marshes, cutting down woods, and making highways, should have abandoned so extensive a country, which Agricola had formerly reduced, and Antoninus inclosed with a wall, and this at a time when the enemies of Rome were quite dispirited, and suing for peace. It must therefore be placed on the isthmus between the friths of Forth and Clyde; and indeed, if it was but thirty-two miles in length, it could stand in no other part of the whole island, that was ever possessed by the Romans. But the hithermost wall, says Camden, is still called Gual Seuer, that is, Severus's wall. May not those, who call it so, be mistaken? Is it not well known, that many appellations, or, as we may style them, traditions, of this nature, when narrowly examined, prove quite groundless? Such is this, if we believe the Scots writers, who, as Camden himself observes, have always called the hithermost wall Adrian's wall. The neck of land between the two friths of Forth and Clyde is not above sixteen miles over. This tract Agricola secured with castles and forts placed at convenient distances, that the forces might easily draw together upon the first apprehension of danger. In building afterwards the wall, those who were employed in the work, took the most direct line; which must be the cause why some of the forts are at a distance from it. They began it where the rivers rivers are narrow, and carried it along the neck of land between the friths. It begins between the Queen's-ferry and Abercorn, and, for the ſpace of thirty-ſix Scots miles, runs weſtward to Dumbriton, with a great ditch on the north ſide of the wall, and many ſquare fortifications in the form of a Roman camp. It is called by the inhabitants of the neighbouring country Graham's dyke. But of Severus's wall, we have ſpoken at length in our Roman hiſtory [m], to which we refer the reader. The hithermoſt was, as we have obſerved already, built by Adrian, not with ſtone, but turf or earth, and defended by a rampart, and ſharp ſtakes driven deep into the ground. However, it is certain, that afterwards a ſtone wall was built in the ſame place; but when, or by what emperor, we cannot determine. The remains of this wall were ſtill to be ſeen in Camden's time. That learned antiquary traced it with great care, and, according to the account he gives us of it, it began at Blatobulgium, or Bulneſs, on the Iriſh ſea, kept along the ſide of Solway-frith by Burgh-upon-ſands to Lugovallum, now Carliſle, where it paſſed the Ituna or Eden. Thence it was carried on croſs the little river of Cambeck, where the ruins of a great caſtle were to be ſeen. Afterwards paſſing the rivers Irthing and Poltroſe, it entered Northumberland, and through thoſe mountains along the river South Tine, was continued by a bridge over North Tine, and ended at the German ocean. On the north ſide of the wall was a ditch twelve yards broad. In ſome places it is ſix yards deep, hewn out of the ſolid rock. The wall itſelf was about eight foot thick, and in very few places built upon that of Adrian. Camden takes this to be the wall, that was built by the Romans about the middle of the fifth century, upon their abandoning the iſland. But one legion only was then ſent over, and that was ſoon after recalled: and could one legion, in a very ſhort time, and in great haſte to return, build, even with the aſſiſtance of the Britons, a ſtone wall eight foot in breadth, twelve in height, and eighty miles in length? This to us ſeems incredible, and therefore we are inclined to think, that this laſt wall was built upon that of Severus between Bodotria and Glota, where, in Buchanan's time, were diſcovered the remains of a ſtone wall [n]. This is the opinion of the learned Uſher, who maintains, that Bede was miſtaken in placing the laſt wall between the Eden and the Tine [o]. The laſt legion, ſent to the assistance of the Britons, drove out the barbarians with great slaughter, and recovered the country they had seized. Is it therefore probable, that, abandoning such a vast tract to the enemy, they would have chosen to build a wall eighty miles in length, though in great haste to return to the continent, when they might have inclosed a much larger country with a wall not half so long?

Severus's wall.

[k] Vide Alford. annal. p. 108, & 116. [l] Spart. in vit. Sever. c. 18.

[m] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xv. p. 117. [n] Buchan. rer. Scot. l. iv. ſub rege 27. [o] Uſſ. rer. Brit. p. 1024, 1027.

Britannia Superior and Inferior.

THESE three walls were, in different times, the boundaries of the Roman empire, dividing Britannia Romana from Britannia Barbara, which last appellation they gave to that part of Britain, which was not subject to Rome. Britannia Romana was divided into Britannia Superior, and Britannia Inferior, or Upper and Lower Britain. The former reached from the Chanel at least as far as Chester, comprehending both England and Wales, as they are now styled; for, on one hand, we read in Dion Cassius, that the legio secunda Augusta was quartered in Upper Britain [p]; and on the other, in Ptolemy, that it had its station at Isca Silurum, now Caer Lheon, about four miles from the Severn in Monmouthshire [q]. The same Dion Cassius tells us, that the Legio vigesima, called likewise Valeriana and Victrix, was quartered in Upper Britain; and both Ptolemy and Antoninus determine the place, viz. Deva, now Chester, on the Deva, now the Dee. The Legio sexta Victrix is placed by Dion Cassius in Lower Britain; and by Antoninus, as well as by Ptolemy, at Eboracum or York, which, as it is plain from hence, stood in Lower Britain. Under this division was comprised only that part of Britain, which was subject to the Romans, the other more northern part being by them distinguished with the name of Britannia Barbara. This division owed, without all doubt, its origin to the emperor Severus, who, having settled the affairs of Britain, divided it, as we read in Herodian [r], into two prefectures. Before that prince's reign, no mention is made of any division of Britain; and Ptolemy, who divides Germany, Pannonia, and Mæsia into Upper and Lower, takes no notice of any such division in his description of Britain; a convincing proof, that, when he wrote, that is, in the reign of Marcus Antoninus, this division was not yet introduced. If Severus was, as he seems to have been, the author of this division, Britannia Inferior extended to the isthmus between Glota and Bodotria, where he built a wall, parting Britannia Romana from Britannia Barbara.

BRITANNIA

[p] Dio Cass. l. lv. p. 564. [q] Ptol. l. ii. c. 3. [r] Herodian. l. iii. c. 8.

Britain divided into five governments.

BRITANNIA ROMANA, comprehending the Upper and Lower Britain, was first divided, probably by Constantine the Great, into four governments; viz. Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Flavia Cæsariensis, and Maxima Cæsariensis. Britannia Prima lay between the Chanel on one side, and the Thames and the Severn on the other; Britannia Secunda reached from the Severn to the Irish sea; Flavia Cæsariensis was inclosed by the Thames, the Severn, and the Humber; and Maxima Cæsariensis extended from the Humber to Adrian's wall. To these was added afterwards the province of Valentia, probably so called by the emperor Valentinian from his brother Valens; for, in the reign of Valentinian, this country, extending from Adrian's wall to the friths of Bodotria and Glota, was recovered by Theodosius, father to the emperor of that name. This division we have copied from the breviary, which Sextus Rufus wrote, and dedicated to the emperor Valentinian. Of this work, some imperfect copies leave out Flavia Cæsariensis; and one of these Camden has followed. Each of these provinces had its particular magistrate, some a consular, others only a præses or president. They were all, according to the Notitia, subject to the vicarius of Britain, as he was to the præfectus prætorio of Gaul, one of the four præfecti prætorio instituted by Constantine. The vicar of Britain had several officers under him for the better and more expeditious administration of civil affairs, viz. his princeps or lieutenant; a cornicularius, who published the sentences and decrees of the vicar and other magistrates, and was so called from cornu a horn, with the sounding of which he commanded silence in the court; two numerarii or accountants, whose province it was to set down the sums of the public revenues; a commentariensis or jailor, so called from the commentaria or kalendars of the prisoners, which he kept, and delivered to the judges; officers called ab actis, that is, public notaries, who wrote testaments, contracts, and other instruments; secretaries called de cura, and de cura epistolarum, whose office it was to write and send letters and dispatches from the governors of the provinces to the emperor, or to each other. Besides a great number of petty officers, viz, informers, pursuivants, apparitors, &c. the vicar had under him the governors of the five above-mentioned provinces, who were three presidents, and two consulars; for by presidents were governed Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Cæsariensis; and the other two, Maxima Cæsariensis and Valentia, by consulars, as appears from the Notitia, and was agreeable to the custom of the Romans, who, on the decline of the empire, committed to conſulars the care of thoſe provinces only, that, lying next to the enemy, were moſt expoſed to their attempts. The vicar had the power of reverſing the judgments and decrees of the other governors; and with the ſame power was the præfectus prætorio of Gaul veſted, with reſpect to the judgments and decrees of the vicar. The enſigns of the vicar's office were a book of mandates in a green cover, and five caſtles placed on the triangular form of the iſland, with the names of the five above-mentioned provinces, which they repreſented [s].

The form of the Roman government in Britain.

Their civil government.

Their military government.

By the vicar, and the governors of the five provinces under him, was the civil government adminiſtered. As to the military, it was executed by three chief officers under the magiſter militum of the weſt; viz. the comes Britanniarum, the comes littoris Saxonici, and the dux Britanniarum. No mention is made in the Notitia of the troops under the command of the count of Britain, nor of the places under his juriſdiction; but as the other two commanded on the coaſts, and in the northern parts of Britain, as appears from the places where their forces were quartered, we conclude from thence, that the inland and ſouth part of the iſland was ſubject to his command. The comes littoris Saxonici, or count of the Saxon ſhore, whoſe province it was to cover the eaſtern coaſt, lying over-againſt Germany, and prevent the Saxon pirates from ravaging the country, had no fewer than eight præpoſiti under his command, and one tribune; viz. the præpoſitus or commander of the numerus or cohort of the Fortenſes, quartered at Othona, thought to be Haſtings; the præpoſitus of the Tungricani at Dubris or Dover; the præpoſitus of the Turnacenſes at Lemanis or Lime; the præpoſitus of the Branodunenſes, who were Dalmatian horſe, at Branodunum or Brancaſter in Norfolk; the præpoſitus of the Stableſian horſe at Gariannonum or Caſtor, near Yarmouth; the præpoſitus of the ſecond legion, called Auguſta, quartered at Rutupiæ or Richborough; the præpoſitus of the Abulci at Anderida or Newenden; and the præpoſitus of the exploratores, whoſe office it was to diſcover the ſtate and motions of the enemy, at Portus Adurni, or Ederington in Suſſex. The tribune commanded under the præpoſitus of the legion. The dux Britanniarum had under him fourteen præpoſiti; viz. the præpoſitus of the ſixth legion quartered at York or Eboracum; the præpoſitus of the Dalmatian horſe at Præſidium, or Patrington in Holderneſs; the præpoſitus of the Criſpian horſe at Danum

[s] Vide Pancirol. in notit. imperii.

Danum or Doncaſter; the præpoſitus of the Catafractarian horſe at Morbium, perhaps Morſby in Cumberland; the præpoſitus of the Barcarii Tigritenſes at Arbeia or Jerby in the ſame county; the præpoſitus of the Nervii Dictenſes at Dictis or Diganwy in Caernarvanſhire; the præpoſitus of the Vigiles or ſcouts at Concangii or Kendal in Weſtmorland; the præpoſitus of the Exploratores at Lavatres or Bowes in Yorkſhire; the præpoſitus of the Directi at Veteræ or Burgh upon Stanmore in Weſtmorland; the præpoſitus of the Defenſores at Broconiocum or Bougham in the ſame county; the præpoſitus of the Solenſes at Magona, thought by Camden to be Machleneth in Montgomeryſhire; the præpoſitus of the Pacenſes at Magi or Old Radnor; the præpoſitus of the Longonicarii at Longonicus or Langcheſter, in the biſhoprick of Durham; and laſtly, the præpoſitus of the Derventionenſes, ſo called from Derventio, where they were quartered, a town upon the Derwent, ſeven miles from York, thought to be Auldby. All theſe præpoſiti are named in the Notitia, with the places where they were quartered.

Besides the above-mentioned forces, a ſtrong guard or watch was kept on the wall, or, as the Notitia expreſſes it, along the line of the wall, per lineam valli. Here was poſted the tribune of the fourth cohort of the Lergi, at a place called Segodunum, now Seaton, on the ſea-coaſt of Northumberland. The tribune of the cohort of the Comonii had his ſtation at Pons Ælii or Pontland in Northumberland. This bridge was probably made by order of the emperor Ælius Adrianus. The tribune of the ala of the Aſtores was quartered at Condercum or Cheſter-upon-the-ſtreet, in the biſhoprick of Durham. Next to him was ſtationed the tribune of the firſt cohort of the Frixagi at Vindobala, as we read in the Notitia, or Vindomora, as it is ſtyled in the itinerary, the former name importing, in the Britiſh language, finis muri, and the latter finis valli; and hence the place is now called the Wall's-end, in Northumberland, the river Tine ſerving perhaps inſtead of a rampart from this place to the ſea. The prefect of the ala Saviniana was poſted at Hunnum, which Camden conjectures to be Sevenſhale in the ſame county. The prefect of the ſecond ala of the Aſtores lay at Cilurnum, which ſome take for Cillerford, and ſome for Scilicester-on-the-wall, likewiſe in Northumberland. The tribune of the firſt cohort of the Batavi was ſtationed at Procolitia, according to ſome, Colcheſter upon the Tine. The tribune of the firſt cohort of the Tungri was quartered at Borcovicus or Borwick in Northumberland. The tribune of the fourth cohort of the Gauls at Vindolana or Wincheſter-on-the-wall. The tribune of the firſt cohort of the Aſtores at Æſica, thought to be Netherly on the Eſk in Cumberland. The tribune of the ſecond cohort of the Dalmatæ at Magni, a place without all doubt near the wall, and not Raanor, called by the ſame name. The tribune of the firſt cohort Ælia at Amboglanna, according to ſome Willoford in Cumberland, according to Camden, Ambleſide in Weſtmorland. The prefect of the ala Petriana at Perith in Cumberland. The prefect of the Mauri Aureliani at Aballaba, or Apleby in Weſtmorland. The tribune of the ſecond cohort of the Largi at Congavata, or Roſe-caſtle near Carlile in Cumberland. The tribune of the cohort of the Hiſpani at Axelodunum, now Hexham in Northumberland. The tribune of the ſecond cohort of Thracians at Gabroſentum, Gateſhead, cloſe to Newcaſtle. The tribune of the firſt cohort, called Ælia Claſſica, at Tunnocellum or Tinmouth. This cohort, Camden thinks, was employed in naval affairs, induced thereunto by the ſurname of Claſſica given it in the Notitia. That the Romans kept ſome veſſels on the Tine, to hinder the Caledonians from making deſcents on their territories, is not improbable; for that they maintained a fleet in the ports of this iſland, is manifeſt from a law ſtill extant in the pandects, wherein mention is made by Javolenus of one Seius Saturninus, archigubernus or admiral of the Britiſh fleet [t]. The tribune of the firſt cohort of the Morini was ſtationed at Glannobanta, thought by Camden to have ſtood on the Wentſbeek in Cumberland. The tribune of the third cohort of the Nervii at Alione, now Whitley-caſtle in Weſtmorland. The cuneus of the Armaturæ is placed by the Notitia at Brementuracum, a ſtation near the wall, and not in the neighbourhood of Preſton in Lancaſhire, ſixty miles diſtant from the wall, as Camden would have it. The prefect of the firſt ala Herculea had his ſtation at Olenacum or Ellenborough in Cumberland, where many monuments of antiquity have been diſcovered. The tribune of the ſixth cohort of the Nervii is mentioned the laſt of all in the Notitia, and placed at Veroſidium, thought to be Werewich upon the Eden near Carlile. All theſe forces were appointed to defend the limit, that is, to ſecure the wall, under the command of the dux Britanniarum. Theſe three officers, viz. the comes Britanniarum, the comes littoris Saxonici, and the dux Britanniarum, were equal in power, but ſubordinate to the vicar. The forces

[t] Pand. SC. ad Trebell.

forces maintained in Britain under the two latter officers, amounted, according to Pancirolus, to nineteen thouſand two hundred foot, and ſeventeen hundred horſe. Of the troops under the comes Britanniarum, we find no account in the Notitia; Pancirolus thinks, becauſe the greater part of the iſland was then in the power of the barbarians. But this reaſon might have ſerved againſt enumerating the forces under the two other commanders; for at the very time the Notitia was compiled, the Britons were, by frequent embaſſies, ſoliciting the emperor, and his officers in Gaul, for aid; which they could not have wanted, had the fourth part of the troops, ſet down in the Notitia, been quartered towards the wall. In the times before the Notitia, no mention is made of the comes Britanniarum, but only of the dux, and the comes tractus maritimi, called comes littoris Saxonici, when the Saxon pirates began to infeſt the coaſts. The firſt vicar of Britain we find mentioned in hiſtory, and probably the firſt who, with that title, governed here, is Pacatianus, to whom we find an edict directed in 319, enacting, that one decurio ſhould not be bound to pay the taxes that were due from another [u]. The authority of the count of the Saxon ſhore was thought to have been confined within Britain, till it was by the learned Selden extended to the oppoſite coaſts of Cimbria, Batavia, Belgica, and Armorica [x]; for to them he finds the name of littus Saxonicum given by the writers of thoſe times, no doubt from their being infeſted by the Saxon pirates. The count of Britain had for his enſigns a book of mandates, and the iſland repreſented in a triangular form; the count of the Saxon ſhore a purple book, with nine caſtles, repreſenting the nine places where the præpoſiti and tribune, under his command, were quartered; and the dux likewiſe a purple book, with the fourteen places, where the prefects under him were ſtationed. Of theſe munitions or forts, fourteen have over them the names we have mentioned; but the firſt has only the word ſextæ, ſignifying, we ſuppoſe, the ſtation of the ſixth legion, which was quartered at York; whence that city is ſtyled by Antoninus, in his itinerary, Eboracum legio ſexta; and in a coin of Severus, Col. Eboracum Legio VI. Victrix. If the power and juriſdiction of the count of the Saxon ſhore had extended to the oppoſite coaſts of Gaul and Germany, as Selden maintains, mention would have been made in the Notitia

[u] Lib. ii. de extact. Cod. Theod. l. xii. tit. 7. dat. 12. calend. Decemb. A. D. 319.

[x] Vide Seld. in Mari clauſo.

titia of the forces under his command in those places; but as the Notitia is quite silent upon that head, and, in the ensigns of that officer, we find only the names of nine British towns or garrisons, we conclude from thence, that his authority was confined to this island. His troops were quartered in several towns or stations along the coast from Kent to the most northern part of Norfolk. The more northern coasts, and that facing Ireland, with the inland countries in those parts, were under the jurisdiction of the dux Britanniarum, for Danum, now Doncaster, seems to have been the most southern station of his troops. These stations, designed at first for camps, called in Latin castra, grew, by degrees, into cities; and this is the origin of almost all our great cities and towns, built either in the same places where the Roman camps were, or at a small distance from them. This observation holds especially in those, the names of which end in chester or cester, derived from the Latin word castra; for, to this day, the stations or forts near the Picts wall, the remains of which are to be seen in several places, are, by the common people, called Chesters [y].

The Roman highways.

To maintain a communication between one station and another, and for the convenience of the armies, when they marched, or of the governors, when they visited the provinces, the troops, in peaceable times, were employed im making roads or causways, called viæ militares, consulares, prætoriæ, stratæ, publicæ, &c. As no fewer than an hundred and fourteen mansions through fifteen different roads are mentioned in the Itinerary, and in the Notitia forty-six garrisons, viz. nine on the sea-coast, under the command of the comes littoris Saxonici, fourteen more inland, and twenty-three per lineam valli, or along the wall, under the jurisdiction of the dux Britanniarum, many highways must have been made for passing, according to the Roman custom, from one place, however distant, to another. Our historians indeed mention only four of note; but, in a province so abounding with stations, camps, fortresses and cities, there must, without all doubt, have been a great many more. Had the Notitia given us an account of the forces and places under the command of the dux Britanniarum, as well as of the other two great officers, we should have had knowledge of more cities and places of note in this island; for Bede tells us out of Gildas, who flourished about the time the Notitia was composed, that, in those days, there were twenty-eight most stately cities, ties, besides innumerable castles, fortified with strong walls, towers and gates [z]: The four ways, or, as we call them, streets, mentioned by our historians, are, Watling-street, so called, as is coujectured, either from Vitellianus a Roman, perhaps employed in making it, or from a Saxon word signifying a beggar, it being much frequented by beggars. This way is thought by some to have reached from Dover to Cardigan in Wales; by others to have extended from Dover to the coast over-against Anglesey, passing through London, Dunstable, Towcester, Allerston, and crossing the Severn near the Wrekin in Shropshire. The Foss-way, so called perhaps, because in some places it was never perfected, but left like a ditch. This way is thought to have reached from Totness in Cornwall to Lincoln, and from Lincoln to Cathness, the most northern point in Scotland. Ikenild-street, so called perhaps from Iceni. It led from Southampton to York, and from thence to Tinmouth. Ermine or Erminage-street, reaching from St. David's to Southampton [a]. Besides these, we find two others mentioned in history; viz. Julia Strata in Monmouthshire, made, as Camden conjectures, by Julius Frontinus, who subdued the Silures; and Strata Marcella, mentioned by Giraldus Cambrensis, as lying at a small distance from Julia Strata. The former is thought to have been the work of Ulpius Marcellus, proprætor of Britain in the reign of Commodus.

[y] Vide Burton. comment. in Antonin. itiner.

Several corps of Britons in the Roman armies.

THE forces, employed in the defence of Britain, were all foreigners, as the reader must have observed, the Romans not thinking it safe to trust the natives, who perhaps would have defended their country with more vigour and resolution against the barbarians, but might, when masters of all the strong places, have turned their arms against their masters, and shaken off the yoke. To prevent this, the Romans transplanted into other countries the numerous levies raised here. It appears from the Notitia, and several antient inscriptions, that bodies of British troops were dispersed almost over the whole empire; for we find the following corps mentioned; viz. Ala Britannica milliaria, Ala quarta Britonum in Ægypto, Cohors prima Ælia Britonum, Cohors tertia Britonum, Cohors septima Britonum, Cohors vicesima sexta Britonum in Armorica, Britanniciani sub magistro peditum, Invicti juniores Britanniciani, Excubitores juniores Britanniciani, Britones cum magistro equitum Galliarum, Invicti juniores ores Britones intra Hiſpaniam, Britones ſeniores in Illyrico. Theſe different corps were ſupplied from time to time out of this iſland. No wonder therefore, that Britain, exhauſted and deprived of its youth by ſo numerous levies, became, upon the withdrawing of the foreign troops quartered here, a prey to the northern barbarians. Having thus deſcribed the ſtate of Britain before and after the arrival of the Romans, we ſhall now proceed to the hiſtory of that part of it, which was ſubject to Rome, from the time of its being firſt invaded by Julius Cæſar, to its deſertion by the Romans in the reign of Valentinian III. containing the ſpace of about five hundred years.

[z] Bed. hist. l. i. c. 3.

[a] Vide Barton. comment. in itiner. Antonin.

SECT. II.

The hiſtory of Britain, from the firſt coming of Julius Cæſar, to its deſertion by the Romans.

Cæſar's firſt expedition into Britain.

BRITAIN was but little known to the Romans till the time of Julius Cæſar (A), who having carried his victorious arms to the oppoſite coaſt of Gaul, parted from Britain by a narrow chanel, there formed the deſign of bringing the Britons, as he had already done the moſt warlike nations of Gaul, under the dominion of Rome. Whatever was the

(A) We muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that we have no accounts, but ſuch as are evidently fabulous, of what paſſed in this iſland before the Romans were acquainted with it. Gildas, who flouriſhed in the latter end of the ſixth century, freely owns, that, as for the antient monuments of his country, they were no-where to be found in his time, being either deſtroyed by the enemy, or carried into foreign countries by the baniſhed Britons. However, Annius of Viterbo, in his Beroſus, gives a long ſucceſſion of Celtic kings, whom he derives from Samothes, one of the ſons of Japhet, ſuppoſing him to have planted colonies firſt on the continent of Celtica or Gaul, and afterwards in this iſland, from him named Samothea. But Annius has been long ſince unmaſked, and the fables he vends in his counterfeit Beroſus univerſally exploded. What Geoffery of Monmouth writes of Brutus, and the kings deſcended from him, ſuppoſed to have reigned in this iſland, deſerves no more credit, than the fables of Annius, whether Geoffery was the author, or only the tranſlator of that pretended hiſtory; for in the preface prefixed to it, he tells us, that he received an antient Britiſh hiſtory from Walter archdeacon of Oxon, which the real motive that prompted him to this undertaking, whether his unbounded ambition and thirſt of glory, as to us ſeems moſt likely, or the hopes of enriching himſelf with the Britiſh pearls, as we read in Suetonius [b], the pretence he alledged which he faithfully tranſlated out of the Britiſh tongue into Latin. This hiſtory, or rather romance, he inſcribed to Robert earl of Gloceſter, natural ſon to Henry I. But though it was at firſt received with uncommon applauſe by the Welſh, who, to this day, are unwilling to give it up as fabulous, yet it began very early to be cried down, as appears from what we read in William Niobrigenſis, who flouriſhed not long after Geoffery, and writes of him thus: "In theſe our days a certain writer is riſen, who has de-" viſed many fooliſh fictions of the Britons. His name is Geoffery." And a little after: "With how little ſhame, with what great " confidence, doth he frame lyes!" However, as it would be unpardonable in us to paſs over in ſilence what all our hiſtorians have thought fit to take notice of, we ſhall here relate, in a few words, what we read in Geoffery's fabulous hiſtory of Brutus, and his ſucceſſors, ſaid to have reigned in this iſland many ages before the arrival of the Romans. According to that writer, Brutus, the great-grandſon of Æneas by his ſon Aſcanius, having accidentally killed with an arrow his father Sylvius, king of Alba, was forced to leave Italy; and flying into Greece, joined there the Trojans, who had ſettled in that country after the deſtruction of their city. With theſe he put to ſea, being ſupplied with a fleet by Pandraſus, king of the country, whoſe daughter he had married; and entring the Atlantic ſea, performed wonders in ſeveral places, particularly in Gaul, where he overcame Goffarius king of Aquitain, and drove him from his kingdom. But the baniſhed king having prevailed upon the other princes of Gaul to lend him powerful ſuccours, Brutus, not finding himſelf in a condition to withſtand ſo great a force, put to ſea again, and, after a few days ſail, arrived on the coaſt of Albion, and landed at the place in Devonſhire, where Totneſs now ſtands. He immediately marched up into the country, which he found peopled by giants, whoſe chief or king was Gogmagog. Theſe he overcame; and having rooted them out, and divided the lands among his people, he called the iſland, from his own name, Britain. Having got poſſeſſion of the whole country, he built a city in a proper place, which he made the ſeat of his kingdom, calling it Troja Nova, a name afterwards changed into Troynovantum or Trinobantum. Before his death, he divided his kingdom among his three ſons. Locrinus, the eldeſt, had for his ſhare Leogria, ſo called from him, now England. Camber, Brutus's ſecond ſon, had Cambria ledged was, that, in all the wars of Gaul, the Britons had assisted with considerable supplies the enemies of the republic. Upon this either real or pretended provocation, he attempted to pass over into Britain, and, by the conquest of this island, enhance the reputation, which he had already acquired in Gaul. As the summer was already far spent, and winter came on very early in these northern climates, he was sensible, that the time of the year would not allow him to finish the war. However, he thought, it would be no small advantage to view the island, to learn the temper, customs, and manners of the inhabitants, and to get some knowledge of their ports and havens, then visited by none but merchants, who were acquainted with the coast lying over-against Gaul, but seemed utter strangers to the rest of the country; for, being called together by Cæsar from all parts, they could not inform him of what extent the island was; by what nations, and how powerful, it was peopled; how they understood the art of war; by what customs they were governed; or what ports were capable of receiving a fleet of great ships (B). In order therefore bria, now Wales; and Albanactus, Albania, now Scotland. Having laid this foundation, the author pursues his history, giving us an account of the various revolutions, that happened in the island in the reigns of the kings, who succeeded each other, from Brutus to Cassibelan, who, being appointed guardian to Androgeus and Tenuantius, his two nephews, the sons of king Lud, prevailed upon the people to transfer the kingdom upon himself. Lud is said by Geoffery to have surrounded the city of London with new walls and towers, and to have built a gate, which, from him, is still called Ludgate. In the reign of Cassibelan, Cæsar landed in Britain; and here it is, as Camden well observes, that the English historian ought to begin his history, whatever Geoffery or others have writ of the British affairs before this period being altogether groundless. As for Geoffery's history in particular, it sufficiently confutes itself, bringing with it such marks of forgery, as must evidently convince every reader, that the whole is a fiction either of Geoffery himself, or of the author, whom he pretends to have coppied.

[b] Suet. in Jul. c. 58.

(B) Cæsar tells us elsewhere (1), that Divitiacus, one of the most powerful men in Gaul, was not only master of a considerable part of that country, but had some footing likewise in Britain; that several provinces of Britain were peopled by colonies from Gaul; that the Britons had assisted the Gauls in most of their wars; and lastly,

(1) Cæsar. comment. l. ii. c. 2.

therefore to discover what he could not learn of the merchants, he sent out C. Volusenus with a galley, enjoining him to return as soon as possible with what intelligence he could get. Suetonius tells us, that Cæsar went in person to view the coast; but Cæsar's own account shews that writer was mistaken [c]. In the mean time Cæsar marched all his forces into the country of the Morini, now the province of Picardy, whence was the shortest passage into Britain, ordering at the same time all the vessels, that lay in the neighbouring ports, and the fleet, which he had built the year before for his expedition against the Morini, to attend him. The Britons, alarmed at these preparations, dispatched embassadors to Cæsar, offering to submit to Rome, and deliver hostages for their fidelity. Cæsar received them with great kindness; and having encouraged them, with fair promises, to persist in their resolution, he sent them back to their own country, ordering Comius, whom, for his extraordinary wisdom, virtue, and fidelity, he had made king of the Atrebates, to attend them into Britain, with instructions to visit as many states as he could, to persuade them to accept of an alliance with Rome, and to acquaint them with his design of landing in a short time in their country. In the mean time Volusenus, having made what discoveries he could from his ship, for he did not think it adviseable to venture ashore, returned after five days to Cæsar, and acquainted him with what he had observed. Hereupon Cæsar, having embarqued two legions on board eighty transports, and appointed eighteen more, which were wind-bound at a port about eight miles off, to convey over the cavalry, weighed anchor about the third watch, commanding the cavalry to embarque at the port, where the vessels lay ready to receive them, and follow him; which orders were too slowly executed. Cæsar himself arrived in a few hours on the British coast; but finding the hills and cliffs hanging over the sea covered with armed men, who from thence might, with their darts, easily prevent his landing, he lay

The Britons send embassadors to Cæsar.

Cæsar embarques with two legions.

[c] Idem ibid. Cæs. comment. l. iv.

lastly, that such of the Gauls as were desirous to be perfect masters of the learning of the Druids, used to pass over into Britain to study it there. How could Britain therefore, at that time, be so utterly unknown in Gaul, or only known to merchants, nay, and to them so little, that being called together by Cæsar from all parts, they could not give him any tolerable account of the people, of their customs, manners, laws, method of fighting, &c. nay, not even of their ports and harbours?

lay by till three in the afternoon, waiting for some of his ships, that were not yet come up, in order to look out for some other place, where he might land his troops with less danger. Upon their joining the fleet, he summoned the chief officers to a council of war; and having acquainted them with the intelligence he had received from Volusenus, and given them such orders as he thought proper for the occasion, he set sail, and arriving at a plain and open shore about eight miles farther, he there came to an anchor. The Britons, apprised of Cæsar's design, sent their cavalry and chariots before, the rest of the army hastening after them, in order to oppose his landing. The main difficulty in getting to land proceeded from the largeness of the ships, which required a considerable depth of water; so that the Roman soldiers were obliged, loaded as they were with heavy armour, to leap into the sea, and at the same time to struggle with the waves, and encounter the enemy, who, having their hands disengaged, as they either stood on dry land, or waded but a little way into the water, could boldly cast their darts, and drive back an enemy thus incumbered. This disadvantage so discouraged the Romans, as Cæsar himself owns, that they did not appear so chearful, nor so eager to engage the enemy, as in their former conflicts on dry land; which being perceived by the general, he ordered his long ships or galleys to advance with their broad sides towards the shore, in order to force the Britons, with their slings, arrows and engines, to retire from the water-side. This had, in some degree, the desired effect; for the Britons, surprised at the make of the galleys, a sort of shipping they had never seen, and overwhelmed with showers of darts and arrows thence discharged upon them, began to give ground. But the Romans still betraying great backwardness to throw themselves into the water, the standard-bearer of the tenth legion, having first invoked the gods, cried out aloud, "Fellow soldiers, unless you will forsake your colours, "and suffer the Roman eagle to fall into the hands of the "enemy, follow me; for I am resolved to discharge my "duty to the commonwealth and my general." Having thus spoken, he leaped into the sea, and advanced with the eagle towards the enemy. Hereupon the soldiers in the same ship, encouraging each other not to suffer so great a disgrace as the loss of their ensign, followed his example; which those in the other ships perceiving, they too cast themselves boldly into the sea, and, pressing forward, began the fight, which proved very sharp on both sides, and, for some time, noways favourable to the Romans; for not being able either to keep keep their ranks, get firm footing, or, leaping out of ſeveral ſhips, follow their particular ſtandards, they were put into great confuſion by the Britons; who, being acquainted with the ſhallows, when they ſaw them coming in ſmall numbers out of their ſhips, ſpurred their horſes into the water, and attacked them incumbered and unprepared; which Cæſar obſerving, he cauſed ſeveral boats to be manned, and ſent them to the aſſiſtance of thoſe, whom he ſaw moſt diſtreſſed. By this means, the Romans, having at length gained firm footing, charged the enemy ſo briſkly, that they put them to flight; but could not purſue them for want of horſe, the cavalry not being yet arrived; which, Cæſar ſays, was the only thing wanting to complete his wonted ſucceſs[d].

The Britons oppose the landing of the Romans.

The Romans land with great difficulty. Year before Chriſt 54.

UPON this defeat, the Britons immediately ſent embaſſadors, and with them Comius, whom they had committed to priſon, to ſue for peace. This treatment they endeavoured to excuſe, by laying the blame on the multitude. Cæſar, having upbraided them with their breach of faith, in making war upon him after they had ſent embaſſadors to him into Gaul, deſiring peace, promiſed to forgive them, on condition they delivered a certain number of hoſtages. Part of theſe they brought immediately, promiſing to return in a few days with the reſt, who lived at ſome diſtance. Peace being thus concluded four day after Cæſar's landing in Britain, the Britiſh princes, having diſbanded their men, and ſent them back into their ſeveral countries, came to ſubmit themſelves and their ſtates to Cæſar. In the mean time the eighteen tranſports, that were conveying over the Roman cavalry, being overtaken by a violent ſtorm, were driven back to the ports of Gaul. By the ſame ſtorm, Cæſar's fleet, which lay in the road, was greatly damaged, ſeveral of them being daſhed to pieces, and others, by the loſs of their anchors, cables, and rigging, rendered wholly uſeleſs; which cauſed a great conſternation in the army, for they wanted materials wherewithal to refit them, in order to return to the continent, and proviſions to ſupport them any conſiderable time in the iſland, Cæſar having all along intended to paſs the winter in Gaul. What added to the misfortune, the ſame night, it being then full moon, the tide roſe ſo high, that the galleys, which had been drawn aſhore, were filled with water. This cauſed a new panic, the Roman mariners being quite unacquainted with the tides. The Britiſh chiefs, who were aſſembled to perform their agreement with Cæſar, perceiving his want of horſe,

The Britons ſue for peace.

Cæſar's fleet greatly damaged by a ſtorm.

[d] Cæſ. comment. l. iv.

horſe, ſhips, and proviſions, and judging of the number of his men from the ſmalneſs of his camp, which was narrower than uſual, becauſe the legions had left their heavy baggage behind them, reſolved to take arms again, in order to protract the war till winter, perſuading themſelves, that, if they could cut off the few Romans that were come over, or prevent their return, they would thereby deter others from invading Britain for the future. The plot being thus laid, they began to ſteal out of the camp by degrees, and privately to liſt again their diſbanded troops. Cæſar knew nothing of their deſign; but nevertheleſs, ſuſpecting an alteration from their delay in delivering their hoſtages after the loſs of his ſhipping, reſolved to prepare againſt all events. Accordingly he cauſed all the proviſions, that could be found in the neighbouring country, to be brought into his camp, and gave orders, that thoſe ſhips, which had been the leaſt damaged by the ſtorm, ſhould be refitted with the materials of thoſe, that had been ſhattered to pieces. He ſent likewiſe to Gaul for what things were farther neceſſary; which were ſo well applied by the ſoldiers, who, on this occaſion, laboured with uncommon diligence, that only twelve ſhips being loſt, the reſt were ſoon in a condition to put to ſea again. In the mean time the ſeventh legion being ſent out to forage, while part of the ſoldiers, having quitted their arms as under no apprehenſion of danger, were employed in reaping the corn, and the reſt in gathering it, and conveying it to the camp, the Britons, who had lain all night concealed in the neighbouring woods, not queſtioning but the Romans would come and forage in that place, the harveſt being brought in every-where elſe, fell upon them unexpectedly; and having killed ſome of them, drove the reſt into a ſmall compaſs, and ſurrounded them with their horſe and chariots in ſuch manner, that not a ſingle man would have eſcaped, had not the advanced guards, obſerving a greater duſt than uſual riſing from that quarter, acquainted Cæſar therewith; who, ſuſpecting the Britons had begun hoſtilities anew, haſtened to the aſſiſtance of the legion with the two cohorts, that were upon guard, ordering two others to ſupply their room, and all the reſt to repair to their arms, and follow him with all expedition. Upon his arrival, the Britons gave over the attack, and the Romans reſumed their courage. However, Cæſar, not thinking it adviſeable to engage the enemy, ſtood ſome time with his troops drawn up in battle-array, and then retreated to his camp. After this, the heavy rains, which continued ſeveral days ſucceſſively, kept the Romans in their camp, and hindered the Britons from

The Britons break the peace;

And fall upon the ſeventh legion.

from attempting any thing againſt them. The latter however were not idle in the mean time; but having diſpatched meſſengers into all parts of the iſland, to inform their countrymen how ſmall an army the Romans had, how great a booty they might get, and what a favourable opportunity offered of freeing themſelves for ever, by forcing the Roman camp, they drew together a great body of horſe and foot, and boldly advanced to the Roman entrenchments. Upon their approach, Cæſar drew up his legions in order of battle before the camp, and gave the Britons ſo warm a reception, that they immediately turned their backs, and fled. Cæſar purſued them with great ſlaughter, till his men were out of breath, burnt ſeveral town and villages in the neighbourhood, and then returned to his camp. The Britons, diſheartened at the loſs they had ſuſtained, ſent the ſame day embaſſadors to ſue for peace; which Cæſar readily granted, upon their promiſing to ſend him over into Gaul double the number of hoſtages he had required before. His want of horſe, and the fear of expoſing his fleet to another ſtorm, if he ſtaid till the equinox, made him haſten his departure. The ſame night therefore, the wind proving favourable, he weighed anchor, and arrived ſafe in Gaul, whence he immediately wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them with his exploits in Britain; for which a ſupplication, or general thankſgiving, was decreed for twenty days [c].

They attack the Roman camp; but are repulſed with great ſlaughter.

Cæſar returns to Gaul.

The Britons, it ſeems, were not much awed by Cæſar's arms; for of all the ſtates, into which the iſland was then divided, two only ſent him hoſtages. Provoked at this neglect or contempt, he reſolved to make a new deſcent the following ſpring with a far more powerful fleet and army. With this view, before he left Gaul to return to Italy, where he uſed to paſs part of the winter, he ordered his lieutenants to refit the old ſhips, and build as many new ones as they could. His orders were executed with ſuch diligence, that, upon his return, he found ſix hundred ſhips, and twenty-eight galleys, ready to launch in a few days. Having therefore commended the application and diligence of his ſoldiers, and the ſupervifors, he commanded them to repair with the fleet to Portus Itius (C), while he marched with four legions, and eight Cæſar's ſecond expedition into Britain. Year before Chriſt 55.

[c] Cæſ. ibid.

(C) Cluverius, and Somner in his diſſertation de Portu Iccio, will have Bologne to be the Portus Itius mentioned by Cæſar; others look for the Portus Itius at Calais, or in that neighbourhood.

hundred horſe, into the county of Treves, to prevent a rebellion there; which he had no ſooner done, than he haſtened to the above-mentioned port, and leaving Labienus there with three legions, and two thouſand horſe, to ſecure it, to provide corn, and to ſend him intelligence from time to time of what might happen on the continent, he embarqued with five legions, and two thouſand horſe, and weighing anchor about ſun-ſet, arrived with his whole fleet the next day by noon on the Britiſh coaſt, where he landed, without oppoſition, in the ſame place, which he had found ſo convenient the year before. The Britons had aſſembled in vaſt multitudes to oppoſe his landing, as he afterwards underſtood from the priſoners; but being terrified at the ſight of ſo numerous a fleet, amounting, with the veſſels which ſeveral perſons had provided for their own uſe, to eight hundred and upwards, they had left the ſhore, and retired to the hills. Cæſar, being informed, after landing his troops, where the Britons were lodged, left ten cohorts, and three hundred horſe, to ſecure the fleet, and with the reſt marched in queſt of the enemy, whom he found poſted on the other ſide of a river, about twelve miles from the place where he had landed (D). Their deſign was to oppoſe his paſſage; but, notwithſtanding the advantage of the ground, they were obliged, by the Roman cavalry, to quit their poſt, and retire to a wood, whereof all the avenues were blocked up with huge trees cut down for that purpoſe. Out of this place, which ſeemed to have been fortified in ſome former war, they never ventured but in ſmall parties. But, notwithſtanding their utmoſt efforts to prevent the Romans from entering it, the ſoldiers of the ſeventh legion, having caſt themſelves into a teſtudo, and thrown up a mount againſt their works, obliged them to abandon their aſylum, and ſave themſelves by flight; but

He lands without oppoſition.

And defeats the Britons.

hood. Horſely obſerves, that Cæſar calls the paſſage from Portus Itius to Britain the ſhorteſt and eaſieſt, being about thirty miles. Now, by an accurate ſurvey, the diſtance at Calais from land to land is twenty-ſix Engliſh miles, or twenty-eight and a half Roman.

(D) This river is ſuppoſed to be the Stour, the Thames being too diſtant; ſo that the battle was fought on the banks of that river, to the north of the town. Horſely is of opinion, that the ſtrong place, to which the Britons retreated after their defeat, muſt have been Durovernum, now Canterbury, diſtant twelve miles from the place where Cæſar landed (2).

(2) Horſely, p. 14.

but the day being far ſpent, Cæſar, who was quite unacquainted with the country, thought it more adviſeable to return, and fortify his camp, than to purſue the fugitives[f].

EARLY next morning, Cæſar diſpatched both his horſe and foot, divided into three bodies, in purſuit of the enemy; but when he was already come in ſight of their rear, he was acquainted by ſome horſemen from Q. Atrius, that, by a dreadful ſtorm, which had happened the night before, moſt of his ſhips were daſhed to pieces, or driven aſhore. Upon this intelligence, he haſtened back to the ſea-ſide, where he was an eye-witneſs of the misfortune, which he had heard from the meſſengers; for forty ſhips were entirely loſt, and the reſt ſo damaged, that they could not be refitted without great trouble and labour. However, having, without loſs of time, ſet all the carpenters in the fleet and army to work, he ſent over to Gaul for others, ordering at the ſame time Labienus to build as many ſhips as he could with the legions that were there. To prevent the like misfortune for the future, he reſolved upon a very difficult undertaking, which was, to draw all his ſhips aſhore, and encloſe them within the fortifications of his camp. This ſtupendous work being completed in ten days, the ſoldiers labouring the whole time night and day without intermiſſion, and the camp being ſtrongly fortified, Cæſar, leaving the ſame guard as before to defend it, marched with the reſt of his forces to the place, whence he had returned from purſuing the enemy. Upon his arrival, he found their numbers greatly encreaſed, under the conduct of Caſſibelan, king of the Trinobantes, whoſe territories lay about eighty miles from the ſea. He had formerly made war on his neighbours; but, upon the arrival of the Romans, they had all unanimouſly committed the whole management of the war to him, as the moſt proper perſon to head them at ſo important a conjuncture. While the Romans were on their march, they were attacked by the Britiſh horſe and chariots, whom they repulſed with great ſlaughter, and drove into the woods; but purſuing them too eagerly, they loſt ſome of their own men. Not long after, the Britons made a ſudden ſally out of the woods, and fell upon the advanced guard, while the Romans were buſied in fortifying their camp. Cæſar immediately detached two cohorts to their aſſiſtance; but the enemy, while the Romans ſtood amazed at their new way of fighting, boldly broke through the two cohorts, and returned again without the loſs of a man. Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune, was ſlain in this action; but some fresh cohorts coming to the relief of the Britons, the Romans were, in the end, put to flight. The next day they kept on the hills, at a considerable distance from the Roman camp, till about noon; when three legions being detached by Cæsar, with all the cavalry, under the command of C. Trebonius, to forage, they fell upon the foragers with great fury; but meeting with a vigorous resistance, they betook themselves to flight; and being pursued by the Roman cavalry so close, that they had not time to rally, to make a stand, or to get down from their chariots, according to their custom, great numbers of them were cut to pieces. Upon this overthrow, the auxiliary troops, that had come from all parts, abandoning Cassibelan, returned to their respective countries; nor did the Britons ever after engage Cæsar with their united forces [g].

The Romans ſuſtain a great loſs by a ſtorm.

Caſſibelan falls upon the Romans; but is repulſed.

[f] Cæſ. comment. l. v.

The Britons fall upon three Roman legions, but are defeated.

After this victory, Cæsar marched towards the Thames, with a design to cross that river, and enter the territories of Cassibelan; but when he came to the only place where the river could, though not without great difficulty, be forded, he saw the enemy's forces drawn up in a considerable body on the opposite bank, which was fortified with sharp stakes. They had likewise driven many stakes of the same kind so deep into the bottom of the river, that their tops were covered with the water. Though Cæsar had intelligence of this from the prisoners and deserters, yet he ordered the cavalry to ride in, and the legions to follow; which they did with such resolution and intrepidity, that, though the foot were up to the chin in water, the enemy, not able to sustain their assault, abandoned the bank, and fled (E). Cassibelan, now despairing of success by a battle, disbanded the greatest part of his forces, retaining only about four thousand chariots, to observe the Cæsar passes the Thames.

[g] Idem ibid.

(E) Polyænus tells us, that Cæsar, on this occasion, made use of the following stratagem: he caused an elephant, covered with iron, having a wooden tower on his back full of men, to be driven into the river; which unusual sight struck such terror into the Britons, that they abandoned the opposite shore (3). The stakes are just above Walton in Surry; and the meadow facing them is called Coway. They are even now to be seen at low-water; and one of them was lately pulled out of the Thames, but with great difficulty. They are of oak, and, tho' they have been so long in the water, are as hard as brazil, and as black as jet. At Shepperton, they have several knife-handles made of them (4).

(3) Polyæn. strat. l. viii. (4) Tindal, in not. ad Rapin.

the motions of the Romans. With these he kept at some distance in the woods, or in such places as were scarce accessible to the Romans, carrying off the cattle and corn from those countries through which the Romans were to march. As he was well acquainted with the roads and by-ways, if the Roman cavalry ventured a little too far to lay the country waste, he detached part of his chariots to attack them; which they could not engage without great disadvantage. This prevented the Romans from making excursions, as they would have otherwise done, and obliged Cæsar not to suffer his horse to go farther to burn and plunder the country, than the legions were able to follow them. In the mean time the Trinobantes sent embassadors to Cæsar, promising to submit to him, and at the same time entreating him to protect Mandubratius against the oppression of Cassibelan, and send him to them for their king and governor. Mandubratius, called by Eutropius and Bede, Androgeus, was the son of Imanuentius, king of the Trinobantes; but, upon the death of his father, who was slain by Cassibelan, to avoid the like fate, he had fled to Cæsar, who had granted him his protection. Cæsar readily complied with the request of the Trinobantes, enjoining them to send him forty hostages, and corn for his army; which they did accordingly. The example of the Trinobantes, whose submission secured them from being plundered by the Roman soldiers, was soon followed by other states; viz. the Cenomagni, Segontiaci, Anaclites, Bibroci, and Cossi (F), who,

The Trinobantes submit to Cæsar.

(F) Lipsius, instead of Cenomagni, reads Iceni, Cangi (5), the names of two nations mentioned elsewhere by Cæsar The Iceni inhabited Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire; and the Cangi the country lying on the Irish sea; for when Ostorius led his army against them, he approached the sea, says Tacitus (6), that faces the island of Ireland. Camden agrees with Lipsius in changing the first part of Cenomagni into Iceni; but as for the latter, he reads Regni, who were the inhabitants of Sussex and Surry, and consequently more likely to follow the example of the Trinobantes, who inhabited Hertfordshire, Essex, and Middlesex, than the Cangi, who lived at a greater distance. The Segontiaci are placed by some in Berkshire, by others in Hampshire (7). The city of Seguntium, mentioned by Antoninus, stood on the coast of North Wales, over-against the island of Anglesey, as appears from the itinerary; but we cannot think the

(5) Lips. in Tacit. l. xii. c. 32. (6) Idem ibid. (7) Thom. Savil. in epist. 13. ad Cam.

by their embaſſadors, ſubmitted to Cæſar. From theſe he had intelligence, that the town of Caſſibelan, ſuppoſed to be Verulamium, now St. Albans, well fortified with woods and marſhes, whither the country people had retired with their cattle, was but a little way from his camp. Thither therefore he marched with his legions; and though he found the place ſtrongly fortified both by nature and art, he ordered it to be ſtormed at two different places; which was done with ſuch reſolution, that the Britons, not able to ſuſtain the fury of the aſſault, fled out at one of the avenues of the wood; for this town was only a thick wood, ſurrounded with a ditch, and fortified with a rampart. Many of the Britons were overtaken as they attempted to make their eſcape, and cut in pieces. Here Cæſar found great ſtore of cattle [h].

Who takes Caſſibelan's chief city.

To repair, in ſome degree, this loſs, and divert Cæſar from purſuing his conqueſts, Caſſibelan, by his meſſengers, perſuaded four petty princes of Kent, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, whom Cæſar ſtyles kings, to raiſe what forces they could, and attack the camp, where the ſhips were laid up; but the Romans, having made a ſally, repulſed them with great ſlaughter, took Cingetorix priſoner, and returned, without any loſs, to their trenches. Upon the news of this defeat, Caſſibelan, conſidering the many loſſes he had ſuſtained, how his country was laid waſte, and, above all, that ſeveral ſtates had already ſubmitted to the conqueror, reſolved to follow their example; and accordingly ſent embaſſadors to treat of a ſurrender, who were introduced by Comius of Attrebatum or Arras. As the ſummer was already far ſpent, Cæſar, who was determined to winter in Gaul, to prevent ſudden inſurrections there, readily hearkened to their propoſals; ſo that a treaty was ſoon concluded upon the following conditions; viz. that the Britons ſhould pay an annual tribute to the people of Rome; that Caſſibelan ſhould leave Mandubratius in the quiet poſſeſſion of his dominions, and not moleſt the Trinobantes; and that he ſhould deliver a certain Four Kentiſh kings attack the Roman camp; but are repulſed.

Caſſibelan ſues for peace, and obtains it.

[h] Cæſar. comment. l. v. c. 21.

the inhabitants of that city to be the Seguntiaci mentioned in this place, it being altogether improbable, that they ſhould have ſubmitted by their embaſſadors to Cæſar, while he was ſtill at ſo great a diſtance from their country. The Anaclites and Bibroci are placed by moſt of our antiquaries in Berkſhire, the former about Henley, and the latter about Bray. The Coſſi are ſuppoſed to have inhabited ſome part of Hertfordſhire, perhaps the hundred of Caiſhow.

certain number of hoſtages. Theſe Cæſar no ſooner received, than he marched back to the ſea-ſide, where he cauſed his fleet, which he found refitted, to be launched. As he had a great number of captives, and ſome of his ſhips had been loſt in the ſtorm, he reſolved to tranſport his army at two voyages. But moſt of thoſe veſſels, which were ſent back from Gaul after they had landed the ſoldiers, that were firſt carried over, and of the ſixty, that Labienus had taken care to build, being driven back by contrary winds, Cæſar, after having long expected them in vain, leſt the winter ſhould prevent his voyage, the equinox being near at hand, crouded his ſoldiers cloſer than he deſigned, and putting to ſea about the ſecond watch of the night, reached the continent with his whole fleet by break of day [i]. Cæſar returns to Gaul.

SUCH is the account Cæſar himſelf gives us of his two famous expeditions into Britain; but other authors have ſpoken more doubtfully of his victories here. Dion Caſſius writes, that the Britons utterly routed the Roman infantry; but were afterwards put in diſorder by the cavalry. Horace and Tibullus, in ſeveral places of their works, ſpeak of the Britons as a nation not yet conquered [k]. Tacitus tells us, that Cæſar rather ſhewed the Romans the way to Britain, than put them in poſſeſſion of it [l]; and Lucan more plainly, that he turned his back to the Britons, and fled. Be that as it will, upon his return to Rome, he offered to Venus, as Pliny tells us, a breaſtplate enriched with Britiſh pearls, as a trophy of his conqueſts in this iſland.

AFTER the departure of Julius Cæſar, the Romans were diverted, for the ſpace of twenty years, by their domeſtic broils, and civil wars, from attempting any thing againſt Britain. During this time, the tribute was not paid, nor perhaps demanded; ſo that the Britons continued no leſs free from the Roman yoke, than they had been before the arrival of Cæſar. But Auguſtus, having at length put an end to the civil wars, and firmly eſtabliſhed himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the empire, reſolved to force the Britons, that is, thoſe who inhabited the moſt ſouthern part of the iſland, to perform the agreement they had made with his uncle Julius. With this view he advanced as far as Gaul; but was, by a revolt in Pannonia, diverted from putting his deſign in execution. About ſeven years after, he entered Gaul with the ſame reſolution; but the unſettled ſtate of that province made him readily readily hearken to the propoſals of the embaſſadors ſent by the Britons to ſue for peace; which was granted them, no doubt, upon their promiſing to ſtand to their agreement with his predeceſſor Julius. But they neglected, it ſeems, to perform their promiſe; for the year enſuing Auguſtus reſumed the reſolution of paſſing over into Britain; but was a new prevented, by the revolt of the Cantabrians in Spain. However, ſome of the Britiſh princes took care to cultivate his friendſhip with preſents; which were laid up in the capitol [m]. Cunobeline, who is ſaid to have ſucceeded Tenuantius, the ſucceſſor of Caſſibelan, maintained a correſpondence with Rome, and even cauſed coins to be ſtamped, after the manner of the Romans, ſome of which are ſtill to be ſeen, and among the reſt one with the word Taſc on the reverſe, ſignifying, according to our antiquaries, tribute; whence they conclude, that this money was deſigned for the payment of the tribute; for tho' braſs and iron rings of a certain weight ſerved, as Cæſar informs us, for their current coin, yet the Romans exacted the tribute in gold or ſilver; and of the latter metal is the coin we are here ſpeaking of (G). Thus Britain, by degrees, became well known to the Romans, even in Auguſtus's time. That prince however, ſatisfied with the ſmall tribute that was yearly ſent him from Britain, forbore any further attempts upon the iſland, either thinking the friendſhip or enmity of the Britons of no moment to the Romans, as Strabo inſinuates [n], or being, out of a ſtate maxim, reſolved to ſet bounds to the empire, leſt it ſhould grow too great and unwieldy [o].

Auguſtus. State of Britain during his reign.

[i] Idem ibid. c. 23--25. [k] Horat. epod. viii. & odar. l. i. c. 35. Tibull. l. iv. [l] Tacit. vit. Agricol.

Cunobeline maintains a correſpondence with Rome.

TIBERIUS,

[m] Strabo, l. iv. [n] Idem, l. ii. [o] Tacit. in vit. Agric. Julian. in Cæſ.

(G) On this medal is repreſented Apollo playing on the lyre, the name of Cunobeline being engraved round it. Alford obſerves, that the Gauls and Britons worſhipped Apollo, under the name of Belus or Belinus; and thence he derives the name of Cunobeline. On the reverſe is engraved the figure of a woman, with the words Taſcia and Novane. Taſcia ſignifies in the Britiſh tongue, according to Powel, a tribute-peny, probably from the Latin word taxatio, the letter X not being uſed by the Britons. By the woman is, in all likelihood, repreſentéd Britain; and as for the word Novane, Alford conjectures it to be the name of ſome town, perhaps the metropolis of the Novantes or Trinobantes (8).

(8) Alford, annal. ad ann. 1. Camden, numiſ. n. 7.

Tiberius suffers the Britons to enjoy their liberties.

TIBERIUS, who succeeded Augustus, being more inclined to contract than enlarge the bounds of the empire, followed the example of Augustus, and never entertained the least thought of conquering Britain; but, satisfied with the respect the British princes shewed him in sending back some of Germanicus's soldiers, who had been shipwrecked on their coasts [p], and with their paying the usual customs for such commodities as they brought into Gaul, suffered them to enjoy their liberties, and live according to their own laws. These customs the Roman officers collected in a precarious manner, fearing to provoke the Britons, as Strabo tells us [q]. Caligula, the successor of Tiberius, having passed the Alps with a design to plunder Gaul, as he had already done Italy, received there under his protection Adminius, called by our writers Guiderius, the son of Cunobeline, who had been banished by his father. Hereupon he wrote boasting letters to Rome, ordering the messengers to drive their chariots into the forum, and to the very curia, and strictly enjoining them not to deliver their letters but in the temple of Mars, and in a full senate, as if the whole island had submitted to him. Soon after, no doubt at the instigation of Adminius, he marched his forces to the seaside; but being informed there, that the Britons were ready to receive him, his courage cooled, and, instead of pursuing his design, he ordered his soldiers to fill their helmets and laps with cockle-shells, which he called the spoils of the conquered ocean. Having, by such marks of folly and madness, exposed himself to the derision both of the Gauls and Britons, he wrote to the senate, desiring them to decree him a triumph. But they being averse to comply with his demand, he resolved to cause them all to be murdered; but was murdered himself, before he could put his barbarous design in execution [r].

Caligula's mock expedition against the Britons.

THE Britons may be said to have continued hitherto free from the Roman yoke; but in the reign of Claudius, the successor of Caligula, great part of the island was brought under subjection to Rome, and the rest by degrees under the succeeding emperors. Dion Cassius gives us a distinct account of the invasion by Claudius, the occasion of which he thus relates: Cunobeline being dead, his two sons, Togodumnus and Caractacus, reigned; but whether jointly or separately, whether with equal or subordinate power, we are no where told. In their reign, one Bericus, (who he was, is not known)

Claudius.

What induced him to make war on the Britons.

[p] Tacit. annal. l. ii. [q] Strabo, l. iv. [r] Suet. in Calig. Dio. l. lix.

known) being driven out of the iſland for attempting to raiſe a ſedition, fled, with thoſe of his party, to Claudius; and being highly provoked againſt his countrymen, perſuaded the emperor to invade Britain. On the other hand, the Britons, reſenting the emperor's receiving the fugitives, and his refuſing to deliver them up when demanded, forbad all commerce with the Romans. A war being therefore reſolved on, Claudius ordered Plautius, then prætor in Gaul, to tranſport thoſe legions he had with him into Britain, and begin the expedition. The ſoldiers, unwilling to make war, as they ſaid, out of the compaſs of the world, refuſed to follow their general, or obey his commands; but being at length brought back to a ſenſe of their duty, in the manner we have related elſewhere [s], they embarqued chearfully, and put to ſea from three ports, in order to land in three different places. They were driven back by contrary winds, which greatly diſheartened them; but re-ſuming their courage upon the appearing of a meteor ſhooting from the eaſt, and directing, as they imagined, their courſe, they put to ſea again, and landed in Britain without oppoſition, the inhabitants, who had been informed of the mutiny in the Roman army, and did not expect ſo ſudden an alteration, having delayed to draw together, in order to oppoſe them. Hearing therefore they were landed, they kept in ſmall bodies behind their marſhes, and in their woods, in order to ſpin out the time till winter; which they imagined Plautius, after the example of Julius Cæſar, would paſs in Gaul. But the Roman general, having, with great difficulty, firſt found out Caractacus, and afterwards Togodumnus, and defeated them both, reduced part of the Dobuni, who were then ſubject to the Catieuchlani; and leaving a garriſon to keep them in awe, he marched to a river, where the Britons lay careleſly encamped, imagining the Romans could not paſs it without a bridge. But the German ſoldiers, accuſtomed to ſwim the ſtrongeſt currents in their armour, having paſſed the river, and, purſuant to their orders, fallen only upon the horſes that drew the chariots, in which the main ſtrength of the Britons conſiſted, Veſpaſian, and his brother Sabinus, ſent over with a body of troops to ſupport them, eaſily put the enemy to flight, their chariots being rendered unſerviceable, and cut great numbers of them in pieces. The Britons however, not yet diſheartened, engaged the Romans the next day ſo vigorouſly, that the victory, for a conſiderable time, inclined to neither ſide; but at length the Romans, encouraged by the Plautius ſent into Britain with an army.

He lands without oppoſition.

And having defeated two Britiſh princes, reduces part of the Dobuni.

The Britons attack the Romans, but, notwithſtanding their gallant behaviour, are put to flight.

[s] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xiv. p. 122.

the example of Caius Sidius Geta, charged the Britons so briskly, that they were forced, after a most obstinate resistance, to betake themselves to flight. The conduct of Geta in this action was so remarkable, that triumphal honours were decreed him, though he had never been consul [t]. This battle is supposed to have been fought on the banks of the Severn. From hence the Britons retired to the mouth of the Thames, and, being acquainted with the flats and shallows, drew the Romans, who followed them, into great danger. But the Germans having crossed the river by swimming, and the others on a bridge somewhat higher, the Britons were surrounded on all sides, and great numbers of them put to the sword. Many of the Romans, pursuing the fugitives with too much eagerness, fell into the marshes, and were lost. In one of these battles, Togodumnus was killed, whose death was so far from disheartening the Britons, that they betrayed greater eagerness than ever to oppose the Romans, and revenge it. Hereupon Plautius, not thinking it advisable to penetrate farther into the country, put garrisons into the places he had taken, and wrote to the emperor, who had ordered him to do so, if any thing extraordinary should happen, acquainting him with the progress he had already made, and the dangers he apprehended from a further pursuit of his conquests. Claudius, who aspired at the honour of a triumph, not being satisfied with the triumphal ornaments decreed him by the senate, no sooner received this letter, than he set out from Rome; and embarking at Ostia, sailed to Marseilles, whence he pursued his journey by land to Gessoriacum, now Bologne, where he again embarqued, and, landing safe in Britain, joined his lieutenant Plautius, who lay encamped on the banks of the Thames. Upon his arrival, the whole army passed the river, and falling upon the Britons, gave them a total overthrow. After this victory, he advanced to Camalodunum, the royal seat of Cunobeline, which he took, and, without any considerable opposition, reduced some of the neighbouring states. For these exploits, he was several times by his soldiers saluted imperator, contrary to the received custom of the Romans, which allowed no general to assume that title more than once in the same war [u]. Part of Britain being thus subdued, Claudius disarmed the inhabitants, and appointed Plautius to govern them, ordering him at the same time to subdue those, who remained yet unconquered. To such as had submitted, he generously forgave the confiscation of their estates; which obliged them to such a degree, that they erected Claudius sets out from Rome, and lands in Britain. Year after Christ 44.

He defeats the Britons and takes Camalodunum.

[t] Dio, l. lx. p. 679---680. Suet. in Claud. c. 11.

[u] Dio, ibid. p. 680---681.

erected a temple to him, and paid him divine honours. The emperor, after having ſtaid in Britain but ſixteen days, ſet out from thence on his return to Rome, having ſent thither his two ſons-in law, Pompeius and Silanus, before him with the news of his victories. Upon his arrival in the city, he was honoured with a triumph, and the ſurname of Britannicus; which was given both to him and his ſon: the officers, who had attended him in this expedition, were diſtinguiſhed with triumphal ornaments (H): annual ſports were decreed by the ſenate; and two triumphal arches, one to be erected at Rome, and the other at Geſſoriacum, whence he had paſſed over into Britain. On the top of the imperial palace was fixed a naval crown, implying the conqueſt of the Britiſh ocean. In ſhort, the ſame honours were decreed to Claudius, who had conquered but a very ſmall part of the iſland, as had been decreed to other conquerors, after they had reduced whole kingdoms [x] (I).

He returns to Rome, where he is honoured with a triumph, and the ſurname of Britannicus.

PLAUTIUS

[x] Dio, & Suet. ibid.

(H) The inferior officers were rewarded with other valuable preſents, as appears from an antient inſcription ſtill to be ſeen at Turin, wherein mention is made of the preſents, with which Claudius rewarded one C. Gavius, who, it ſeems, had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Britiſh war. The inſcription is as follows:

" C. Gavio L. F.
" Stel. Silvano
" Primipilari Leg. VIII. Aug.
" Tribuno coho. II. vigilum
" Tribuno coh. XIII. Urban.
" Tribuno coh. XII. Prætor.
" Donis Donato A. D. Claudio
" Bello Britannico
" Torquibus, Armillis, Phaleris,
" Corona Aurea
" Patrono Colon.

(I) And yet Suetonius writes, that he became maſter of part of Britain without bloodſhed; which is confirmed by the following antient inſcription, copied by Mr. Wright from the Barbarini palace at Rome, and lately publiſhed by him in his travels:

" Ti. Claudio Cæſ.
" Auguſto.
" Pontifici Max. Tr. P. IX.
" Coſ. V. Imp. XVI. P. P.
" Senatus Popul. Q. R. Quod
" Reges Britanniæ Abſq.
" Ula Jactura Domuerit
" Genteſque Barbaras
" Primus Indicio Subegerit.

PLAUTIUS, appointed by Claudius governor of Britain, purſued his conqueſts, after the emperor's departure, with ſuch ſucceſs, that, upon his return to Rome, he was honoured with an ovation, and met, without the gates, by the emperor himſelf, who, at his ſolemn entry, gave him the right hand. In this war, Veſpaſian likewiſe, afterwards emperor, and his ſon Titus, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very eminent manner. The former fought thirty battles with the Britons, ſubdued two powerful nations, and reduced above twenty towns, with the iſle of Wight; for which exploits he received the triumphal ornaments, two ſacerdotal dignities, and the conſulſhip [y]. As for Titus, he no leſs ſignalized his piety, than his courage and valour; for ſeeing his father in a battle ſurrounded on all ſides, and in imminent danger of his life, he broke through the enemy's ranks, and having reſcued him, put the Britons to flight, and purſued them with great ſlaughter [z]. Some years after, that is, in the ninth year of Claudius's reign, as we gather from Tacitus [a], P. Oſtorius Scapula, being ſent into Britain, fell unexpectedly upon the Britons, who had broken into the Roman conqueſts; and having put great numbers of them to the ſword, and diſperſed the reſt, to reſtrain them from making inroads for the future into the territories of the Romans, or their allies, he built ſeveral forts on the Severn, the Avon, and the Nen, reduced that part of the iſland, which lies ſouth of theſe rivers, to a Roman province, and, for a further ſecurity, made Camalodunum a military colony. This the Iceni could not brook, and therefore, being joined by the neighbouring nations, they raiſed a conſiderable army, and encamped in an advantageous poſt, in order to prevent the Romans from penetrating farther into the iſland. However, Oſtorius, advancing againſt them, after a moſt obſtinate conflict, put them to flight, and purſued them with great ſlaughter. After this victory, he led his army into the country of the Cangi, probably the preſent counties of Shropſhire and Cheſhire; but being informed, as he approached the Iriſh ſea, that the Brigantes were in arms, he marched with all ſpeed againſt them; and having cauſed the chief authors of the diſturbance to be put to death, and pardoned the reſt, he ſoon reſtored that country to its former tranquility. After this, Oſtorius made war upon the Silures, the inhabitants of South Wales, headed by Caractacus, a commander of great renown, whom nevertheleſs Veſpaſian and Titus diſtinguiſh themſelves in this war.

P. Oſtorius Scapula governor of Britain.

Camalodunum is made a Roman colony.

Oſtorius defeates the Iceni, and quells the rebellious Brigantes.

[y] Suet. in Veſp. c. 4. [z] Dio, l. lx. p. 679. [a] Vide Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xiv. p. 149. note (U).

nevertheleſs he defeated in a pitched battle, the particulars wherof we have related at length in our Roman hiſtory, to which we refer the reader [b]. Caractacus, upon his defeat, fled for protection to Cratiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, who dreading the Roman arms, delivered him in bonds to the conqueror; by whom he was ſent to Rome, with his wife, daughter, and brothers, and received there by the emperor in a kind of triumph. Claudius, moved with the ſpeech which the captive prince made when brought before his tribunal, and admiring the conſtancy with which he bore his misfortunes, granted to him, to his wife, to his daughter, and brothers, both their lives and liberty. The Silures, notwithſtanding the loſs of their general, purſued the war with great vigour, and gained very conſiderable advantages over the Romans, related by us elſewhere [c]; which ſo affected Oſtorius, that he died with grief. He was ſucceeded by A. Didius, who reſtrained the Silures making frequent and wide incurſions into the Roman territories within more narrow bounds; but was not able to reſtore Cratiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, and an ally of Rome, to her kingdom [d]. He defeated the Brigantes in a pitched battle; but afterwards, as he was ſtricken in years, he contented himſelf with acting only defenſively, and reſtraining the enemy by his lieutenants. Veranius, who ſucceeded him in the reign of Nero, died in leſs than a year after his arrival in Britain, without performing any thing worthy of notice. After him, Suetonius Paulinus governed Britain, who reduced the iſland of Angleſey, and defeated with great ſlaughter the Britons, who, under the conduct of queen Boudicea, had taken arms, and put incredible numbers of the Romans, and their allies, to the ſword, as we have related at length in our Roman hiſtory, to which we refer the reader [e]. Suetonius Paulinus was ſucceeded in the government of Britain by Petronius Turpilianus, and he by Trebellius Maximus. During their government, nothing remarkable happened; for, as they were both men of an indolent temper, and no ambition, they took care not to provoke the Britons by any acts of hoſtility, giving to this cowardly inaction the ſpecious name of peace. In the mean time Nero dying, the Roman army was commanded, during the ſhort reigns of Galba and Otho, only by tribunes, among whom Cælius bore the chief ſway, who, by carefully avoiding to give the Britons any juſt cauſe of complaint, kept all things quiet Caractacus defeated, and delivered up to the Romans.

Oſtorius dies, and is ſucceeded by Aulus Didius.

And he by Veranius.

Suetonius Paulinus ſucceeds Veranius, and reduces the iſland of Angleſey.

[b] Ibid. p. 552, 152. [c] Ibid. p. 155. [d] Ibid. p. 156.
[e] Ibid. p. 209, 210.

quiet in the island. Vitellius, upon his accession to the empire, appointed Vectius Bolanus governor of Britain, who ruled with great gentleness, without either provoking the Britons, or being by them provoked. In the reign of Vespasian, who succeeded Vitellius, Petilius Cerealis was sent into Britain, to take upon him the command of the army there. Petilius, upon his arrival, attacked the Brigantes, the most numerous and powerful of all the British nations; and having defeated them in several encounters, some of which proved very bloody, he reduced great part of their country, and continued to ravage the rest [f]. He was succeeded by Julius Frontinus, who not only maintained the conquests made by his predecessor, but fought himself with great success against the warlike nation of the Silures, whom he entirely reduced. Julius Frontinus being recalled, the celebrated Cneius Julius Agricola was sent to command in his room. But of the exploits of that renowned commander, we have spoken at length in our Roman history [g]; and therefore, to avoid tedious repetitions, shall only add here, that having, in seven campaigns, reduced the whole island, he abandoned the more northern parts, and by raising forts, and planting garrisons, on the isthmus between the friths of Glota and Bodotria, now of Dunbriton and Edinburgh, he removed the Caledonians, as it were, into a separate island. Thus Agricola gave the finishing blow to the liberty of Britain, and reduced that part of the island, which lies south of the friths of Glota and Bodotria, to a Roman province. The loss of their liberty was, in some measure, counterbalanced by the politeness, that was introduced among them by the conquerors; for, by degrees, they assumed the customs and manners of the Romans, and forgetting their savage ways, applied themselves to the study of the liberal arts and sciences, which were no less esteemed and cultivated in Britain, than in any other province of the empire. But to return to Agricola: Domitian, who had succeeded his brother Titus in the empire, envying his general the great reputation he had gained by his conquests, recalled him, on pretence of preferring him to the government of Syria. After his departure, we have but short and broken accounts of what passed in this island, till the reign of the emperor Adrian. We do not even know who was Agricola's successor in the government of Britain. We only

Petilius Cerealis reduces great part of the country of the Brigantes.

Julius Agricola governor of Britain. Year after Christ 78.

He reduces Britain to a Roman province.

[f] Tacit. vit. Agric. c. 4---9.

[g] Univers. hist. vol. xiv. p. 476, 477, 618, &c.

only read in Suetonius [h], that Salluſtius Lucullus was legate of Britain in the reign of Domitian; and that he was put to death by that prince, for ſuffering his name to be given to a ſort of ſpears, which he had invented. In the reigns of the emperors Nerva, who ſucceeded Domitian, and Trajan who ſucceeded Nerva, ſome commotions happened in the iſland; but all we know of them is, that they were ſoon appeaſed, and the country reſtored to its former tranquillity, by the Roman troops quartered there; which, according to Joſephus, amounted to four legions [i]. In the reign of Adrian, the ſucceſſor of Trajan, the Caledonians, having demoliſhed ſome of the forts built by Agricola between the above-mentioned friths, made an irruption into the Roman province. Againſt them was diſpatched by Adrian, in the firſt year of his reign, Julius Severus, a commander of great renown; but he being ſuddenly recalled, and employed againſt the Jews, then in rebellion, Priſcus Licinius was ſent over in his room (K), and followed ſoon after by the emperor in perſon; whoſe arrival ſtruck the Caledonians with ſuch terror, that, abandoning the countries they had ſeized, they retired to the more northern parts of the iſland. Adrian, not thinking it worth his while to make war upon them, in order to keep them quiet, relinquiſhed to them all the country between the Tine and the two friths; but at the ſame time, to reſtrain them from making incurſions into the Roman province, he cauſed a wall to be built, extending from the Eden in Cumberland to the Tine in Northumberland, eighty miles in length [k]. Having thus ſettled affairs in Britain, and reformed many abuſes there, Adrian in Britain. Year after Chriſt 120.

His wall.

[h] Suet. in Domit. Spartian. in Hadrian. c. 5.

[i] Joſeph. apud Camden in Roman.

[k] Idem in Hadrian. p. 6.

(K) It appears from an antient inſcription found near Adrian's wall, that Licinius Priſcus had been proprætor of Cappadocia before he was ſent into Britain, had commanded the fourth legion, and had been honoured with a military banner by the emperor Adrian in his Jewiſh expedition. The inſcription is as follows:

" M. F. Cl. Priſco
" . . icinio Italico Legato Auguſtorum
" PR. PR. Provinc. Cappadociæ
" PR. PR. Prov. Britanniæ
. . . . . .
" Leg. IIII Galliciæ Præf. Coh. III Lingonum
" Vexillo Mil. ornato A Divo Hadriano
" in Expeditione Judaica
" Q. Caſſius Domitius Palumbus.

there, he returned to Rome, where he was honoured with the title of Reſtorer of Britain; which was ſtamped on his coins (L).

To Adrian ſucceeded Antoninus Pius, in whoſe reign the Brigantes revolted; and the Caledonians, having in ſeveral places, broken down Adrian's rampart, began anew to ravage the Roman territories. Againſt them was ſent Lollius Urbicus, Licinius Priſcus, whom Adrian had appointed governor of Britain, being, in all likelihood, dead; for Antoninus, as Julius Capitolinus informs us [l], removed none of the governors whom Adrian had preferred. Lollius obliged the Brigantes to ſubmit anew to the Roman yoke; and having driven back the northern barbarians, he confined them within narrower bounds than before, by a new wall, extending, as Camden and Brietius conjecture, from Bremenium, now Bramptон in Cumberland, to the river Eſk. For theſe atchievements, Antoninus received the ſurname of Britannicus, though he had never ſeen Britain himſelf [m] (M). In the reign of Marcus Aurelius, the ſucceſſor of Antoninus Pius, new commo-Lollius Urbicus builds a new wall. Year after Chriſt 138.

[l] Jul. Cap. in Antonin. c. 5.

[m] Idem ibid.

(L) Some of theſe have reached our times, and, among the reſt, one with the figure of Adrian, and three ſoldiers on the reverſe, repreſenting, as Camden conjectures, the three legions, of which the Roman army in Britain then conſiſted, viz, the legio ſecunda Auguſta, the quartadecima Victrix, and viceſima Victrix, called alſo Britannica. Under them is this inſcription, "Exer. "Britannicus." Other coins of the ſame prince bear this inſcription, "Reſtitutor Britanniæ."

(M) Lollius Urbicus was ſent into Britain, according to Alford, in the third year of Antoninus's reign, of the chriſtian æra 142, and the ſame year he reduced the rebellious Brigantes, and built the wall, which we have mentioned in the text. This Alford proves from two of Antoninus's medals, coined, by a decree of the ſenate, in that prince's third conſulſhip, that is, as Alford ſhews, in the third year of his reign. On theſe medals he is ſtyled Pater patriæ; and on the reverſe is repreſented Britain, on one ſitting on a globe, and on the other holding a ſpear, and reſting on a ſhield. As Antoninus is not, on either of theſe medals, ſtyled Britannicus, but on ſuch only as were coined five years after, Alford conjectures from thence, that ſome ſignal victory was gained, about that time, over the revolted Britons or Caledonians, which procured him the title of Britannicus (9).

(9) Vide Alford. annal. ad ann. 142 & 147.

tions were raised in Britain; which obliged the emperor to send thither Calpurnius Agricola, who, it seems, appeased them; for Fronto, the famous orator, as quoted by Eumenius, in a panegyric on the emperor Marcus Aurelius, says, among other things, that though, sitting in his palace at Rome, he had committed the management of the war to one of his generals, yet, like a pilot sitting at the stern, and guiding the helm, he deserved the honour of the whole expedition [n]. To Marcus Aurelius succeeded Commodus, in whose reign the Caledonians, having passed the wall, which parted them from the Romans, and cut in pieces the Roman general, and most of his army, committed every-where dreadful devastations without restraint, till Ulpius Marcellus was sent against them, who, as he was a commander of great experience, and a strict observer of the military discipline, drove back the Caledonians with great slaughter, and restored the island to its former tranquillity. The reputation he gained in this expedition was so great, that the emperor, thinking his own glory eclipsed by that of his general, resolved to put him to death; but, in the end, only removed him from his government. For the great advantages gained by Ulpius in Britain, Commodus assumed the title of imperator the sixth time [o]. That brave commander no sooner left Britain, than the army there began to mutiny, complaining chiefly of Perennis, the emperor's favourite, who, governing with an absolute sway, sent only persons of the equestrian order to command the British army, whom the soldiers therefore refused to obey. The mutiny was carried so far, that the army sent deputies to Rome, fifteen hundred, says Dion Cassius, of their own body, to complain of Perennis. These the emperor met without the city; and being by them informed, that Perennis aspired at the empire, and had, with that view, cashiered the bravest officers, and put his own creatures in their room, he delivered the traytor to the fury of the prætorian bands, which he then commanded, and must have no less disobliged than he had done the British army; for he was by them, after a thousand outrages, torn in pieces, with his wife, his sister, and his two sons [p]. The downfal and death of this favourite are related by Herodian in a quite different manner, as we have observed in our Roman history [q]. In the mean time Helvius Pertinax, afterwards emperor, was sent into Britain, to bring back Ulpius Marcellus drives the Caledonians out of the Roman province. Year after Christ 184.

The army in Britain mutinies on account of Perennis, who is delivered to them.

[n] Eumen. panegyr. x. [o] Dio, l. lxxii. p. 821. Camd. numm. 7. Spedius, fol. 133. [p] Dio, ibid, Lamp. in Commod. p. 48. [q] Hist. univers. vol. xv. p. 59. Herodian. l. i. p. 474.

back the mutinous army there to a ſenſe of their duty. Upon his arrival, the ſoldiery, not able to brook the tyrannical government of Commodus, offered him the ſovereignty, but he, by rejecting their offer with indignation, and proceeding with too much ſeverity againſt the mutineers, provoked them to ſuch a degree, that one of the legions openly revolted, much blood was ſhed, and Pertinax himſelf left for dead among the ſlain. However, in ſpite of all obſtacles, he brought the army at laſt to ſubmit, and reſtored tranquillity to the province; but, as his ſeverity had drawn upon him the ill-will and hatred of the ſoldiery, he was, ſome time after, recalled at his own requeſt, Clodius Albinus being appointed governor of Britain in his room [r]. Albinus, having, in a ſpeech to the ſoldiery, upon a falſe report of the emperor's death, declared for the power of the ſenate againſt that of the emperor, was commanded by Commodus to reſign the government of Britain to Junius Severus. But Commodus being ſoon after murdered, Pertinax, his ſucceſſor, ſent Albinus again into Britain, where he continued during the ſhort reigns of Pertinax and Didius Julianus. As he had, by his generoſity and largeſſes, gained the affections of the Britiſh army, he was, upon the death of Julianus, by them proclaimed emperor. To maintain his title againſt Severus, who had received the ſame honour from the army in Pannonia, he paſſed over into Gaul with his Britiſh troops; but being met by his rival in the neighbourhood of Lyons, his army was defeated, and he himſelf ſlain, as we have related at length in our Roman hiſtory [s]. Severus, now maſter of the whole Roman empire, divided Britain into two governments, not thinking it perhaps adviſeable to truſt one man with ſo great a command. The hither, or ſouthern part of the iſland was given to Heraclitus, and the northern to Virius Lupus (N), who was ſo harraſſed by the continual inroads of the Caledonians, that he was in the end obliged to

A new mutiny in the army quelled by Pertinax.

Albinus governor of Britain, is ſaluted emperor.

Britain divided into two governments.

[r] Capitol. in Pertinace, c. 3.

[s] Hiſt. univerſ. vol. xv. p. 106.

(N) The Caledonians, according to Herodian, had promiſed to reſtrain the Mæatæ from making incurſions into the Roman territories; but they neglecting to perform this article of their agreement, Virius Lupus was obliged to apply to the Mæatæ themſelves, and buy a peace of them at a great rate. From an antient inſcription found at Ilkly in Yorkſhire, by Ptolemy called Olinaca, it appears, that Virius Lupus reſtored that place. The inſcription is as follows:

" Im-

to purchaſe a peace with money; which they maintained till the fifteenth year of Severus's reign, when breaking anew into the Roman province, they committed every-where dreadful devaſtations. Virius Lupus, not thinking himſelf in a condition to withſtand them, retired as they advanced, and in the mean time acquainted the emperor with the ſtate of affairs, and the dangers that threatened the province, unleſs powerful and timely ſupplies were ſent to make head againſt the barbarians. Hereupon Severus, reſolved to put an end to the daily incurſions of the enemy, by the entire conqueſt of the north, ſet out for Britain, at the head of a numerous army, accompanied by his two ſons Caracalla and Geta. The Caledonians no ſooner heard of his arrival, than they ſent embaſſadors to him, offering to conclude a peace upon honourable terms. Theſe the emperor detained, till he was ready to take the field, and then diſmiſſed them, without granting them their requeſt. As ſoon as the ſeaſon was fit for action, he marched into their country, and putting all to fire and ſword, advanced to the moſt diſtant and northern coaſts of the iſland. Tho' no battle was fought in this expedition, yet what by the enemy's continual ambuſcades, what by the hardſhips and toils the ſoldiers underwent in cutting down woods, building bridges, draining marſhes, &c. fifty thouſand of them are ſaid to have periſhed. The Caledonians however were, in the end, obliged to purchaſe a peace, by yielding to the Romans part of their country, and delivering up their arms. Having thus concluded a peace with the Caledonians, he returned to York, leaving to his ſon Caracalla the command of the army, and the finiſhing of the wall, which he had begun, according to the opinion, which to us ſeems moſt probable, on the iſthmus between the friths of Forth and Clyde. Of this wall we have ſpoken above, and more at length in our Roman hiſtory [t]. For this expedition, Severus was honoured by the ſenate with the title of Britannicus Maximus, and his two ſons with that of Britannicus [u]. The emperor being taken ill at York, the Caledonians were no ſooner informed of his indiſpoſition, than they took up arms with one accord; which provoked Severus goes over into Britain. Year after Chriſt 207.

And penetrates into the moſt northern parts of the iſland.

He builds a new wall.

Severus

[t] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xv. p. 116, & ſeq.

[u] Spart. in Sever. Goltz. p. 88.

" Im. Severus
" Aug. et Antoninus
" Cæſ. Deſtinatus reſtituerunt
" Curante Virio Lupo Leg.
" eorum PR. PR.

Severus to such a degree, that he ordered his son Caracalla to enter their country anew with the whole army, and put all he met to the sword, without distinction of sex or age. But the emperor dying before his orders could be put in execution, his two sons, having concluded a shameful peace with the Caledonians, returned to Rome [x]. Severus dies.

In the reigns of the twelve succeeding emperors, viz. Macrinus, Heliogabalus, Alexander, Maximinus, Pupienus, Gordian, Philip, Decius, Gallus, Valerian, Gallienus, and Claudius, we are left almost quite in the dark as to the affairs of Britain; for all we know of them, while these princes ruled, is, that Britain still continued to be a Roman province; that, in the reign of Gordian III. it was governed by Nonnius Philippus (O); that, under Valerian and Gallienus, the Roman troops quartered in the north, to restrain the Caledonians, were commanded by one Desidienus Ælianus (P); that Britain, [x] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 882.

(O) This we learn, notwithstanding the silence of the Roman historians, from an antient inscription found at a place, by the Romans called Castra Exploratorum, and by us Old Carlisle. It is a votive inscription for the health of the emperor, of his wife, and the whole imperial family, set up by the Roman horse quartered in Britain, under the command of Æmilius Crispinus, a native of Tuidrum in Africa. The words of the inscription are as follows:

" I. O. M.
" Pro Salute Imperatoris
" M. Antoni. Gordiani P. F.
" Invicti Aug. et Sabinæ Tur
" iæ Tranquilæ conjugi ejus To-
" taque Domu Divin eorum Ala
" Augg. Gordia ob Virtutem
" Appellata posuit: cui praeest
" Aemilius Crispinus Praef.
" Eqq. natus in Pro. Africa De
" Tuidro sub cur. Nonnii Phi-
" lippi Leg. Aug. Propreto
" Attico et Pretextato
" Coss.

In two other inscriptions found at Lancheſter in the county of Durham, mention is made of Mæcilius Fuscus, and Cneius Lucillianus both proprætors of Britain in the reign of the same emperor Gordian III.

(P) This appears from the following inscription found in Northumberland:

" Pro

tain, revolting from Gallienus, declared for Posthumus, who had usurped the sovereignty in Gaul; that of the thirty usurpers, or, as they are styled, tyrants, besides Posthumus, the following were acknowledged in Britain, viz. Lollianus, Victorianus, and Tetricus, of whom the last being overcome by the emperor Aurelian, Britain submitted to the conqueror, Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, sent into Britain.

who sent hither Constantius, the father of "Constantine the Great," to establish his authority in the island [y]. Aurelian was succeeded by Tacitus, and he, after a short reign of about six months, by Probus, in whose time Bonosus, descended of a Spanish family, but born in Britain, usurped the sovereignty, and was acknowledged here, as well as in Gaul and Spain; but being, after several battles, reduced by Probus to great straights, he chose rather to strangle himself, than fall into the hands of the conqueror, as we have related at length elsewhere [z]. Zosimus [a] and Zonaras [b] tell us, that a governor, sent hither by Probus, assumed the imperial purple; but was soon after killed by Victorinus, upon whose recommendation he had been preferred to the government of this island [c]. Probus was, according to Vopiscus [d], the first that allowed the Britons, Spaniards and Gauls, to plant vines. The same emperor having, in an engagement on the banks of the Rhine with the Burgundians and Vandals, taken their king Igillus prisoner, with many others of these two nations, he transplanted them into Britain [e].

Burgundians and Vandals transplanted into Britain.

Carausius and Allectus usurp the sovereignty of Britain.

In the beginning of Diocletian's reign, Carausius, a native of Gaul, passing over into Britain, took upon him the title of emperor, and was acknowledged by all the troops quartered here; nay, by a treaty concluded between him and Maximian, whom Diocletian had taken for his partner in the empire, Britain was given up to Carausius, who governed it with the title of emperor for the space of six or seven years; but [y] Eumen. panegyr, ix, & x. Trebell. Poll. in 30 tyran. [z] Univers. hist. vol. xv. p. 284. [a] Zos. l. i. p. 663 [b] Zonar. p. 246. [c] Vide Univers. hist. ibid. [d] Vopisc. in Prob. c. 18. [e] Zos. l. i. p. 865. & Univers. hist. ibid.

"Pro Salute
"Desidieni Æliani Præ . . .
"et Sua S.
"Posuit Vot.
". . ao. Solvit Libe-
"ns Tusco et Bas-
"so Coss.

but was in the end killed by Allectus, as was Allectus, who had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor in Britain, in a pitched battle with Asclepiodotus, one of Constantius's officers. Upon his death, Britain was re-united to the empire, after it had been held about seven years by Carausius, and three by Allectus. Of these transactions the reader will find a particular and distinct account in our Roman history [f]. The two emperors Diocletian and Maximian having resigned the empire to Galerius and Constantius, the latter, to whose share fell the western provinces, soon after his accession to the empire, passed over into Britain, to make war, says Eumenius [g], on the Caledonians and Picts, whom he overcame; but not long after, died at York [h], where he had the satisfaction to see his son Constantine before he expired, and to appoint him his successor; so that Constantine began his reign in Britain, and, some time after, returned to this island, as we read in Eusebius [i], probably to put a stop to the daily incursions of the Caledonians. Of the new form of government, both civil and military, which he introduced here, we have spoken above. He likewise altered the division of Britain, which, by Severus, had been divided into two provinces only; but was by him divided into three, viz. Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Maxima Cæsariensis, which last was afterwards subdivided into two parts, viz. Maxima Cæsariensis, and Flavia Cæsariensis. The removal of the imperial seat from Rome to Constantinople, which happened in the reign of Constantine, gave the northern nations an opportunity of making frequent irruptions into the Roman province, the emperor having carried with him, first into Gaul, and afterwards into the east, not only most of the Roman troops quartered in Britain, but likewise the flower of the British youth; whence he is censured by Zosimus, for neglecting the boundary of the empire on this side [k]. Constantine divided the empire among his three sons, Constantine, Constans, and Constantius, of whom the latter, being in a short time possessed of the whole, sent into Britain the famous notary and informer Paulus, surnamed Catena, to bring from thence the tribunes, and other officers, who had sided with Magnentius. But of the enormous oppressions, extortions, and cruelties, practised on this occasion by that merciless man, we have spoken at length elsewhere [l]. Constantius,

Constantine begins his reign in Britain.

The famous informer Paulus surnamed Catena, in Britain.

about

[f] Univers. hist. vol. xv. p. 296, 301, & seq. [g] Eumen. panegyr. ix. p. 194 [h] Hier. Chron. Aur. Vict. p. 526. Eutrop. p. 587. [i] Euseb. vit. Constant. l. i. c. 25. [k] Zos. l. ii. [l] Univers. hist. vol. xv. p. 458.

about the latter end of his reign, committed the government of the western provinces to Julian, afterwards called the apostate, who, being informed, while he was in winter-quarters at Paris, that the Picts and Scots, about this time first distinguished in history by that name (Q), had broken into the Roman province, and committed every-where dreadful ravages, dispatched his lieutenant Lupicinus, with some troops, against them. Lupicinus, embarquing at Bologne in the depth of winter, reached London in a few days; but he had scarce landed his troops, when he was recalled [m], the northern nations having perhaps appeased Julian by their submission. During the short reigns of Julian and Jovian, we find nothing in history concerning the affairs of Britain. But, under Valentinian I. the Picts, Scots, Attacots, Saxons, and other northern nations, invaded the Roman province at one and the same time; and having killed Nectaridus, count of the maritime tract, and Fullofaudes, who is distinguished with the title of dux or duke, and probably commanded the land-forces, ravaged the country far and wide, and reduced the inhabitants to a most deplorable condition. News of this invasion being brought to Valentinian, while he was on his journey from Amiens to Treves, he immediately dispatched into Britain Severus, his comes domesticorum; but soon after recalled him, and sent Jovinus in his room; who having

The Roman province ravaged by the Scots and Picts.

[m] Ammian. l. xx. p. 154.

(Q) Ammianus Marcellinus, who wrote towards the latter end of the fourth century, is the first historian that mentions the Scots. But St. Jerom, in his epistle against Ctesiphon the Pelagian, has given us a much more antient passage, which he translated out of Porphyry the Greek philosopher, who wrote an age before Ammianus. The passage is as follows: "Neither Britain, "a province fertile in tyrants, nor the Scotish nations, nor the "barbarous nations round about to the very ocean, did ever "acknowledge Moses and the prophets." Scaliger, in his notes upon Propertius, and his animadversions on Eusebius, corrects the common editions of Seneca's satire upon Claudius, by reading, instead of the words Scuta Brigantes, Scoto Brigantes; but that correction is not countenanced by any manuscript copies; and besides, it is certain, that Claudius never made war upon the Scots, but kept in the southern parts of Britain. As for Dempster's reading Scoticas pruinas, instead of Scythicas, in the verses of the poet Florus to the emperor Adrian, that correction is generally looked upon as altogether groundless (10).

(10) Vide Usser. antiq. Brit. c. 16.

having acquainted the emperor with the miserable condition to which the island was reduced, and the still greater evils with which it was threatened, Theodosius, father to the emperor of that name, was thereupon chosen for this province, and trusted with the whole management of so troublesome a war. Theodosius the elder sent into Britain.

Theodosius, upon his arrival in Britain, divided his forces into several parties; which, advancing against the enemy, who were roving up and down the country, cut great numbers of them in pieces, recovered the booty and prisoners they had taken, and obliged them to abandon the province. The barbarians being thus repulsed, Theodosius entered Lundonium, or London, in a kind of triumph, and restored that, as well as several other cities, which had suffered greatly by the late invasions, to their former splendor. As the barbarians had retired beyond the friths of Glota and Bodotria, he built several castles on the isthmus between the two seas, in order to restrain them from breaking anew into the province. By this means, all the country between Adrian's wall and the two friths, which had been, for some time, held by the Picts, was recovered. Of this tract Theodosius made a fifth province, to which the emperor gave the name Valentia, perhaps from his brother Valens. Theodosius, before he left the island, crushed, in its very beginning, the revolt of one Valentine, or Valentinian, who, being banished into Britain, had prevailed upon some of the inhabitants to proclaim him emperor; but Theodosius, having got the usurper into his power, delivered him up to the civil magistrates [n]. And now Britain being restored to its former tranquillity, Theodosius returned to the emperor, by whom he was received with the greatest demonstrations of kindness and esteem. In the joint reign of the succeeding princes Valentinian II. and Gratian, Maximus, who commanded in Britain, hearing, that Gratian had taken Theodosius the younger for his collegue in the empire, and highly affronted at the preference given to a person, in his opinion, so much beneath him in merit, resolved to assume the imperial purple, and put himself upon an equality with his rival. Accordingly, having gained over to his party the Roman legions quartered in Britain, he carried them, with the flower of the British youth, into Gaul. As these never returned to their native country, being either cut off with their leader, or settling elsewhere, the nation, thus bereft of its strength, became afterwards an easy prey to the Picts and Scots.

He beats back the barbarians.

And makes a fifth province.

Maximus usurps the sovereignty in Britain.

Year after Christ 367.

[n] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 368.

Scots. Over theſe two nations Maximus is ſaid to have gained great advantages before his uſurpation, nay, and to have driven the latter quite out of the iſland; but this is not agreeable to what we read in the more antient writers, as we have obſerved elſewhere [o]. In the reign of Theodoſius, the Scots and Picts were, it ſeems, kept in awe by Chryſantius, the ſon of Marcian, biſhop of Conſtantinople, who, being appointed governor of Britain, acquitted himſelf in that office with great reputation [p]. Theodoſius was ſucceeded by his two ſons Arcadius and Honorius, the former ruling in the eaſt, and the latter in the weſt. As Honorius was very young, the famous Stilicho, who had been appointed by Theodoſius regent of the weſtern empire during the minority of his ſon, is ſuppoſed to have ſent over a legion into Britain, to defend it againſt the Scots, the Picts, and the Saxons [q]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that he ſecured Britain againſt the incurſions of its antient enemies; for Claudian, in enumerating the great things performed by Stilicho before his firſt conſulſhip, tells us, that he ſuccoured Britain attacked by the neighbouring nations, namely by the Scots; that he put it in a condition not to fear their arrows, nor the efforts of the Picts; and that he ſecured the Britiſh coaſts againſt the deſcents of the Saxons [r]. He adds elſewhere, that the Saxons being overcome, the ſea was quiet; that the Picts having loſt their ſtrength, Britain was delivered from her fears [s]. About this time a proper officer was appointed to guard the coaſt againſt the attempts of the Saxons, with the title of comes limitis Saxonici (R). But, not Stilicho ſecures Britain againſt the incurſions of Scots, Picts, &c.

[o] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xvi. p. 49. [p] Socrat. l. vii. [q] Uſſ. eccleſ. Brit. antiq. p. 595. [r] Claudian. de laud. Stil. l. ii. p. 140. [s] Idem ibid. p. 139.

(R) The learned Uſher aſcribes to Stilicho the eſtabliſhing of a legion in Britain, to defend it againſt the Picts, the Scots, and the Saxons (11). This Claudius ſeems to inſinuate, where he introduces Britain thus ſpeaking in praiſe of that great general and miniſter:

" Me quoque vicinis pereuntem gentibus, inquit,
" Munivit Stilicho, totam cum Scotus Iernem
" Movit, & infeſto ſpumavit remige Tethys.
" Illius effectum curis, ne bella timerem
" Scotica,

(11) Uſſer. antiq. Brit. p. 593.

not long after, the empire being over-run by the Alans, the Vandals, and the Suevians, most of the Roman troops quartered in Britain were recalled, and the island left almost quite open to the attacks of the Scots and Picts. Hereupon the natives, expecting no assistance from Honorius, resolved to set up an emperor of their own; and accordingly invested with that dignity one Mark, whom, though an officer of great credit among them, after a few days, they murdered, and placed Gratian, a native of Britain, in his room [t]. Gratian, after a short reign of four months, underwent the same fate, and was succeeded by Constantine, a common soldier, who was chosen merely for the sake of his name, common to him with Constantine the Great. The new prince obliged the Scots and Picts to quit the Roman province, and retire beyond the two friths; which success inspiring him with a mighty opinion of his own merit and fortune, he formed a design of making himself master of the whole empire. With this view he passed over into Gaul, taking with him the few Roman forces that had been left here, and such of the Britons as were able to bear arms. Of the success that attended him at first in Gaul and Spain, and of his unhappy end, we have spoken at length in our Roman history, to which we refer the reader [u]. The unhappy Britons, thus left to themselves after the departure of the Romans, and the flower of their youth, were more harassed than ever by the Scots, the Picts, and other northern nations, who, meeting with little or no opposition, broke into their country, and putting all to fire and sword, soon reduced them to a most miserable condition. In this state they continued from the year 407, when the usurper Constantine passed over into Gaul, to 410, when, after having often implored in vain the emperor's assistance, they withdrew their obedience to Rome, says Zosimus [x], and, being resolved to defend themselves with their own strength, would

The Britons chuse an emperor. Marcus and Gratian chosen, and slain.

Constantine chosen. Year after Christ 407.

The Britons withdrew their obedience to Rome. Year after Christ 410.

[t] Soz. l. ix. c. 11. p. 813. [u] Univers. hist. vol. xvi. p. 163, & seq. 185, & seq. [x] Zos. l. vi. p. 827.

"Scotica, nec Pictum tremerem, nec littore toto
"Prospicerem dubiis venientem Saxona velis.

As Stilicho is supposed to have appointed troops to guard the coasts of Britain, and prevent the Saxons from making descents, so he may be likewise said to have appointed a proper officer to command them, with the title of "the count of the Saxon "shore."

would no longer obey the laws of the empire. The emperor Honorius ſeemed to approve their conduct; for, by his letters, he permitted, and even adviſed, them to provide for their own ſafety [y]; which was an implicit reſigning the ſovereignty of the iſland, and releaſing the inhabitants from their allegiance to the empire. This renunciation was made, according to Bede, a little after the taking of Rome by Alaric, in the year of the city 1164 [z], or rather 1163, for it is certain, that Rome was taken in 410. The Britons, now again a free people, ſeem to have at firſt fought with ſucceſs againſt their antient and irreconcilable enemies the Scots and the Picts; for Zoſimus writes, that they delivered their cities from the inſults of an haughty enemy [a]. But being in the end overpowered, they had recourſe to the emperor, imploring his protection, and promiſing an entire and perpetual obedience to Rome, provided they were delivered from the tyranny and oppreſſion of their mercileſs enemies. Honorius, touched with compaſſion, ſent a legion to their relief; which, landing unexpectedly in Britain, cut in pieces great numbers of the Scots and Picts; and having obliged them to retire beyond the friths of Edinburgh and Dunbriton, they adviſed the natives to build a wall on the iſthmus from ſea to ſea, and then returned to the continent, where their aſſiſtance was wanted to repulſe the barbarians, breaking from all quarters into the empire. The Britons, without loſs of time, applied themſelves to the building of the wall; but as it was done only with turf, the barbarians broke it down in ſeveral places, and pouring in upon the territories of the Britons like a torrent, committed more dreadful ravages than ever, deſtroying every thing with fire and ſword [b]. This happened, according to the learned Uſher [c], in 422, but, according to Alford [d], in 421 (S). The unhappy Britons, after many miſeries and calamities, ſent

Honorius ſends them a legion.

They build a new wall.

[y] Idem ibid. p. 830. [z] Bed. hiſt. c. 11. [a] Zoſ. l. vi. p. 827. [b] Gild. excid. Britan. c. 12, 13. p. 117. [c] Uſſ. p. 1096. [d] Alford. annal. ad ann. 421.

(S) Alford produces a medal of the emperor Honorius, with this legend on the reverſe, "Victoria Auggg." and thence concludes, that the ſlaughter of the Scots and Picts by the legion, which Honorius ſent over, happened in the year of the chriſtian æra 421, the twenty-ſeventh of Honorius's reign. The word Auggg. denotes, as he rightly obſerves, three emperors reigning at the ſame time. Theſe were Honorius, Theodoſius, and Conſtantius, ſent deputies anew to the emperor; who, appearing before him with their garments rent, and duſt on their heads, prevailed upon him to ſend new forces to their relief. Theſe, haſtening into Britain, fell upon the barbarians, not in the leaſt appriſed of their arrival, and made a dreadful havock of them, while they were roving up and down the iſland in queſt of booty [e]. This ſlaughter of the northern nations is placed by Uſher in 426 [f], wherein he diſagrees with Bede, who ſuppoſes it to have happened before the year 423, in which Honorius died [g]. The Scots and Picts being thus driven beyond the above-mentioned friths, the Romans, who had no ambitious view in aſſiſting the diſtreſſed Britons, but were come over merely out of compaſſion and good nature, told them plainly, that they were to expect no further aſſiſtance from the emperor; that the troops he had now ſent were ordered back to the continent, to make head againſt the barbarians, who extended their ravages to all parts of the empire; and that they were therefore obliged to take their laſt farewel of Britain, and entirely abandon the iſland. After this declaration, Gallio of Ravenna, commander of the Roman troops, exhorted the Britons to defend themſelves for the future, by fighting manfully for their country, their wives, their children, and, what ought to be dearer than life itſelf, their liberty, againſt an enemy no ſtronger than themſelves, provided they would but lay aſide their fears, and exert their antient courage and reſolution. Not ſatisfied with encouraging them, that they might be the better able to withſtand the attacks of the enemy, he adviſed them to build a wall, not of turf, but of ſtone, offering them the aſſiſtance of his ſoldiers, and his own direction in the work. Hereupon the Britons, jointly with the Romans, fell to work, and carried on their new wall with ſuch diligence, that, tho' eight foot in breadth, and twelve in height, it was ſoon finiſhed. This wall ſtood, ſays Bede [h], in the ſame place where Severus had built his, that is, according to the moſt probable opinion, as we have obſerved above,

Another legion ſent to their relief.

The Britons build another wall.

on

[e] Gild. ibid. c. 14. p. 118. [f] Uſſ. ubi ſup. [g] Bed. chron. p. 114. [h] Bed. hiſt. c. 12. p. 156.

ſtantius. Now, as Conſtantius was made emperor and died in the ſame year 421, the victory aſcribed to the three emperors muſt neceſſarily have been gained in that year (12).

(12) Vide Alford. annal. ad ann. 421.

on the isthmus between the two friths of Glota and Bodotria. They likewise built towers at convenient distances on the east coast against the Saxons, and other barbarians, who, coming from Germany, made frequent descents on that side. The Roman commander, having thus secured the nation, employed the rest of the time he continued in the island, in instructing the natives in the art of war; which when he had done, leaving among them patterns of the weapons he had taught them to make; after many encouraging exhortations, he, with his Romans, took his last farewel of Britain, and telling the Britons, that they must expect their return no more, he crossed over to the continent [i]. From this last departure of the Romans we may date the total desertion of Britain by them, and the final period of the Roman empire in this island. As to the year, in which Britain was thus finally abandoned, there is a great disagreement among chronologers, some placing the retreat of the Romans in 426, some in 435, or 437. According to Alford, Gallio returned to Gaul in 422, the twenty-eighth of Honorius's reign [k]. Bede, in his history, speaks of the departure of the Romans as happening in 431 [l], but, in his chronicle, he seems to suppose it to have happened even before the year 423, and hence Alford places it in 422. The Britons fought, as we have seen, for many years against the Romans, in defence of their liberty; and it was not without a great deal of bloodshed that they submitted to the yoke. But being in the end pleased with their servitude, and become, as it were, one nation with their conquerors, who had continued among them for the space of four hundred years and upwards, they were no less unwilling to part with them, than they had been at first to receive them. This appears from the last message they sent to Aetius; but since it happened after the Romans had entirely abandoned the island, we shall refer the further relation of it to the following section.

The Romans take their last farewel of Britain.

[i] Gild. c. 24. p. 118. Bed. hist. c. 12. p. 156. [k] Alford. annal. ad hunc ann. [l] Bed. hist. l. i. c. 12, 13. p. 14, 15.

The End of the Eighteenth Volume.

AN

AN INDEX.

TO THE EIGHTEENTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and the Letter n to the Notes.

A.

ABalitæ, Avalitæ, where ſited, 93.

Abaſeni, who, and where ſited, 189.

Abaſſia, part of Ethiopia, its limits 85. Its high mountains, 96.

Abaſſines, their converſion, 165.

Abd Shem IV. king of the Arabs, his reign, 268.

Abra and Asba, their joint reign, 167.

Abrahah's ſtrange puniſhment, 170, 171.

---- Al Aſhram, his fabulous defeat by the Arabs, 274. Mr. Sale's opinion of its reality exploded, 276.

Abrim, the Nile navigable from, 100.

Abu Carb Aſaad introduces Judaiſm into Arabia, 272.

Abyla, mount, where, 15.

Acanthine iſland, in Ethiopia, 107.

Acci, the biſhopriek of, 334. Colony, 335.

Accitani, how they repreſented Mars, 464.

Acichorius follows Brennus into Greece, 548. His retreat and end, 549.

Acridophagi, who, and why ſo called, 93. Why ſhort-lived, 130, & n.

Ad, the old Arabian tribe of, 215.

Adad embraces chriſtianity, 166.

Adam, the etymon of the name, 122, 123, n.

Adeh, its ſituation and etymon, 200.

Adites, inhabitants of Ad. Their kings, government, &c. 215. Their gigantic ſtature exploded, 218.

Adminius protected by Caligula, 599. Proud letter to the Romans, ib. & ſeq.

Adnan, whether deſcended from Iſhmael, 219, 220.

Adonis, river in Tangitania, 13.

Adra, a city in Petræa, 186.

Adrian's wall, in Britain, 673. When built, 674. Its length, ib.

---- His expedition thither, 706. Coins ib. & 707, n.

Adriane, Hadrianopolis, a city in Cyrenaica, 65.

Advatici, who, 559. Their dreadful fate, ib.

Adulis emporium, in Ethiopia, 106, 169, n.

Adyrmachidæ, who, 61. Their way of fighting, &c. ib.

Ædemon defeated by the Romans, 43.

Ædui, who, 493, n. & 494. Where ſited, ib. & 557, n. Their averſion to monarchy, 493. Conteſt with the Arverni, 494. Ally with Cæſar, 495. Supplant him, 557, n. Raiſe a revolt againſt him, 561.

Ægypt, how become habitable, 115.

Ælia pons, pont Elan, whence ſo named, 673.

Ælianus Desiderius, governor of Britain, 711, & 712, n.

Æmilius, Paul. his court of judicature at York, 668.

Æminium, a city in Lusitania, 328.

Æras, the odd Spanish way of computing by, 367.

Æsitæ, who, and where, 187.

Æstii, who, and where, 582, & n. Their amber-trade, ib. & seq. Conquest by Ermanaric, 584.

Africa, whence so called, 82. Whether ever joined to Europe, 83.

Africus, eighteenth king of Yaman, 270.

Agarens, antient inhabitants of Petræa, 184. Why so called, 212. Noble defence against Trajan, &c. 300, 301.

Agræi, who, and where sited, 188.

Agricola subdues Britain, 705. Calpurnius quells it, 708.

Aidab, a port near Mecca, 207.

Air, mount, where, 206.

Alabbas, the region of, from whom so called, 207.

Al-Arakh, where seated, 213.

Albania, from whom so called, 685, 686, n.

Albinus sent into Britain, 709.

Albion, the antient name of Britain, 646.

Alcaabah, the sepulchre of Ishmael, 203.

Alemans, why so called, 572, n.

Alexander's colloquy with the oracle of Ammon, 63, n. Mad project against the Arabs, 294.

Alexius Angelus opposes Lascaris's new empire, 308. Defeated and imprisoned, ib.

--- Comnenus founds the empire of Trapezond, 311. The rest see sub Comnenus.

Al Hareth, the fifteenth king of Yaman, 270.

---the seventeenth king of Hira, dethroned, 282. Whether the Aretas mentioned by St. Paul, 287, & n.

--- king of Kenda, 291.

Al Heg'r, Hejr, Agra, where sited, 208.

Allat worshipped by the Arabs, 225, 227.

Allobroges, where seated, 556, n. Discover Catiline's cabals, 556.

Al Mondar assists Baharam, 281. Why called Massamia, 282.

Al Nooman turns christian, and abdicates, 281.

--- II. his wonderful conversion, 284. Death, 285.

Alone, antient Lancaster, 669.

Al Uzza worshipped by the Arabs, 225, 229.

Amalek, the tribe of, 219.

Amasis's stratagem against Barca, 71, 72, & n.

Amber, its plenty in Prussia, 582, 583.

Ambigatus invades Germany, 633.

Ambiorix, his account of his regal power, 496. Success against Cæsar, 560.

Ambronian women, their bravery, 509. 554, & 555, n.

America, whether known to the antients, 83.

Ammer, mount, where, 52.

Ammon, the city and temple of, 62. Its pleasant situation, and oracle, ib. n.

Ammonii, who, and where, 62, & n.

Amram, a wise king of Yaman, 272.

Amru, his stratagem and revenge against Zobah, 280.

Anagombri, mountains in Cyrenaica, 66.

Anas, river in Lusitania, 332.

Andalusia, its antient names, 373.

Andate, her temple and worship in Britain, 656.

Aneroestus's narrow escape, 546. Death, ib.

Angaucani, who, and where, 4.

Angels worshipped by the Arabs, 225. Their names, &c. ib. & seq.

Anglesey taken by Suetonius, 704.

Annius of Viterbo, a fabulous author, 684, n.

Anteus, his shield worshipped by the Moors, 26. One of the first kings of Mauritania, 31. Overcome by Hercules, ib. The rest see under Atlas, ib. & seq.

Anthropophagi, who, 94.

Antoninus's wall in Britain, where and when built, 673. Why surnamed Britannicus, 707, & n.

Aorni, the high mountains of, described, 97.

Apis, the city and temple of, 61.

Apollo worshipped by the Gauls, 466. His names, 467. Statues, 468.

Apries defeated by the Cyrenians, 70.

Aquæ Calidæ, the antient name of Bath, 659.

Aquitana Gallia described, 394.

Aquitani subdued, 559.

Ara Palladis, an island in Ethiopia, 107.

Arabia, why called Cush, 87, 88, & seq.

ſeq. Its names and etymons, 174. Extent and limits, 176, 177. & ſeq. How divided, 178. Firſt inhabitants, 179.

Arabia Petrea deſcribed, 179. Its towns, nations, &c. 183, 184. Remarkable places, 185.

--- Deſerta, its limits, tribes, &c. 186. Barrenneſs. 189. Why called Abaſene, ib. Its towns, 191.

--- Felix deſcribed, 192. Famed places, 199. How divided by the Orientals, ib. & 215. Its plenty of gold, 260. From whom called Arabia, 264, & n. Whether conquered by Trajan, 300.

Arabic character, when and by whom introduced, 242. Various alphabets, 244, to 248.

Arabs, ſome of the firſt inhabitants of Mauritania, 22. Their extract and hiſtory, 211.

--- Old, claſſes and tribes, 215, 219.

--- Modern, their extract, 219.

--- Scenitæ, their government, &c. 221, & ſeq. Kings, how choſen, 222. Laws, 223. Religion, ib. Deities, ib. to 232. Idols, ib. Hold ſome Magian tenets, 234. Notions of a future ſtate, 235. Jewiſh and chriſtian notions borrowed by them, 236. Biſhopricks among them, 238. Sects, 239. Language and dialects, ib. & ſeq. Writing, 241. Learning, poetry, &c. 249. Way of reckoning weeks, months, and years, 254. Sciences, 255. Arts, 256. Signal hoſpitality, 257. Other characters, 258. Commerce, 260. Circumciſion, 261. Other cuſtoms, ib. Reſpect to their kings, 262. Feaſtings, &c. 263. Hiſtory to the birth of Mohammed, 264. A liſt of their monarchs, 267. The names of their months, by whom given, 289, n. Other kingdoms and tribes, 289. Manner of ſecuring their paſtures, 292, & n. Whether, and how long, ſubject to Egypt, Medes, &c. 293, 294. Their ſucceſs againſt Antigonus, 294. Noble ſpeech to Demetrius, 296. Whether conquered by the Romans, 297. Tranſactions to Mohammed's time, 300. Hereſies after their converſion, 304.

Arabriga, a city in Luſitania, 328.

Araducta, a city in Luſitania, 328.

Ararena, the province of, where, 212.

Arceſilaus, king of Cyrene, 70.

--- II. his reign, ib.

--- III. his reign, ib.

--- IV. driven out, ib. Flight and death, 71.

Areta teaches philoſophy at Cyrene, 75, n.

Arga, a city in Arabia Felix, 199.

Arganthonius's long life, and reign, 384.

Arioviſtus defeated by Cæſar, 558, 638.

Ariſtippus's writings, and merry character, 74, n.

Armorica, Gallia, deſcribed, 395.

Arra, the metropolis of the Arraceni, 212.

Arraceni. See Saraceni, 185.

Arſmoe, a city of Cyrenaica, 65.

Artabrum promontorium, Finiſter, where ſited, 342.

Arverni, who, 493, n. Conteſt with the Ædui, 494.

Arvernum, capital of the Arverni, 557, n.

Aſcitæ, who, and where, 195.

Aſcurum, where ſited, 9.

Aſia, its etymon, 83.

Aſphaltites, lake, diſcovered by Demetrius, 297.

Aſtaboras, river, falls into the Nile, 105. Deſcribed, 104, n.

Aſtapus, river, falls into the Nile, 105.

Aſtratæ, iſlands, where, 107.

Aſtures, who, and where ſited, 342, 343, n.

Atlantidæ conquered by the Egyptians, 22. Who, and where ſited, 80. Their cuſtoms, 81.

Atlantis of Plato diſcuſſed, 83.

Atlas, king, the inventor of aſtronomy, 29. Firſt king of Mauritania, 31. Overcome by Hercules, ib. The ſame with Antæus, ib. & n. The fable of, explained, 32, &c.

--- a fabulous king of Spain, 375.

Atlas, mountains, 2. Deſcribed, 15.

Attacotii, different from the Caledonians, 672. Invade the Romans, 714.

Attrebatii in Britain, where ſeated, 659.

Attuatici, ſettle in Belgia, 574. Fifty-three thouſand ſold for ſlaves, 640.

Atzham, whether he turned Mohammedan, 171.

Avalitæ, where ſited, 106.

Avaricum taken by Cæſar, 561.

Auguſta Colonia, in Tarracon, 344.

--- Gemina, 344.

Auguſtus prevented from invading Britain, 697. Conqueſt of Ethiopia, 161.

Ausburgh, the capital of Suabia, 593.

Autolala, capital of the Autololes, 45, 46, & n.

Automala, a fortreſs of Cyrenaica, 65.

Autun, an antient univerſity in Gaul, 526. Its temple and hot waters, 467, n.

Auxume, metropolis of Ethiopia, 95. The ruins of, ib. The Abaſſine princes crowned, 96.

B.

BAcchus worſhipped by the Mauritanians, 25. By the Arabs, 231.

Bacchus, Iacchus, comes into Spain, 378.
Bacenian foreſt in Germany, 590.
Badanatha, capital of the Thamydeni, 198.
Badeo, a city in Arabia Felix, 199.
Bœtica, the province of, deſcribed, 333. Its inhabitants, ib. & 334, n. Roman colonies, 334. Cities, 335. Sea-ports and bays, 338, 339, 340. Minerals, &c. ib.
Bœtis, river, its two mouths, 337, & n. Its ſpring and courſe, 339. Divides Bœtica into two, 333.
Bœturia. See above, Bœtica, 333.
Bœtus, a fabulous king of Spain, 373.
Bagendra, the high mountains of, 97.
Bagrada river, its ſpring, 52.
Bahrein province deſcribed, 210.
Balchis, the ſuppoſed queen of Sheba, 270, 271.
Baleares iſlands deſcribed, 351.
Banaſa, where ſited, 10.
Banjuræ, where ſeated, 4. A tribe of the Gætulians, 45.
Barat-Anac, the ſuppoſed etymon of Britain, 648.
Barbarium promontorium in Luſitania, 331.
Barbeſul, a ſea-port in old Spain, 338.
Barca, where, and by whom built, 67. Betrayed to the Perſians, 71, & n.
Barcæi, who, and whence, 68. Their dreadful puniſhment, 72.
Bards, in Gaul, their office, &c. 487. Inferior to the druids, ib. & ſeq. Why ſtyled paraſites, 489, & n.
Barrows, on Salisbury plain, their uſe and deſcription, 437.
Baſtarnæ, who, and where ſited, 578.
Baſtitani, who, and where ſited, 333, & 334, n.
Baſtuli, who, and where ſited, 334, n.
Battus comes to Cyrenaica, 69. And cured of his ſtammering, ib. & 70.
--- II. and III. why ſurnamed the happy. 70.
--- IV. invites Demonax, 70.
Becca, the antient name of Mecca, 205.
Bedowens in Arabia, who, &c. 189, 221.
Belatucardus, Apollo ſo named in Britain, 656.
Belerium, a promontory in Danmonia, 659.
Belgæ ſettle in Gaul, 634. Why ſo named, ib. & n. Subdued by Cæſar, 558, 640.
--- in Britain, where ſeated, 659.
Bellovaci, who, 484, n. Ally with the Ædui, ib.
Bene-mezac, where ſituate, 52.
Berenice, a city in Cyrenaica, 65.
Bericus perſuades Claudius to invade Britain, 699, 700.
Beth-meon, a city in Arab-Petrea, 183.
Betus, Bœtus, antient king of Spain, 373.
Bituriges, who, 494. Subject to the Ædui, ib.
Black Foreſt, in Germany, 590.
Blæſus's ſucceſs againſt Tacfarinas, 42.
Blatoburgium, Bullneſs, its antiquities, 670.
Blemmyes ſubdued by Probus, 163.
Bletiſa, a city in Luſitania, 329.
Bnizomenæ, who, and where ſited, 198.
Bocchus's treachery to Jugurtha, 37, & n. Is rewarded for it, ib.
Bogud cuckolded by Cæſar, 38, n. Signal ſervices to him, ib. Death, ib.
Boii ſettle in Italy, 544.
Bolanus, Vect. governor of Britain, 705.
Bonduca defeated by Suetonius, 704.
Bonoſus's defeat and death, 712.
Boſtra, a city in Petrea, 186.
Bouſtrophedon, what, 527, n. Whether uſed by the Gauls, ib.
Brachata, Gallia, why ſo called, 395.
Branogenium, Worceſter, metropolis of the Cornavii, 664.
Brecknock inhabited in the time of the Romans, 665.
Brennus's noble anſwer to the Romans, 500, & n. Invited into Italy, 544. Plunders and burns Rome, ib. Defeated and cut off, 545. --- Fatal expedition into Greece, 548. His end, 549.
Brigantes, who, and where ſited, 667. Defeated by Oſtorius, 703. By Didius, 704. By Cerealis, 705. By Lollius, 707.
Brigo, a fabulous king of Spain, 372.
Britain, Great, deſcribed, 646. Whence ſo called, ib. & ſeq. Its ſituation, ſoil, &c. 649. Firſt inhabitants, 650. How divided, 658, & ſeq. Its three walls, 673, 674. Various diviſions, 676. Pentarchy, 677. Roman government, ib. & ſeq. Military 678 Fabulous hiſtory, 684, & n. Reduced by the Romans, 701, & ſeq. Governed by tribunes, 704. Quelled under ſeveral emperors, 705, & ſeq. Divided by Severus, 709. Submits to Aurelian, 712. Given to Carauſius, ib. Reunited, 713. Freſh diviſion under Conſtantine, ib.

Secured

Secured against the Picts, 716. Invaded by them and the Scots, 717. Abandoned by the Romans, 719.

Britons, their manners, &c. 652. Way of fighting, 655. Trade, shipping, &c. ib. & seq. Religion, 656. Government, ib. & 658. Their fortified woods, called towns, 672. Incorporated into the Roman army, 683. Embassy to Cæsar, 687. Brave defence against him, 688, 689. Submit to him, ib. Break the peace, 690. Submit anew, 691. Various defeats, 692---694. Many of them submit to him, 69-, & n. Whether all were conquered by him, 697. Tribute to Augustus, 698. Subdued by Claudius, 700. Defeated by Geta, 701. By Suetonius, 704. By Agricola, 705. Romanized, ib. Allowed to plant vines, 712. Stripped of their youth by Maximus, 715. Repulse the Scots and Picts, 718. Build a stone wall, 719.

Bructerii, who, and where sited, 575.

Brutus's fabulous conquest of Britain, 684, & seq.

Bullæum Silurum, where sited, 665, 666.

Burgundi, who, and where sited, 581.

Burii, who, and where sited, 579.

Buzez, where situate, 61.

C.

CAABA of the Arabs, what, 262.

Cabubatra mount, in Yaman, 202.

Cacus defeated in Spain, 378.

Cæsar's swift conquest in Gaul, 556, 557, & n. -- His temple built by the Lugdunenses, 453.

Caer Vorran, its antiquities, 670.

Cæsian forest in Germany, 590.

Cafres in Ethiopia, who, and where seated, 94---106.

Calaib, a prince of the Bani Maad, slain, 291.

Calaguris, the infamous colony of, 345.

Calamintha, where sited, 11.

Caledonii, who and where sited, 671. Transplanted, 705.

Callimachus's writings and character, 75, n.

Calpe, a sea-port in Bœtica, 338.

Camalodunum, the first Roman colony in Britain, 663.

Cambria by whom so called, 685, n.

Cambridge built on the ruins of Camboritum, 664.

Cambyses's expedition into Egypt, 153.

Camden's notion of Stonehenge confuted, 435.

Camillus, Fur, ill success against Taefarinas, 41.

Camulogena defeated by Cæsar, 561.

Camulus, one of the Gaulish names of Mars, 464, & n.

Canaria island, why so called, 21.

Candace, the common name of the Ethiopian queens, 113. Invaded by Petronius, 161, & seq. Peace with Augustus, 162.

Cantabri, who, and where situate, 341, 342.

Cantabrian sea and coasts, 341.

Cantii, where seated, 660.

Cantons in Gaul, what, and whence, 403, n.

Capraria island described, 21---353.

Carians come into Spain, 583.

Carlile, olim, where sited, 669.

Carna, a city in Arabia Felix, 194.

Carneades's writings and character, 76, n.

Carni, who, 553, & n. Subdued by Scaurus, ib.

Carnuti subdued by Cæsar, 562.

Carnutium, where situate, 583, & n.

Carteia, whether the same with Calpe, 338.

Casius mount, in Petrea, 186.

Cassibelan's treason, 686, n. ---Heads all the Britons against Cæsar, 693. Defeat, and defence against him, ib. & seq. Peace with him, 696.

Cassiterides islands, why so called by the Greeks, 648. Where sited, 351.

Castra Alata, supposed to be Edinburgh, 671.

Catabani, who, and where sited, 195.

Catamentules, an ally of Rome, 497.

Cattieuchlani, where seated, 662.

Celtes, how far spread through Europe, 396. Embassy to Alexander, 388.

Celtiberians, their warlike fierceness, 343. Excellent weapons, 360. Their religion, 410.

Cenomagni, &c. submit to Cæsar, 695, & n.

Cepio's treachery to the Tholousans, 553.

Cercina island, where sited, 79.

Ceretrius settles in Propontis, 548.

Cerne island, where probably sited, 83.

Certillus put to death for his ambition, 493.

Ceuta, its situation, 2.

Chaiboni, who, and where seated, 585. Invade Gaul, 586.

Chalce, where sited, 11.

Charidemus, the promontory of, 338.

Charlton, Dr.'s notion about Stonehenge confuted, 433.

Chauci, who, and where sited, 575.

Chausasii

Chaulaſii and Chaulotei who, and where ſited, 47.
Chelenophagi, who, and why ſo called, 93. Their food, manners, &c. 128, 129.
Cherſoneſus Cimbrica, whence ſo named, 572, 573.
Cicero's partial account of the Gauliſh religion, 447, & n.
Cimbrian women, their ſignal bravery, 509---637, n.
Cimbrians, their antiquity, &c. 573. Exent, ib. Blended with the Saxons, ib. Invade Italy, 635. & ſeq. Defeated, 636, & n.
Cinetii, who, and where ſited, 77
Cinype, the city of, 77. --- Diſtrict, ib. --- River, 79.
Claudius's edict againſt the druids, &c. 450, n. & 451. Expedition againſt Britain, 699. Succeſs there, 701. Honours decreed to him, 702. His colony and temple in Eſſex deſtroyed, 663.
Cænomani ſettled in Italy, 544.
Cohorts, Roman, their ſtations in Britain, 679.
Collipo, a city in Luſitania, 328
Cologn, capital of the Ubii, 576, 592.
Colubraria iſland deſcribed, 352.
Comata Gallia, why ſo called, 394
Comites Britanniarum, their office, 678. Extent of their power, 681.
Comius made king of the Attrebates, 687. Impriſoned, 689.
Commentarienſes, gaolers, their office, 677.
Comneni, the family of, 311, & 312, n. Butchered by Mohammed II. 322.
Comnenus, Alex. I. his reign at Trapezus, 315. —II. and III. 316, & n. --- John, his reign and imperial title, 317. --- Alex. II. his reign, 318. --- Baſilius, I. and II. their reign, ib. --- Alex. III. murdered by his ſon, 319. --- John II. his treaſon and reign, and death, 320. --- David, the laſt emperor of Trapezond, ib. Subdued and murdered by Mohammed, 322.
Complutenſian polyglot, by whom publiſhed, 348, & n.
Complutum, Alcala de Henazes, where ſited, 348.
Concolitanus taken priſoner, 546.
Conimbrica, a city in Luſitania, 328.
Conovium, Conway, the old ruins of, 667.
Conſtantine begins his empire in Britain, 713.
Conteſtani, who, and where ſited, 342.
Coral, whence ſo named, 193, n.
Corduba, a city in Bœtica, 336,
Coritani, who, and where ſited, 664.
Cornavii, who, and where ſited, 664.
Corniculârii, in Britain, their office, 677.
Cotes mount, in Mauritania, 15. Promontory, where, 15. Port, 16.
Coway ſtakes, when ſo called, 660.
Craſſus's ſucceſs in Gaul, 559.
Cratiſmandua's treachery to Caractacus, 704. Dethroned, ib.
Cumberland, the coaſts of, fortified by the Romans, 669.
Cumri, Cumbri, the name of the antient Britains, 648.
Cunamolgi, who, and why ſo called, 94. Where ſeated, 130.
Cunemundus defeated and killed by Alboin, 588, n.
Cunobeline's tribute to Auguſtus, 698. His coin, ib.
Cuſh, the land of, where, 87, 88, 109, & n. 138.
Cuſhites, who, 91, 111, 139. Their kingdom in Arabia, 211,
Cybele worſhipped by the Gauls, 476.
Cyre, the famed fountain of, 65, & n.
Cyrenaica deſcribed, 64. Its ſoil, fruits, &c. 65. Various nations, 66, 67. Invaded by Thimbrio, 72. Delivered up to Ptolemy, 73. Bequeathed to the Romans, ib. Now under the Turks, 74. Its learned men, ib. n.
Cyrene, metropolis of Cyrenaica, 65. Deſcribed, ib. By whom built, 69. Seized by Ariſton, 72.
Cyrenians, their cuſtoms, &c. 65. Government, &c. 72.

D.

DAlmatian women, their bravery, 510.
Dambea river falls into the Nile, 100.
Damnii, who, and where ſeated, 671.
Damnonii, in Britain, where ſited, 658.
Danube, river, deſcribed, 590.
Daphne, iſland in Ethiopia, 107.
Darat, river, abounds with crocodiles, 48.
Darodt, river, where, 13, n. Whether the ſame with Darat, 48.
Darræ, a tribe of Gætulians, 45. In Arabia Felix, 47.
Debris, the famed mountain of, 58.
Decius killed by Tacfarinas, 41.
Dejotarus rewarded by Pompey, 552, & n.
Demetæ, who, and where ſited, 666.
Devil's Scutt, a Gauliſh altar, deſcribed, 425.

Dhu-

Dhu-Jadan, king of Yaman, bigoted to judaiſm, 273.
Dhu'l Adhaar, why ſurnamed king of terrors, 270.
Dhu'l Karnaim, ſixteenth king of Yaman, 270.
Dhu Nowas, a jewiſh perſecutor of the chriſtians, and other recuſants, 305. Dethroned by Elesbaan, ib.
Diana, her temple, and ſtrange high-prieſt, near Rome, 503.
Diblathaim, a city in Petrea, 183.
Didius, Au. ſucceſs againſt the Brigantes, 704.
Didymi mount, in Yaman, 202.
Dimetia, whence ſo called, 666, 667.
Divitiacus's noble reſiſtance againſt the Romans, 497. Gets footing into Britain, 686, n.
Diurmount, where, 13, n.
Dobuni, in Britain, where ſited, 662. At war with their neighbours, ib.
Dolabella's ſucceſs againſt Tacfarinas, 42, 43.
Dolichenius, Apollo, why ſo called, 467.
Druids, Gauliſh, whence they had their religion, 408, 479, & n. Corrupt it, 430. Veneration for oaks, 415. And the miſleto of it, 416, 417, & n. Governed by a grand druid, 419. Preſerve their religion in ſet ſongs, 421. Offer up human victims, 422. Officiate in white garments, 423, & n. Threatened into Roman polytheiſm, 426, & ſeq. Their overgrown power in Gaul, 449, & n. 480. How long it laſted, 451. Suppreſſed by the Romans, 452, 454. Take the name of Senani, 459. Whether they had oracles, 456. Their antiquity, doctrines, &c. 477. Preſide at councils, elections, &c. 480. Hold celibacy, 481. Their three grand tenets, ib. Skill in phyſic, aſtronomy, &c. 483. Held a general diſſolution by fire, 485, &c. Contempt for writing, 522. Did not hold a tranſmigration, 541, & n.
Druids in Germany, their office, power, &c. 596, 608. Dreſs, ib, --- Arch or grand druid in Britain, 479. How choſen, 481.
Druideſſes believed to have had a prophetic ſpirit, 485. Three orders of them, 486. Their inhuman rites, &c. ib. & 487, n.
Druſus's ſucceſs in Gaul, 564, & ſeq.
Dubris portus, Dover, 661.
Ducas, John. See Vataces, 309.
Duels, the dernier reſort in Gaul, 502. Reflections on that cuſtom, ib. & ſeq. & 503, n.
Duma, a city in Petrea, 183.
Dunaan's horrid perſecution of the chriſtians, 169.
Duncala, metropolis of the Nubians, 96.
Durdus mount, where ſited, 14, n.
Durius river in Luſitania, 332.
Durnium, Dorcheſter, 659.
Duro-Cornovinum, where ſituate, 662.
Durotriges in Britain, who, and where, 659.
Duus, and other rivers in Tangitania, unknown, 13.
Dux Britanniarum, his office, 678.
Dwarfs, a region of, in Libya, 81, & n.

E.

EBora, a city in Luſitania, 330.
Eboracum, York, metropolis of the Brigantes, 668. Its court, &c. ib. Whence ſtyled Legio Sexta, 681.
Ebuſus, the iſland and city, 352.
Edinburgh's frith fortified, 671.
Egg formed by ſerpents, the mythology of, explained, 483, 484, & n.
Egypt, how become habitable, 115.
Elb, Albus, river in Germany, 592.
Elephant, the war of, 305. --- The æra of, when begun, 306.
Elephantine Peluſia, where, 154, n. Its diſtance from Axuma, 164.
Elephantophagi, where, and why ſo called, 94.
Elesbaan ſubdues the Homerites, 169. Turns chriſtian, ib. His character, ib. n.
Elesbaan's converſion, 306, n.
Eluſa, a city in Petrea, 186.
Emerita Auguſta, a city in Luſitania, 330.
Emirs, Arab, their office, 221.
Ems, Amiſia, river in Germany, 592.
England. See Britain, 646.
Engouſah, a city in Gætulia, 52, 53.
Eratoſthenes's writings and character. 76, n.
Erminage ſtreet deſcribed, 683.
Erythia iſland, where, 17, & n. 350.
Erythræus, antient king of Spain, 378.
Eſus, Heſus, the ſupreme deity of the Gauls, 408. Whence that name, 411, n. How worſhipped, 413. When exchanged for Jupiter, 419.
Eteſian winds, not the cauſe of the Nile's overflow, 101.
Ethiopia, how divided, 84, 85.

Ethiopia Propria, its extent, &c. 85. Names, ib. Why called Cush in scripture, & n. Its various nations, 92. Cities, 95, & n. Mountains, 96. Hot climes, 97. Seasons, 98. Soil, 99. Rivers, ib. Beer, ib. & n. Lakes, 106. Commerce, ib. Gold and other minerals, 110. Divided into forty-five kingdoms, 113. Its antiquity, kings, &c. 138, & seq. Damaged by a flood, 150. Tributary to Cambyses, 155. Penetrated by Ptolemy, 158. By Augustus, 161, & seq. By Probus, 163, & seq. Its history to the Zagæan usurpation, 173.

Ethiopians, how sited and divided, 89. Why black, 92. From whom descended, 110, 111. Whence and where settled, ib. & seq. Their antiquity, 112. Kingly government, 113, Laws, 114, & seq. Kings, how chosen, 113, 114, 116. Religion and deities, 116, & seq. Worship the sun, 120. Their language, 122. Its affinity to the Hebrew, &c. ib. & n. Changes, 123. Hieroglyphic letters, 124, n. Customs, 127. Weapons, 131, & n. Circumcision, ib. & n. Way of fighting, 133. Way of preserving the dead, 134. Food, ib. Deify their kings, 135, & n. Learning, ib. & seq. Character, 136, & seq. & n. Women, 137. History, 138. Kings, whether descended from Solomon, 141, & seq. Conquest of Egypt, 149. History to the expulsion of the shepherds, ib. & seq. To the death of Sethon, 151, & seq. To Xerxes, 153, & seq. Serve under him, 156, & n. When converted, 163. How, and by whom, 165, & seq. Reject the Arian heresy, 167, & n.

Eudocia, Commena, her family and excellent character, 319.

Eupliuntas, the famed tower of, 76.

Europe, whence that word, 83.

Euvates, among the Gauls, their office, 489.

Executioners, not allowed among some Ethiopians, 115. Why in esteem among the Germans, 608.

Exeter, Isca Danmoniorum, 659.

Exilissa, where sited, 8. Whether the same with Ceuta, ib.

Ezion Geber, a famed port in Petrea, 185.

F.

FALI, the bay of, where, 202.

Fez, the, kingdom of, its extent, 2.

Flamens, not a Gaulish, but Roman order, 489, 490.

Fortunatæ, beatæ insulæ, where sited, 19. Described, ib. n. Their number, 21.

Foss way, Roman, in Britain, described, 683.

Fountains worshipped by the Gauls, 454, & n. 457, n.

Franks, their horrid superstitions after their conversion, 490, & n.

Fratres Septem, Heptadelphi mount, where, 15.

Friga, Frea, 604, & n.

Frisii, where seated, 575.

Frontinus, Jul. success in Britain, 705.

Frumentius's promotion in Ethiopia, 165. Converts the country, 166.

Fullofaudes, slain in Britain. 714.

G.

GAbra-menses Keddus, an Ethiopian saint, 168, & n.

Gades, where situate, 337, & n. The city and temple of, 375, & n. --- The isle of, 350. Described, ib.

Gæsatæ, who and where, 545. Defeated and cut off, 546.

Gætulia, its boundaries, 44. Whence so called, ib. & seq. --- Part of, given to Juba, 50, 51.

Gætulians, 44. Their cities and territories, 45. Origin, 47. Government, &c. 48, 49, & n. Religion, ib. Defeated before Casilinum, 50. Serve under Jugurtha, ib. Go over to Cæsar, ib. Subdued by Cossus, 51.

Galapa, where sited, 9.

Galatia Celtogræcia, where sited, 395. Given to the Gauls, 396, & 551.

Galatians, whence so called, 395, 396. Defeated by the Jews, ib.

Gallagum, the Roman causeway of, 669.

Galleci, where situate, 342. Why so called, ib. & n. & 343, n.

Galli, Cybele's Priest, who, and why so called, 476, & n.

Gallia. See Gaul, 393.

Gallio's speech to the Britains, 719. Departs from them, 720.

Gallus Ætius's, expedition into Arabia, 298.

Garama, capital of the Garamantes, 56.

Garamantes, who and where sited, 55, & n. Their rudeness, 56. Towns, trade, &c. ib. & seq. Hunting, 57. Reduction, 59.

Gargoras, antient king of Spain, 379.

Garienis ostium, where, 664.

Gavius's bravery and reward, 702, n.
Gaul deſcribed, 392. Its extent, 396. Leſſened, 401. Its ſoil, climate, &c. 402. How become warmer, 404. How divided by the Romans, 563, & ſeq.
Gauliſh women, their bravery, 506. Signal inſtances of it, 509.
--- ſlaves defeated, 555.
--- chriſtians perſecuted, 568.
Gauls, their origin, 392. Various names, &c. 393. Settle in Spain, 381. Spread through Europe, 396. Their firſt coming thither, 400. Plain way of living, 403, & n. Religion, 405. Miſrepreſented by antient authors, ib. & n. & ſeq. n. Worſhip one Deity, 408. Their ceremonies, 410. Groves, 414. Deſcribed, 418. Worſhip like that of the antient Hebrews, 419. Bloody ſacrifices, 422. Funerals, ib. Auguries and victims, 423. Superſtitious cruelties, ib. & ſeq. Altars deſcribed, 425. Averſion to temples, 426, & 427, n. to 446. Conſecrated treaſures, 426. Polytheiſm, how and when introduced, 447. Temples, when firſt built, ib. Human ſacrifices forbid by the Romans, 450, 451. Wretched ſuperſtitions, 452, & ſeq. & n. Temples deſcribed, 458, & ſeq. Deities, 461. Inhuman rites, 463. Ridiculous ones, 466, & n. Goddeſſes, 475, 476. Belief of a future ſtate, 481. Mixed government, laws, &c. 490. Grand council, 492, & n. Civil diſcords, 493, 494. Kings, how choſen, 496. Their power, ib. Careſſed by the Romans, 497. Their laws, 498. Yearly councils, ib. & ſeq. Exceſſive fondneſs for duels, 502. For liberty, 505. Their valour dreaded by the Romans, 507. Character drawn by Juſtin, 508. Martial diſcipline, 510. Superſtition, 512. Way of training up their youth, 511, & n. Weapons, 513, & 546, n. Language, the old Celtic, 514, & ſeq. Proofs of it, 515, n. Their ſpeaking Greek exploded, 518. Univerſities, 519, & n. & 526. Swoln ſtyle, 520. Adopt the Greek characters, ib. & ſeq. Contempt of writing, 521, & n. Poetry, and fondneſs for it, 523, 524, & n. Arts, eloquence, &c. 525. Commerce, 527. Forbid the uſe of gold and ſilver, 528, & n. Hunting, &c. 529, & n. Feaſt of Diana, 531. Fondneſs for banquets, ib. & ſeq. & 532, n. Deſcribed, 533, 534, & n. Contempt of agriculture, 534, & ſeq. Of trades, ib. Drunkenneſs, 535, 536, & n. Idleneſs, 537. Ferocity, ib. Hoſpitality, ib. & ſeq. Fidelity, 539. Frugality, 541. Marriages, funerals, &c. ib. & n. Earlieſt expeditions into Italy, 543. Cut off by Camillus, 545. Second expedition, ib. & ſeq. Fatal one into Greece, 548. Why they demoliſhed temples, 549, n. Some ſettled in Galatia, 551. Overſpread Aſia, ib. n. Subdued in part by Marcius, 552. Signal victory over the Romans, 553, 554. Defeated by them, ib. Subdued by Cæſar, 558, & ſeq. How treated by the Romans, 563. Quite conquered by Aurelian, 568.
Gebra-meſkel's reign in Ethiopia, 172.
Gemella, Colonia, why ſo called, 334.
Gentiſci ſubdued by Scaurus, 553.
Geoffrey of Monmouth, his character, 684, n.
Gepidæ, who, and where, 585. Signal hoſpitality, 539 & n.
German women, their ſignal bravery, 509, 510.
---- old, ſuppoſed propheteſſes, 596, & n.
---- married, their conjugal fidelity and diligence, 624, & n. Hard laws, &c. againſt them, ib. & 628, & ſeq.
---- poetry, its roughneſs, 521, n. & 618.
Germania, how divided, 575, 576, & n. 577, 588. Its extent, 575 & ſeq. Its ſoil and produce, 588. Foreſts, rivers, and antient towns, ib. & ſeq.
Germans, their extract, 399, & n. 569. When firſt known to the Romans, 570. Their antient names and etymons, 571, & n. Several nations and territories, 575, & ſeq. Religion, 595. Cruel rites, 598. Had no temples, ib. Their deities, ib. & ſeq. Theology excelled that of the Greeks, &c. 605, 606. Yet mixed with horrid ſuperſtitions, 606, & n. Prieſts, 608. Laws and government, 609, & ſeq. Councils, 609, & n. Kings, &c. 610. Military diſcipline, 611, & n. Cavalry, 613. Weapons, and their fondneſs for them, 614, 615, & n. Valour, 616, Puniſhment, ib. Arts and ſciences, 617, & n. Dreſs, 618. Writing, 620, & n. Robuſtneſs, 621. Fidelity, 622. Hoſpitality, ib. Money, 623. Marriages, ib. Promiſcuous commerce confuted, 624. Funerals, 625. Belief of a future ſtate, 626, & n. Unnatural cuſtoms, 628. Fondneſs for ſtrong liquors, 629. Their antient hiſtory very dark, 630. Why invaded by the Romans, 631. By the Gauls, 633, & ſeq. Invade them, 634. Succeſs in Italy, 635. Defeated by Marius, 636. Invited by the Sequani, 637. Defeated, 639. Maſſacred by Germanicus, 644, & n. Other wars with the Romans, 646.

Gerræi, who, and where ſited, 193.
Geryon, a fabulous king of Spain, 373, 374, & n. His three ſons, ib. & ſeq.
Geſhem, the famed mountain of, deſcribed, 97. A priſon for the Abaſſine princes, ib.
Geſſoriacum, Bolonia, the triumphal arch of, 701.
Geſulians, their paſtoral life, 48.
Geta triumphs over the Britains, 701.
Gezira, Jezeira, iſland, where, 17.
Ghaſſan, the kingdom of, by whom founded, 285. A liſt of its kings, 286.
Ghir, river, in Gætulia, deſcribed, 53.
Gilda, where ſited, 9.
Gildas's account of Britain, 684, n.
Gindanes, who, and where ſeated, 77.
Girgiris mount, and its rivers, 56.
Gjudda, a port near Mecca, 207.
Glotæ Æſtuarium, fortified by Agricola, 671. Ruins of the Roman wall, 675.
Gogmagog, a fabulous prince of the Britiſh giants, 685, n.
Goiam, the mountains of, 97. Famed rocks, ib.
Gold deſpiſed by the Ethiopians, 133. By the Gauls, 528, & n. By the antient Germans, 623. --- the mines and traffick of, in Ethiopia, 160, n. --- the ſand of, in Luſitania, 332.
Gontiana, where ſited, 10.
Governors in Britain, their office, 677.
Gracchuris, the colony of, in Spain, 345.
Gratian choſen emperor by the Britains, 717. Slain, ib.
Grove, Maſſilian, deſcribed by Lucan, 414, & n.
Groves in high requeſt among the patriarchs, 415. Among the Gauls, ib. & ſeq. And Germans, 590.
Guzula, where ſited, 45. Whether the antient Gætulia, ib.
Gythiltis iſland in Ethiopia, 107.

H.

HAbaſhah, why one of the names of Ethiopia, 87, n.
Habis, antient king of Spain, 380.
Hadramant, the province of, deſcribed, 194.
Hamilcar inſpires his ſon with hatred to Rome, 386.
Hamyar, the chief king of Yaman, 222. His reign and ſucceſſors, 269. The end of it, 278.
Hannibal, the port of, 332.
Hhaſanites, who, and where, 207.
Havilah, the father of the Gætulians, 47.
Hejaz, the province of, deſcribed, 203. ---- kingdom, by whom founded, 222 Kings of, 288.
Hejra, the æra of, 306, & 307, n.
Helanus, lake, how worſhipped by the Gauls, 456.
Helvetii defeated by Cæſar, 556. Settled among the Ædui, 557.
Heraclitus made governor of South-Britain, 709.
Hercules Diodas, diſpoſſeſſes and kills Antæus, 32. The fables of, explained, ib. The time in which he flouriſhed, ib. & 33. Civilizes the Gætulians, 49. Worſhipped by the Gauls, 470, n. His reign in Spain, 374, 375.
Hercynian foreſt deſcribed, 589.
Herefordſhire formerly part of Wales, 665.
Herminius mons in Luſitania, 332.
Hermunduri, who, and where, 578.
Herodotus impoſed upon by the Scytho-Greeks, 619, n.
Heroopolitan gulph, where, 179, & n.
Herpidani, who, and where ſeated, 4.
Herpis, where, 9.
Hertha, a famed goddeſs in Germany, 598.
Heſperides, gardens, where, 66.
Heſperus, a fabulous king of Spain, 375.
Heſus. See Eſus, 410.
Hipylæ mountains in Bœtica, 339.
Hira, the kingdom of, founded, 279. Its duration, ib. Series of kings, ib. The end of it, 285.
Hiſpal, a fabulous king of Spain, 374. --- the city of Seville, deſcribed, 336. By whom founded, ib. & n.
Hiſpan, a fabulous king of Spain, 374, 375.
Hiſpania, whence that name, 324.
Hobal, the god of rain of the Arabs, 232. His ſtatue deſcribed, ib.
Hojr, king of Kenda, why called the eater, 290.
Homerites, who, and where, 195.
Honorius's reſignation of Britain, 718. Aſſiſts it againſt the Picts, ib.
Horeſti, who, and where, 671.
Hud, a pretended prophet of the Arabs, 216, 217.
Humbri. See Umbri, 398, 399, & n.
Hylogones, their ſite, food, &c. 94.
Hylophagi, their ſite, food, &c. 94. Prodigious activity, 129.

I.

JAbalah, laſt king of Ghaſſan, turns chriſtian, 287.
Jacobite ſect riſe in Arabia, 237.
Jadis, the Arab tribe of, whence, 218. Deſtroyed, ib.

Jafnah, firſt king of Ghaſſan, his conqueſt, 286.
--- ſecond, ſets Hira on fire, ib.
Jamno, a port in Minorca, 351.
Jangacocani. See Angaconani, 4.
Iberia, Spain, why ſo called, 323.
Iberians in Spain, who and where ſited, 323, 397.
Iberus, fabulous king of Spain, 372.
--- river, divides Tarraçon through, 341.
Iceni, who and where, 663. Submit to Cæſar, 695, & n. Oppoſe Oſtorius, 703.
Icenian, Icening ſtreet, on Salisbury plain deſcribed, 437, n.
Ichthyophagi, who, and whence ſo called, 93. Their cuſtoms, &c. 127. Food, &c. 128.
Idubeda, a fabulous king of Spain, 372. The mountains of, 350, n.
Jews, in Arabia, converted by a miracle, 305.
Ikenil-ſtreet deſcribed, 683.
Image worſhip, how firſt introduced, 225, 226, & n.
Indutiomarus defeated by Cæſar, 560.
Inſulæ tres, where ſited, 17.
Intercata, the colony of, 345.
Jodaimah's victories and death, 280.
Joktan, and his ſons, where ſettled, 197, 265.
Jones, Inigo's ſcheme of Stone-henge exploded, 432.
Jorham, an old tribe of Arab, 219.
Jou, Jovis, the Gauliſh name of Jupiter, 462.
Jovinus ſent to quell the Britons, 714.
Irem, the famed city and garden of, 215.
Irenæus, biſhop of Lions, martyred, 568.
Iſca, Usk, the Roman garriſon of, 666. The antiquities of, ib.
Iſhmael ſettles in Arabia, 266. The prophecy fulfilled in his deſcendants, ib.
Iſhmaelites, antient inhabitants of Arabia, 184. Their territories, 191.
Iſis, iſland, in Ethiopia, 107.
Iſurum Brigantum, where, 668.
Italy peopled by the old Celtes, 398, & n.
Itamas Portus, where ſited, 199.
Itius Portus, where ſited, 199.
Juba obtains Mauritania, 39. Educated at Rome, ib. n. Learning and works, ib. Worſhipped by the Ethiopians, 121.
Ivellus, river in Danmonia, 659.
Jubones, who, and where, 576.
Junonia iſland deſcribed, 21.
Jupiter, when firſt worſhipped in Gaul, 453, & n. How, ib. & ſeq. That name not adopted there, 461, 462. How worſhipped by the Garamantes, 58, & n. By the Germaus, 601. The Arabs, 231.

K.

KAdesk, the famed deſert of, 186.
Kaer-went, the ruins of, 666.--- Lleion, whence ſo called, ib.---Philycaſtel, the noble remains of, ib.
Kail, a pretended prophet of the Arabs, 216.
Kais, his long and bloody war, 293.
Karak, whether the antient Petra, 182.
Karioth, a city in Arabia Petrea, 183.
Kathan, the ſame with Joktan, 219. His poſterity, ib. & n. Reign, 268.
Kedareni, Cedreni, antient inhabitants of Petrea, 184.
Kedem, Arabia, why ſo called, 175, 178.
Kenda, the tribe and kings of, 290.
Keyzler's notion of Stonehenge exploded, 433.
--- Koſs, a famed Arab orator, 251.
Khozaah the Arab tribe of, whence, 289. Poſſeſſors of Mecca, &c. ib.
Kiz, the iſland of, where, 202.
Kelzum, Colzum, in Arabia Petrea, 185.
Koreiſh, the tribe of, ſeize on Mecca, and the Cabaa, 289, 290.
Koz, Kuſh, from whom ſo named, 139.

L.

LAbienus, left to command in Treves, 692.
Lactodorum, Bedford, 662.
Læves and Ananes ſettle in Italy, 544.
Lageolium, where ſituate, 668.
Lakes worſhipped by the Gauls, 454, & n. Superſtitious cuſtoms uſed to them, 456, & 457, n.
Lakmians, their extract, kingdom, &c. 279.
Lamalmon, the famed mountain of, deſcribed, 96.
Langobriga, a city in Luſitania, 327.
Laſcaris founds an empire at Nice, 307.
--- Theodore's reign and death, 308.
--- John, dethroned, 309. Murdered, 311.
Laſer, a gum, deſcribed, 66, 67.
Lathon river, where, 66.
Leogria, from whom ſo called, 685, n.
Leonorius's defection from Brennus, 548. Settled in Galatia, 550.

Lexovii ſubdued by Sabinus, 559.
Lybia, when firſt invaded, 33. Why ſo called, 82.
--- Interior, unknown, 59.
Libyans civilized by Dido, 35, 36. Their cuſtoms, &c. 80, & 156, n.
--- of Marmorica deſcribed, 60.
Licinius, Priſc. ſent into Britain, 706, & n.
Lindum, Lincoln, metropolis of the Coritani, 664.
Lingones ſettle in Italy, 543.
Lippe, Lupia, river in Germany, 592.
Lixus in Mauritania deſcribed, 6. Whether the ſame with Tingis, ib.
--- river, 7, 13.
Locuſts the food of the Ethiopians, 130. How caught, ib. Why ſo unwholſome, ib. & n.
Lodbrog, king, his requiem before his death, 603, n.
Lokman, king of the Adites, 216.
--- the famed Arab fabuliſt, an account of, 249, n.
Lollius's ſucceſs in Britain, 707, & n.
Londinum, London, whether it belonged to the Cantii, 661. To the Trinobantes, 662. When founded. 663. Whence called Auguſta, ib. Entered and reſtored by Theodoſius, 715.
Londobris, iſland in Luſitania, 332.
Longobardi, who, and where, 580.
Lotophagi, who, and where ſited, 77. Why ſo called, ib. Their cuſtoms, &c. ib. & ſeq.
Lotus, the plant of, its uſe, &c. 77, 78.
Loventium, Toway in Wales, 667.
Lud, king, the fabulous account of, 686, n.
Ludim, whether the Ethiopians, 92. Why ſo like them, 112.
Luernius's famed ſumptuous feaſt, 532, n.
Lugdunenſes built a temple to Cæſar, 565.
Luguwallum, Carliſle, why ſo called, 670. Its antiquities, ib.
Lupicinus, ſent againſt the Picts and Scots, 714.
Lupus, Vib. ſucceſs in Britain, 709.
Luſitania, deſcribed, 325, 326. Its cities, 327. Promontories, 331. Rivers, 332. Inhabited by the Celtiberi, 384.
Luſus, an antient king of Spain, 376.
Lutatius's defection from Brennus, 548.
Lygians, Logiones, who and where ſited, 579.

M.

MAçæ, who and where ſited, 77. Their cuſtoms, &c. ib.
Macrobians, why long-lived, 133. Their king's anſwer to Cambyſes's embaſſy, 153, 154.
Madian, a city in Arabia, 91. By whom founded, 207.
Mæatæ, who and where ſited, 671.
Magas reigns 50 years in Cyrenaica, 73.
Magi, iſland in Ethiopia, 107.
Magiſter militum, his office, 678.
Magnum, promontorium in Luſitania, 331.
Mago, a city in Minorca, 351.
Majorca, iſland deſcribed, 351.
Malek, firſt king of Hira, 280.
Malva, river of Tingitania, 12.
Manah worſhipped by the Arabs, 225. 229.
Mancunium, Manchester, 668.
Mandubracius made king of the Trinobantes, 695.
Manlius defeated in Gaul, 553.
Mantua, where ſited, 348.
Maranitæ, who, and where ſited, 194.
Marcellus's ſucceſs in Britain fatal, 708.
Marcius Rex, ſucceſs in Gaul 552.
Marcomani, who, and whence, 576.
Mareh, a river, that falls into the Nile, deſcribed, 104, n.
Mariani mountains in Bætica, 339, & n. 350, n.
Marius defeats the Gauls, 453, 454.
Mark choſen emperor, and killed, 717.
--- Patriarch, depoſed by the Trapezontines, 314, n.
Marmarica Libya deſcribed, 60. By whom inhabited, 62. And firſt peopled, 63. Diſtinct from Egypt, ib.
Mars worſhipped by the Gauls, 448. With bloody ſacrifices, 463. His other names, 464, 465, & n. Reckoned an infernal deity, 472, & n. Worſhipped in Germany, 601.
Marſeilles famed univerſity of, 518. Founded by the Greeks, 353.
Marſi, who and where ſited, 575. Gained over by Sylla, 554.
Maſruk, the laſt Ethiopian king of Yaman, 277.
Maſſilians their bloody ſacrifices, 414.
Matronæ in Germany, who, 599, n.
Mattiacum, capital of the Mattiaci, 576.
Mavia aſſiſts the Romans againſt the Goths, 302.
Maureſii, where ſeated, 4.
Mauri, why ſo called, 3. Obſcure origin, 36.
Mauritania deſcribed, 1. Why called Tingitania, ib. Its extent, 2. Whence called Mauruſia, 3. How divided, 4. Its rivers, mountains, &c. 12---15. Natural rarities, 21. By whom firſt peopled, 22.

22. Government, 24. Religion, 25. Language, 26. Cuſtoms, 27. Habit, 28. Arts, &c. 29. Power, 30. Riches, ib. Kings, 31. Conqueſt and diviſion, 43.

Maximus's revolt in Britain, 715.

Mazdak's hereſy and puniſhment, 282, 283.

Mecca, where ſituate, 203. Deſcribed, ib. How ſupplied with water, 204. And proviſions, ib. & ſeq. Its vaſt concourſe, &c. ib. Temple and ſharif, 205. By whom built, ib.

Medina, a city in Hejaz, 203. Deſcribed, 206.

Mediobriga, the lead-mine of, 332.

Mediocritus, Melitarchus, the firſt diſcoverer of the Britiſh iſlands, 648.

Mediolanum in Wales, where ſited, 667.

Mediomatrici, who, and where ſited, 577.

Mela, Rompon, where born, 338, 362.

Melanogætuli, who, and where, 51. Their tribes, cities, &c. 52. Known to the Carthaginians, 54, & n. Way of fighting and travelling, 54, 55.

Memnon's wars with the Egyptians, 149. The ſame with Menes, 150.

Memphis. See Moph, 150.

Menapii ſubdued by Cæſar, 559. Who, ib. n.

Meneſteus, the port of, 338.

Meniux iſland deſcribed, 79.

Mentz, the inventreſs of printing, 594.
--- Druſus's monument 591.

Menutia's iſland in Ethiopia, 107. Whether the preſent Madagaſcar, 109.

Mercury worſhipped by the Gauls, 448, 469. His names, 470, & n. Why reckoned an infernal deity, 472, & n. The god of riches, 473. Suppoſed tomb in Spain, 474. Why ſtyled Auguſtus, 473, & n. His heaps or mounts, what, 474, & n. How worſhipped, ib. Why repreſented of no ſex, 475 n. Why in the guiſe of Hercules, 525, & n.

Meroe, iſland in Ethiopia, 107. Its ſite, ib. & 108, n. Diſtance from Syene, ib. & ſeq. Towns, rivers, &c. 108, 109, n. Prieſts in high power, 115. Obſerve the Moſaic law, 118.

--- city, the reſidence of the Candaces, 108, 109.

Meſeus ſent to aſſiſt the Tyrians in Spain, 385.

Midianites, antient inhabitants of Petrea, 184. Where ſeated, ib.

Migdol, a city on the Nile, 89, n.

Minorca iſland deſcribed, 351.

Miſleto, of the oak, ſacred among the Gauls, 412, n. Its virtues, &c. 416, 417, & n.

Mnemium, promontory in Ethiopia, 106.

Mnevis, whether the ſame with Apis, 146, & n.

Moca, Mokca, a city in Petrea, 186. In Arabia Felix, 199. Yaman deſcribed, 200.

Mohammed's tomb at Medina deſcribed, 206. His extract and birth, 306.

Molochath, where ſituate, 9.

Mona, Angleſy, by whom conquered, 667.

Mondars, their extract, kingdom, &c. 279.

Mondus, an iſland and port in Ethiopia, 106.

Monmouthſhire, formerly part of Wales, 665.

Montmorillon, the famed temple of, deſcribed, 459, n.

Moon, how worſhiped by the Ethiopians, 121. By the Gauls, 460, n.

Moors. See Mauritanians, 22.

Moph, Noph, Memphis, from whom ſo called, 150.

Moraw river in Germany, 592.

Moresby, the antiquities of, 669.

Morini, who, 559, & n. 687. Subdued by Cæſar, 559. Attend him into Britain, 687, & ſeq.

Morocco, its extent, 2.

Moſes's pretended conqueſt of Ethiopia, 140.

Moſylon, promontory in Ethiopia, 106. Its port, ib.

Mozarabes, who, 256, & n. Officium Mozarabicum in Spain, what, ib. & n.

Muab, the royal reſidence of Yaman, 201.

Murcia, the goddeſs of cowards, 478, n.

Murodunum, Caermarthen in Wales, 667.

Muſulanians, where ſeated, 41. Serve under Tacfarinas, ib. Defeated, 43.

Muza, an emporium in Arabia Felix, 199.

Muzalo, made guardian to young Laſcaris, 310. Aſſaſſinated, ib.

Myronis, iſland in Ethiopia, 107.

Myſocuros, the port of, where, 16.

N.

NAb, river in Germany, 592.

Nabatheans, inhabitants of Petrea, 181, 209. From whom ſo named, 184. Where ſeated. ib. Way of living, 189.

Nabuchadnezzar, invades Spain, 383.

Najd, the province of, where ſited, 209.

Najran, an antient biſhoprick in Arabia, 237.

Narbonne, by whom built, 553.
Nariſci, who, and where, 576.
Nars worſhipped by the Arabs, 230.
Naſamones, who, and where, 67. Their cuſtoms, &c. 68, 69. Ravages, ib. Why ſo called, 86, n.
Naſherol'neam, a magnificent king of Yamian, 271.
Natapa, the reſidence of queen Candace, 96. Razed by Petronius, 162.
Nebo, a city of Arabia Petrea, 183.
Neckar, a river in Germany, 592.
Nectaridus, count, ſlain in Britain, 714.
Nectiberes, where ſited, 4.
Negroes, whether deſcended from Adam, 81, 82. The extent of their country, 59, 60. The reſt ſee under Ethiopia.
Nemetes, who and where ſited, 577.
Nemrin, a city in Petrea, 183.
Neptune, whence ſo named, 515, n. Worſhipped in Mauritania, 25. The firſt king of it, 31.
Neptys, the meaning of that word, 25.
Nero buys a vaſt quantity of amber, from the Æſtii, 583, 584.
Nervii, who, 494, n. Tribes ſubject to them, ib. Snbdued by Cæſar, 560.
Neuri, why ſaid to turn into wolves, 619, n.
Newton, Sir Iſaac's chronology of Atlas, &c. 33. Of Ethiopia and Egypt, vindicated, 144, & ſeq.
Nice, the empire of, when and by whom founded, 307, 308. Its monarchs, ib. & ſeq.
Niger, river, a branch of the Nile, 81, 102, & 53. Why called Niger, ib. Its courſe, &c. ib.
Nigris, river, where, 44.
Nigritæ, who and where, 81. The ſame with the Melanogætuli, 53. Their commerce, 55.
Nigritia, by whom peopled, 53, 54, 57.
Nile deſcribed, 99. Cauſes of its overflow, 101. How divided, 102. Capable of being ſtopped by the Abaſſine princes, 103, & n. Its names, 104. River's courſe and cataracts, ib. & n. Courſe turned by Memnon, 149. Etymon of Nile, ib. n.
Nivaria, iſland, why ſo called, 21.
Noah's pretended coming into Spain, 372.
Nobatæ, who and where, 92, 164. Plunder the empire, ib. Their religion, &c. ib. & n.
Nonnius, Phil. governor of Britain, 711.
Norba Prætoria, a city in Luſitania, 329.
Noricum, how divided, 577.
Northumberland, why ſo called, and Valentia, 670.
Noti-cornu, promontory of Ethiopia, 106.
Noviodunum, Noyons, taken by Cæſar, 560.
Nubians, by whom converted, 165. Who, and where ſited, 190, & n.
Numantia, its excellent ſituation, 349, n. Sad cataſtrophe, ib. &c.
Numerarii in Britain, their office, 677.
Nyza, a city in Arabia Felix, 199. A royal reſidence, ib.

O.

OAks, among the Gauls, the ſymbol of the deity, 408. In veneration with the antient patriarchs, 415, & n. One dedicated to an hundred deities, 454, & n. Sacred among the Germans, 595. And in Britain, 656.
Obal, the ſon of Joktan, gives names to places in Ethiopia, 112.
Odin worſhipped by the Germans, 601. Their notion of him, ib. & 602, & n. Made a northern hero, 604.
Ogpius, one of the names of Mercury, 470, n. Lucan's merry deſcription of him, explained, ib.
Ohud, mount, where ſited, 206.
Oleaſtrum, the promontory of, whence ſo called, 15.
Olica, kingdom, watered by the Nile, 104, 105, n.
Olevico, an ally of the Romans, 497.
Olicana, where, and by whom rebuilt, 667.
Oliſippo, Lisbon, metropolis of Luſitania, 327.
--- the port of, 331, 332.
Oman, the province of, where, 197.
--- the city of, abandoned, 201, 202.
Omanitæ, who, and where ſited, 197.
Ombros, iſland, why uninhabited, 21.
Ophiuſa, iſland, deſcribed, 352.
Ophiophagi, their ſite, food, &c. 94.
Opone, a port in Ethiopia, 106.
Orcades iſlands diſcovered, 671.
Ordeals uſed among the Gauls, 421.
Ordovices, who, and where ſited, 665. Their noble character, 667.
Oreſpodan hills, where, 350, n.
Orgetorix raiſes a new war in Helvetia, 556. Defeated by Cæſar, 557.
Orus, Sicorus, a fabulous king of Spain, 376.
Oſarſiphus, Uſorthon, rebels againſt the Ethiopians, 149.
Oſiris, overcomes Geryon, 374.

Oſtorius Scapula's forts in Britain, 664. The ruins of, extant, 665. His ſucceſs againſt them, 703. Death, 704.
Oſtriches, how caught by the Ethiopians, 129.
Ottadini, who, and where ſeated, 670.

P.

PAcatianus, the firſt vicar in Britain, 681.
Palatuus, an antient king of Spain, 378.
Palentia, by whom built, 378.
Paleologus's treachery to J. Laſcaris, 313, & ſeq.
Paliuri lake, where, 66
Palma, a city in Majorca, 351.
Pamphagi, their ſite, food, &c. 94.
Pan, worſhipped in Ethiopia, 121.
Parætonium deſcribed, 61.
Paran, a city of Arabia Petrea, 183. Deſert, 186.
Paraſite, its antient meaning, 489, & n.
Pathros, the land of, where, 89.
Pax, Julia, a city in Luſitania, 331.
Pays father's account of the Nile's courſe, 101.
Pedretus, river, in Damnonia, 659.
Peninus, Jupiter, why ſo called, 462, & n.
Pentapolis, Cyrenaica, why ſo called, 65.
Perennis complained againſt, 708. His fatal end, ib.
Perſic alphabet, 245.
Pertinax quells the mutineers in Britain, 709.
Petilius Cerealis's ſucceſs in Britain, 705.
Petra, metropol. of Arabia Petrea, 180, 181. Why ſo called, ib. Its ſite and deſcription, 181, 182, & n.
Phara, where ſited, 177, 183. One of the boundaries of Arabia, 177. --- The promontory of, 185.
Pharuſii, from whom deſcended, 22, 23, & n. A tribe of Gætulians, 46. Of Perſic extract, 47.
Phenicians plunder Spain, 382.
Pheretima's reception at Salamis, 70. Gets the government of Cyrenaica, 72. Her revenge on the Barcæ, ib.
Phocra, mount, where ſited, 13, n.
Phœbi Promontorium, where, 15.
Phruræſus, mount, by whom inhabited, 46.
Phut, where firſt ſettled, 22, 23.
Phutæi, their excellent uſe of the ſhield, 23.
Phylarchs, among the Gætulians, their office, 49, & n.
Picts, who, and where ſited, 650. Whether the ſame with the Britons, 651. Different from the Scots, 672. When firſt diſtinguiſhed in hiſtory, 714, & n. Submit to Julian, ib. Invade the Romans, ib. Subdued by Theodoſius, 715. By Conſtantine, 717. Repulſed by Honorius, 718.
Pithom, a city in Arabia Petrea, 183.
Pityuſæ, iſles, deſcribed, 352.
Planets, worſhipped by the Arabs, 224. Their ſeven temples to them, ib. Names and worſhip, ib. & ſeq.
Plantius's ſucceſs againſt the Britons, 700. Joined by Claudius, 701. Made governour, 703. Further conqueſts, ib. & ſeq.
Pliny's partial account of the Gauls, 483.
Pluto of the Gauls, who, 472.
Poets, in high eſteem among the Arabs, 251.
Pole, over Apollo, what, 468, & n.
Polignac, the antient temple of, 468.
Pollentia, a city in Majorca, 351.
Poltron, whence that word, 478, n.
Pomponius, the Gauliſh bard, his danger and vow, 488, n.
Popilius made to paſs under the yoke, 553.
Portreve, Cinqueport, whence ſo called, 661.
Portugal, whence ſo called, 343, n.
Portus Magnus, Portſmouth, 659.
Poſt, and Ante-verta Diana, why ſo called, 473, n.
Præpoſiti of Britain, their office, 678.
Praſum, promontory in Ethiopia, 106.
Prefects, Roman, their office and ſtation in Britain, 679.
Premis taken by Petronius, 96.
Prion river, where, 202.
---- city, where ſited, 202, 203.
Prionotus, mount, in Yaman, 202.
Probus permits vines to be planted in Gaul and Germany, 589.
Pſeboa, lake, in Ethiopia, 106. Iſland, ib. 107, n.
Pſecha taken by Petronius, 96.
Pſylli, who, and where ſited, 68. Tragical end, ib.
Ptolemais, Barce, a city in Cyrenaica, 65.
Ptolmey the ſon of Juba, his pedigree, 40, n.
Pudni, a city in Arabia Felix, 199.
Purple fiſh plentiful in Gætulia, 46.

Parpurariæ inſulæ, where, 17. Whether the modern Madeiras, ib. n.
Pygmies, where ſeated, 93.
Pyrenean mountains, whence ſo called, 350, n. Set on fire, 382.
Pythagoras's journey into Gaul, 471, n. 480, n.

Q.

Quadi, who, and where ſited, 578.
Quintilian the orator, where born, 362.

R.

Radwa mount, where, 207.
Rætia, how divided, 580.
Rætii, who, and where ſited, ib.
Raptum, a promontory of Ethiopia, 106.
Ratisbon, by whom built, 594.
Rauraci, who, and where ſeated, 577.
Regem, river in Bohemia, 592.
Regni, in Britain, where ſited, 660.
Regnum, now Ringwood, 660.
Reguli in Gaul, their power, 495, & n.
Rekem, the ſame with Petra, and Jocktheel, 181.
Renda heads the Scots into Britain, 652.
Rex, whence that word, 495, n.
Rhemi ſubdued by Cæſar, 562.
Rhine, river, uſed for trying the fidelity of wives, 421, & n. Its head and courſe, 591.
Rhiſophagi, where ſeated, 93, 94. Infeſted with lions, 129.
Rhodians ſettle in Spain, 381, 382.
Romans, their government in Britain, 677, & ſeq. Officers, ib. & ſeq. Stations, 679. Forces, 680. Give names to the principal towns in Britain, 682. Their highways there, ib. & ſeq. Exhauſt it of its men, 683, 684. Forſake the iſland, 720.
Romulea, Colonia, in Spain, where, 336.
Romus, an antient king of Spain, 377.
Roſes, Cyrenean, their excellence, 67.
Roſicrucian notions, their origin, 600, n.
Rubricatus, river, in Tarracon, 342.
Runic character, what, and whence ſo called, 620, & n.
Rufadir, Ryzadir, where ſited, 8.
Rutubis, the port of, where ſituate, 8, 16.
Rutupiæ, portus Rutupienſs, where ſituate, 660, 661.

S.

Saba, the diſtinct, towns, &c. of, 192, 201. The metropolis of the Sabei, 192. The famed reſervoir of, 278. Broken and drowns the country, ib.
Sabacon, So, his reign and retirement, 151.
Sabæi, who, and where ſited, 192. How governed, 223. Their religion, ib. Tenets, 226, & n.
Sabatha, Sabota, metropolis of the Adramitæ, 194.
Sabiniana ala, whence ſo named, 673.
Sabit, a ruined port in Ethiopia, 107.
Sacrum Promontorium, in Luſitania, 331.
Sagapola, mount, in Gætulia, 46.
Saguntì, the port of, where, 16.
Sahara, river, in Gætulia, 46.
Sala, where ſited, 8. --- River 13.
Salabus, defeated by Geta, 43. Peace with him, ib.
Salacia, a city in Luſitania, 330.
Salah, a prophet of the Arabs, who, 217. His miracles and death, ib. & 218.
Salathus, river, in Gætulia, 46.
Salmantica, Salamanca, a city in Luſitania, 330.
Salt, houſes built with, in Libya, 81.
Saluſtius, legate of Britain, put to death, 706.
Samercand, by whom built, 271.
Sanaa, metropolis of Yaman, 193. Deſcribed, 201. --- The palace of, ib.
Saphar, the frankincenſe of, 196.
Sapphoritæ, who, and where ſited, 196.
Sapur's cruelty to the Arabs, 280.
Saraeenic alphabet, 248.
Saracens, who, and where ſited, 185, 197. Why ſo called, 212, & ſeq. & n. Penſionary to the empire, 302.
Saſus, the golden mines of, 159, n.
Saturni, Promontorium, in Ethiopia, 106.
Sawa, worſhipped by the Arabs, 230.
Saxon ſhore, whence ſo called, 661.
Saxons invade the Romans, 714. Quelled by Stilicho, 716.
Scalabis, a city in Luſitania, 328.
Scaurus's ſucceſs and roads in Gaul, 553.
Scilly iſlands, their tin trade, 648. Diſcovered by the Greeks, 655.
Scordiſci forbid the uſe of gold and ſilver, 528, n.
Scots receive and aſſiſt the Picts, 650. Their origin, 652. Different from the Caledonians, 672. When firſt diſtinguiſhed in hiſtory, 714, & n. Submit to Julian, ib. Invade the Romans, ib. Repulſed by Conſtantine, 717. By Honorius, 718.

Scour, river, the battle at, 692, n.
Scythians of Bede, who, 650.
Seba, by whom founded, 191.
Secut, the head of the Nile, 99.
Seduſii, who, and where ſited, 576.
Segobria, capital of the Celtiberi, 349, n.
Seguntines ſubmit to Cæſar, 695. Where ſited, ib. n.
Seif ebn D'hu drives the Ethiopians out of Yaman, 277. The laſt of Hamyar's race, ib.
Selgovæ, who, and where ſited, 671.
Semnones, Sennones, who, and why ſo called, 581. Ally with the Ædui, 494, n. Invade the Cluſians, 499. Brave anſwer to the Romans, 500.
Seneca, where born, 362.
Sennani, druids, why ſo called, 479.
Sennar watered by the Nile, 100. Whether different from Nubia, ib. n.
Septa. See Ceuta, 2.
Sequani, who, 494. Subject to the Arverni, ib.
Seſac's conqueſt of Ethiopia, 143. Civilizes it, 144, 145.
Seſoſtris's vaſt conqueſts, 114. Whether the ſame with Seſac, 143, 144.
Seſtiarium, the promontory of, 15.
Seth worſhipped by the Sabians, 228, n.
Sethon, who, and his wars, 151.
Severus repulſed before Atra, 301, 302. His wall in Britain, when built, 674. Severe expedition againſt the Caledonians, 710. Death, 711.
---- Valentinian's general, ſent into Britain, 714.
Shaddad, prince of the antient Arabs, 215, 270.
Shamar, Yaraaſh, twenty-fourth king of Yaman, 271.
Shanater, Dhu, depoſed for his incontinence, 273.
Sheba, the queen of, a doubtful tradition of her, 117. Her country and religion, ib. & ſeq. The Abaſſines account of her, 141.
Shekhs, Arab, their office and power, 221.
Shewa, the mountains of, 97.
Shihr, its frankincenſe famed, 200.
Shoaib, the ſame with Jethro, 207, 208.
Sicambri, ravaged by Cæſar, 641, 642, & n.
Sicanus, a fabulous king of Spain, 376.
Siceleus, a fabulous king of Spain, 376.
Sicoris, river, in Spain, 376.
Silphium, the famed plant, deſcribed, 66.
Silures, who, and where ſited, 665. Brave defence againſt the Romans, 704. Subdued by Frontinus, 705.
Sin, the famed deſert of, 186.
Sinai, the mountain of, 186.
Sindia, where ſituate, 178, n.
Sittiorum, Colonia Cirta, whence ſo called, 326.
Sclavonians, their ſignal hoſpitality, 539, n.
Socrates iſland, where, 211.
Sohar, where ſited, 202.
Solis, Mons, the promontory of, 15.
Spain deſcribed, 322. Its limits, names, &c. ib. & ſeq. How divided, 325. Its cities, colonies, &c. 327. How governed under the Romans, 357, & ſeq. Suffers a twenty-ſix years drought, 381. By what nations invaded, ib. ſeq. When and how ſubdued by the Carthaginians, 385. By the Romans, 387. Stripped of its immenſe riches, 388. & n.
Spaniards, their religion, 353, & ſeq. Government, 357. Laws, 359. Valour and diſcipline, 360. Why ſo hardly conquered, 361. Arts, ſciences, &c. 362. Antient language, 363. Why mixed with Hebrew, 364. When exchanged for the Latin, 365. Their writing, 366. Odd way of computing time, 367. Education of children, 368. Riches and commerce, ib. Character, 369. Fabulous hiſtory, 370, & ſeq.
---- women, their hardineſs, 340.
Spartacus defeated and ſlain, 555.
Spermatophagi, their ſite, food, &c. 94.
Sporades, iſlands in Ethiopia, 107.
Stæni, where ſited, 552. The deſperate end, 553.
Stars, fixed, why worſhipped by the Arabs, 223. Their names, worſhip, &c. 225.
Stilicho ſecures Britain againſt the Picts, 716.
Stonehenge, by whom built, 430. Whence ſo called, 432. Not a heathen temple, ib. & ſeq. Errors about it confuted, 433, & n. The fabric deſcribed, 435. New conjectures concerning it, 438. & ſeq. Its ſtones, whence brought, 441. Huge bulk and weight, 442. Diſpoſition, &c. 444.
Strata, Julia and Marcella, by whom made, 683.
Stratzburgh, metropolis of the Trebocci, 593. & n.
Struthophagi, &c. where ſited, 93.
Stukeley's noble deſcription of Stonehenge, 430, & ſeq.

Suaquema, iſland, its torrid heat, 96.
Subur, river in Tingitania, 13. In Gætulia, 46.
Succoſii, who, and where ſited, 4.
Suetoniŭs, Paul. his ſucceſs in Britain, 704.
Suevi, who, and where ſited, 580.
Sun worſhipped by the Mauritanians, 25. By the Gauls, 463. Germans, 604. --- the fountain of, 63, & n.
Sur, the famed deſert of, 186.
Syllæus's treachery to Æl. Gallus, 300. Puniſhment, ib.
Syrtica regio, deſcribed, 66. Its limits, 67. Nations, mountains, &c. 75. Iſlands, 79. To whom ſubject, 80.

T.

TAcalhaimanout, a Coptic ſaint and apoſtle, 167. The etymon of his name, 168.
Tacaza, river, falls into the Nile, 100. Deſcribed, 104, n.
Tacfarinus's plunders in Afric, 41. Defeated before Thala, ib. By Apronius, 42. His death, 43.
Taei, Tavi Oſtium, where, 671.
Tagus, a fabulous king of Spain, 373.
--- a river, in Luſitania, 332. The golden ſand of, ib.
Talabrica, a city in Luſitania, 327.
Taluda, river, in Tingitania, 12.
Tamar, the mouth of, near Plymouth, 659.
Tamna, a city in Arabia Felix, 195, 209.
Tanfana, the temple of, what, 599, & n.
Tangier. See Tangis, 5.
--- the famed cave of, 22.
Taran, the Gauliſh Jupiter, who ſo called, 462.
Tarraco the metropolis of Tarracon, 341. Deſcribed, 346.
Tarracon, the province of, deſcribed, 341. Its different nations, 342, & ſeq. & n.
---- the city of, ſituation, 346. & n. Councils, held at, 347. By whom built, 383.
Tarteſus, where ſituate, 337, & n.
Taſm, an antient Arabic tribe, 218.
Taytæ, kings of Hira, 285.
Tectoſagi, who, and where ſeated, 585, n. Defeated by Sylla, 554.
Tehama, the province of, where ſited, 208.
Tencteri, who, and where ſited, 576. Defeated by Cæſar, 641.
Teſta, an antient king of Spain, 377.
Tetricus choſen king in Gaul, 568. Submits to Aurelian, ib.
Teutones, Germans, why ſo called, 573, 585, n. Invade Italy, 635.
Thabir, mount, where ſited, 206.
Thaiſa, a city in Hejaz, 206.
Thamud, a tribe of antient Arabs, 217. Their impiety, ib.
Thamydeni, who, and where ſited, 198.
Thapſacus, a city in Arab. Deſert, 191.
Thema, a city in Arabia. Deſert, 191,
Theodoſius's ſucceſs in Britain, 715.
Theutat, worſhipped in Gaul. See under Mercury, 469, 470, & n.
Tholoſan temple and treaſure, by whom built, 466, 467, & n. Plundered by Cæpio, 553. Deſcribed, 455, n.
Thymaterium, where ſited, 7.
Tiberius, an error about him corrected, 450, 451, n.
Tigre, the mountains of, 96.
Tin, fetched by the Phœnicians from Britain, 648, & ſeq. Diſcovered by the Greeks, 655.
Tingis, capital of Mauritania Tingitana, 1. When, and by whom built, 5. A gigantic corps dug up at, ib. Its other names, ib.
Tingitania. See Mauritania, 1,2. When reduced into a Roman province, 38, 39.
Tirhakah, who, 152.
Titus's ſucceſs in Britain, 703.
Tocoloſida, where ſited, 10.
Togata, Gallia, whence ſo called, 395.
Togodunus, defeated by the Romans, 700. Killed, 701.
Toletum, Toledo, where ſited, 348.
Toriſin's ſignal fidelity to Ildiſgus, 539, n.
Torpedoes, their ſtrange effects, 104, n.
Trajan's fruitleſs attempt againſt Arabia, 300, 301, & ſeq.
Trapezond, the city of, deſcribed, 311, & n. The kingdom of, when and by whom founded, ib. Kings of, 313. Subdued by the Turks, 322.
Trapezontines, their religion, laws, &c. 313.
Treviri, who, and where ſeated, 576. & n. Subdued by Cæſar, 562. Raiſes a new war againſt the Romans, 642.
Tribocci, who, and where ſeated, 576, 577.
Tribunes in Britain, their office and ſtations, 679, 680.
Triers, capital of the Treviri, 576. By whom built, 594.
Trinobantes, who, and where ſited, 662. Submit to Cæſar, ib. &c.
Triſanto, antient Southampton, 659.
Triſidis, where ſituate, 10.

Troglodytes, who, and where ſited, 92. Their country barren, 93. Way of living, 131. Inhuman cuſtoms, ib.
Tubal's pretended peopling of Spain, 371, & n.
Tugurt, metropol. of Wad-Reag, 52.
Tungri, who, and where ſeated, 576.
Turdetani, ſettle in Luſitania, 396.
Turduli, whether the ſame with the Turdetani, 326, 333, & n.
Turvel, the ſuppoſed capital of the Turdetani, 335, 336, & n.
Tyrants, Tyrannis, whence that word, 495, n.
Tzana, lake, croſſed by the Nile, 100, & 102, n.
Tziim, in ſcripture, what, 93.

V.

VAcuata, where ſituate, 4.
Valens Fabius, his extortions in Gaul, 567.
Valentia, the province of, in Spain, 341. City, 347. By whom built, ib. n. See alſo, 377. In North Britain, whence ſo called, 677. Governed by conſulars, ib. Made a 5th province, 715.
Valentine's, revolt in Britain, cruſhed, 715.
Valhala, Odin's paradiſe, deſcribed, 602, & n.
Vallona, a river in Tingitania, 12, 13, n.
Vangiones, who, and where ſited, 577.
Vaſſo, the famed temple of, in Gaul, 458.
Vates, among the Gauls, their office, 489.
Ubii, who, and where ſited, 576, 593. Outwitted by Cæſar, 641, & n.
Velpi, mountains in Cyrenaica, 66.
Veneti ſubdued, 559.
Venta Belgarum, Wincheſter, 659. Siluram, Kaerwent, 666.
Verbicæ, where ſited, 4.
Vercingetorix defeated by Cæſar, 560, 561.
Verſotina worſhipped by the Ethiopians, 121.
Verves, where ſited, 4.
Verulam, St. Albans, 662. Taken by Cæſar, 696.
Veſpaſian's ſucceſs in Britain, 703.
Veſuni, who, 45, 46, n.
Veteræ, the Roman ſtation of, 669.
Vexalla, the eſtuary of, 659.
Vicar of Britain, his office, 677. Enſigns, 678. The firſt, 681.
Victims, human, offered by the Gauls, 410, 463, & ſeq.
Vindebona, capital of Auſtria, 577.
Vindelici, who, and where ſited, 577.
Vindex's revolt, defeat, and death, 565, 566, & n.
Viriatus's ſucceſs againſt the Romans, 389. Aſſaſſinated by Servil. Cæpius, ib.
Viroconinum, capital of the Cornavii, 665.
Viſtula, river in Germany, 591.
Viſurgis, river in Franconia, 592.
Ulus, a fabulous king of Spain, 376.
Umbri, Aborigines, of Italy, 398.
Unelli ſubdued, 559.
Voliba, antient Falmouth, 659.
Volſcæ, Tectoſagi ſubdued by Marcius, 553.
Volubiliani, where ſited, 4,
Volubilis, where ſited, 4.
Urce, a part of the Baſtitani, 336.
Uſargatæ, mountains deſcribed, 51, 52.
Uſipii, who, and where ſeated, 575. Defeated by Cæſar, 641.
Vulcan, in what ſenſe worſhipped by the antient Germans, 606, & n.
Uxellodunum taken by Cæſar, 562.

W.

WAd-reagh, the diſtrict of, 52. How ſupplied with water, ib.
Wadd worſhipped by the Arabs, 230.
Waleka, the mountains of, 97.
Wales retains the pure antient Celtic, 514. The reaſon of it, 515. Its antient inhabitants, 658, & ſeq.
Wall's-end, Finis Walli, in Northumberland, 679.
War, unjuſt, the æra of, 306, & n.
Vataces, John Ducas, ſecond emperor of Nice, 309.
Watling ſtreet, why ſo called, 683. Its extent, ib. & ſeq.
Wayel, ſixth king of the Arabs, 269.
Whallop caſtle, the antient ruins of, 669.
Woden, king of the Goths, his character under Odin, 601, & ſeq.
Women propheteſſes in high repute in Gaul, 450, n.
--- old, eſteemed in Ethiopia, 131. In Germany, why, 596, & n.
Wurglah, a city in Gætulia, 53.

X.

XErolibya, where ſited, 82.
Xibam, Shibam, a city in Arab. Felix, 194.

Y.

YAfer, eighth king of Yaman, 269.
Yaguth, an idol of the Arabs, 230.
Yamama, the province of, 209. --- City ib.

ib. Princeſs, ib. Fountain, ib.
Yaman, inhabited by Cuſhites, 139. Its extent, &c. 192. Deſcribed, 200. Its towns, ib. Soil, mountains, &c. 202, & ſeq. By whom founded, 222. The kings of, 268. End of their kingdom, 278. Seized by the Abaſſines, 305.
Yambo, Yanbo, a port in Arabia, 207.
Yarab ſucceeds Joktan in Arabia, 264, 268.
Yaſhab, the ſucceſſor of Yarab, 268.
Yatreb, the antient name of Medina, 206. Whence ſo called, ib.
Yauk, worſhipped by the Arabs, 230, & n.
Yſel, Iſala, a river in Germany, 592.
Yuſef introduces judaiſm in Yaman, 236. Perſecutes the recuſants, 273.

Z.

ZAab, the diſtrict of, where, 52.
Zagreuſii, where ſited, 4.
Zelis, where ſituate, 6. Whether the Roman Arzilla, ib. ---- river in Tangitania, 12, 13.
Zemzem, the well of, at Mecca, 204. The Turks, tradition of it, 205.
Zendero, iſland, ſaid to be governed by a dog, 115, n.
Zengiza's promont. in Ethiopia, 106.
Zerah's prodigious army, 114, 149. Defeated by Aſa, ib.
Zerbi, iſland, where, 79, n.
Zin, the famed deſert of, 186.
Zoa, by whom built, 70.
Zobair's inſignificant aqueduct, 204.
Zohair, a wiſe prince of Kelab, 291.
Zohair II. murdered, 292.
Zuchabari, the ſpring of, in Syrtes, 79.
Zygritæ, who, and where ſited, 61.

The End of the Eighteenth VOLUME.

DIRECTIONS to the Binder for the MAPS.

M Auritania. Page 1
Antient Spain. 322
---- Gaul. 392
---- Germany. 569
I. Genealogical table of the genuine Arabs, deſcended from Kahtan or Joktan. 219
II. ---- of the naturalized Arabs, deſcended from Iſhmael, by a Daughter of Modad the Jorhamite. 220
III. ---- of the Tribe of Koreiſh. 225
The plan of the famed Gauliſh temple of Montmorillon. 459